McFARLAND, J. Plaintiff brought this action for a decree reviving a certain mortgage, and subrogating him to the rights of the assignee of said mortgage. Judgment went for plaintiff, and defendants appeal from the judgment upon the judgment roll, which includes findings, their general contention being that, upon the findings, the judgment should have been for defendants. The facts are, briefly, these: The plaintiff, Shaffer, and the defendant McClosky were on February 11, 1888, the owners, as tenants in common, by purchase from one Fahey, of certain land described in the complaint; and on that day, as the main part of the purchase money, they made to Fahey their promissory notes for certain sums of money to be due at different times, and also executed to him a mortgage upon the said land to secure said notes. Fahey assigned the notes and mortgage to the First National Bank of Merced. A part of the money secured by the mortgage was paid by plaintiff and McCloskey, but, when the whole amount became due,—$5,952.50 being unpaid,—McCloskey was unable to pay his share; and, as the holder of the mortgage was pressing for the money, the plaintiff was compelled to pay the whole amount in order to protect his own interest in the land. Under these circumstances, McCloskey promised verbally that he would assign his one-half interest in the land to plaintiff if the latter would pay the full amount due on the notes and mortgage. Plaintiff agreeing to this, McCloskey conveyed his half of the land to plaintiff, and plaintiff paid the full amount remaining due on the mortgage, and Fahey satisfied the same on the record. This occurred on February 1, 1890. McCloskey did not inform plaintiff that he (McCloskey) had created any other incumbrance on his half of the land, and plaintiff had no actual knowledge of any such incumbrance. He supposed, when he paid the amount due on the mortgage, and had it satisfied, that the land was then free of any lien; and he would not have paid off the mortgage, as aforesaid, if he had known of any other lien. It turned out, however, that, without plaintiff's knowledge, McCloskey, after the execution of said mortgage, and before its satisfaction as aforesaid, had executed a deed of trust of all his interest in the land to one John Ruddle for the benefit of the Merced Bank, a corporation made a defendant in the action, to secure a certain sum of money, and that said deed of trust had been recorded in the county recorder's office on November 10, 1888. (Certain proceedings were had under said deed of trust by which McCloskey's interest was, after this action was commenced, sold to the defendant Howell; but they do not affect the questions here involved.) Appellants contend that under these facts all rights of respondent under the mortgage were merged in the deed from McCloskey, and that he was bound by the constructive notice given by the recordation of the trust deed. Counsel for both sides have exercised great industry in presenting this case to the court, and they have argued it in their briefs with great learning and ability. If we do not notice in detail the many views which they have taken, and the numerous authorities which they have cited, it is not because we do not appreciate their efforts to aid the court, but because such a course would carry an opinion beyond reasonable length.

In our opinion the judgment should be affirmed. It will be noticed that the judgment in this case does not weaken any position which appellants were induced to take by any conduct of the respondent. It does not take away from them any money which they were induced to invest by any act or laches of respondent, nor does it lessen the value of any security which he in any way induced them to take. They did not acquire any lien after the mortgage had been marked "Satisfied," and were not led by a clear record to invest money in the land. They took the deed of trust while the mortgage was in full legal existence, recorded and unsatisfied, and with perfect understanding that it was a valid prior lien, and they are merely seeking to take an advantage offered by an inadvertence or mistake of respondent. This is what equity will not allow.

As to the question of merger, it must be remembered that, with respect to that subject, equity is not controlled by the rules of law. The case of Rumpp v. Gerkens, 59 Cal. 496, is very similar on this point to the case at bar. In that case, Rumpp brought suit to foreclose a mortgage executed to him by Gerkens, and Leonis was made a defendant, as claiming some interest in the land mortgaged. Leonis had a prior mortgage executed by Gerkens upon the same land, but he had taken a deed of the land from Gerkens upon his promise to discharge and cancel the mortgage. This was done, however, without any actual knowledge of the second mortgage to Rumpp. The court below decreed that the amount of the mortgage of Leonis should be first paid. Upon appeal here, plaintiff contended that the first mortgage had merged in the conveyance of the fee to Leonis, but this court affirmed the judgment. Thornton, J., in delivering the opinion of the court, said: "In law, a merger always takes place when a greater estate and a less coincide and meet in the same person, in one and the same right, without any intermediate estate. The lesser estate is said to be annihilated or merged in the greater. But a court of equity is not guided in this matter by the rules of law. It will sometimes hold a charge extinguished when it would continue to exist in law, and sometimes preserve it when at law it would be merged. The question is one of intention, actual or presumed, of the person in whom the interests are united." The same principle was applied to Brooks v. Rice, 56 Cal. 428. There are many other authorities to the same effect. We do not think, therefore, that in the case at bar the doctrine of merger can be successfully invoked by appellants.

We are satisfied that the rule of equitable subrogation was properly applied by the court below in this case. Without referring to foreign authorities, the case at bar is fully within the principle declared in Matzen v. Shaeffer, 65 Cal. 81, 3 Pac. 92; Rumpp v. Gerkens, supra; Swift v. Kraemer, 13 Cal. 526; Carpentier v. Brenham, 40 Cal. 221; Carr v. Caldwell, 10 Cal. 380; and Tolman v. Smith, 85 Cal. 280, 24 Pac. 743. In many of the cases cited by appellants the party seeking subrogation was a mere volunteer or intermeddler; but, in the case at bar, respondent was an original party to the transaction, and forced to the course taken by him in order to protect his own interests.

The fact that the deed of trust was recorded is of no value. In many of the cases cited by respondent, and particularly in Rumpp v. Gerkens and Brooks v. Rice, supra, the junior mortgage had been recorded. Respondent clearly intended that his payment of the mortgage should inure to his own benefit, and not to the benefit of appellants; and there is no equitable ground upon which appellants can object to it so inuring. They were not led astray by the payment of the prior mortgage, and are left in the exact position which they expected to occupy when the trust deed was taken. As was said by the supreme court of Oregon in Pearce v. Buell, 22 Or. 29, 29 Pac. 78 (a very interesting case on the subject): "The principle running through all cases of this class, says Barculo, J. (Barnes v. Camack, 1 Barb. 392), 'is that, when the legal rights of parties have been changed by mistake, equity restores them to their former conditions, when it can be done without interfering with any new rights acquired on the faith and strength of the altered condition of the legal rights, and without doing injustice to other persons.'"

It is contended that respondent should have offered to reconvey one-half of the land to McCloskey. This appeal is evidently prosecuted in the interests of appellants other than McCloskey; but the whole decree is based upon the theory that the mortgage is revived, and the half interest in the land considered as belonging to McCloskey, and his undivided half is decreed to be sold to satisfy one-half of the mortgage debt. This protects the rights of every party, and remits each to his original status. The judgment is affirmed.

We concur: DE HAVEN, J.; FITZGERALD, J.

LOS ANGELES NAT. BANK v. WALLACE et al. (No. 19,293.)

(Supreme Court of California. March 1, 1894.)

DRAFT—DEMAND OF PAYMENT—WAIVER.

1. Three persons arranged to plant an orange grove, one furnishing the money to another (who was to manage the business on a salary) on drafts drawn by him on, and accepted by, the third, who, with the first, furnished the trees; the profits, if any, to be divided equally. Held, that the payee of a draft so drawn and accepted cannot hold the drawer, without demand upon the acceptor at maturity, as the bill was, as between the parties, a debt due the firm by the acceptor.

2. A statement by the drawer of a bill, to the holder, that, owing to the failure of the person who was to furnish the money, the acceptor could not pay it, but that he would, not made within 10 days of maturity, is not such a statement that it would be dishonored as would excuse presentment and notice, under Civ. Code, § 3156.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; W. H. Clark, Judge.

Action by Los Angeles National Bank against J. Wiley Wallace and M. S. Babcock. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant Wallace appeals. Reversed.

Stephen M. White and Wm. D. Stephens (Ben Goodrich, of counsel), for appellant. M. T. Allen and J. A. Donnell, for respondent

TEMPLE, C. Babcock and one Collins owned some nursery stock, which included a large number of orange trees. Wallace was an experienced horticulturist. The three purchased from Baldwin 300 acres of land, believed to be well adapted to the growth of oranges. Nothing was paid on account of the purchase of the land; but it was conveyed to Babcock and Wallace, who gave a mortgage upon it to secure the purchase money. Collins was a banker, and did not wish to be known in the transaction. Therefore, everything was in the name of Babcock and Wallace. Babcock and Collins were to put into the enterprise their nursery stock. The orange trees for planting the land purchased were to come from it, and the balance of stock to be sold, and proceeds applied to the enterprise. Collins was to advance further money to pay expenses, to the extent of $35,000. Wallace was to manage the properties, and to receive a salary of $60 per month. It was thought that it would take six years, or perhaps longer, to realize sufficient profit from the orchard to pay the purchase money ($60,000), to repay Collins the advances made by him, and to pay Babcock and Collins for the nursery stock. Payments were to be in the order above recited. As Collins did not wish to be known in the transaction, it was arranged that the money to be advanced by him should be obtained in this way: Wallace was to draw upon Babcock, payable as convenient. Collins would then cause the bills to be guarantied, and, when due, paid by the California National Bank of San Diego, of which he was an officer. When the land had been paid for, and the advances made by Collins refunded, and the value of the nursery stock paid, the orange orchard was to be equally divided between the three parties. On the 7th day of September, 1891, Wallace drew two bills upon Babcock, payable on December 1st to the plaintiff. They were duly presented to Babcock for acceptance, were accepted, and payment guarantied by the San Diego Bank. Some three weeks before the maturity of the bills, it was understood that Collins and the bank which had guarantied the bills were both insolvent, and Wallace informed plaintiff's cashier that he did not think Babcock had any means, or would be able to pay, but that he (Wallace) had means, and would pay the bills. At maturity of the bills, it was fully known that Collins and the bank were insolvent, and for that reason the bills were not presented to Babcock when they should have been. Plaintiff's officers knew of the arrangement between the parties when it advanced the money. This suit was brought on the bills against Babcock and Wallace. Judgment passed against both, and Wallace appeals from the judgment, and from an order refusing him a new trial.

The bills not having been presented to Babcock for payment when they became due, nor within a reasonable time thereafter, Wallace contends that he cannot be held as drawer. In reply, respondent contends that Babcock, Collins, and Wallace were partners; that the bills of exchange were drawn by a partner upon a partner, in the business of the partnership, in pursuance of an arrangement among themselves. Therefore, the drawer was not released for want of presentation and notice of dishonor. In the case of a bill drawn by a partner upon the firm, or upon a partnership fund in the hands of another partner, notice of dishonor is not required, because notice to either partner is notice to the firm; because, too, in such case the bill is really drawn by the firm upon itself, and dishonored by itself. Want of due demand is a different matter. That demand shall be made at maturity is a condition of the contract between the drawer and the payee. If, however, the drawer is the debtor, and the bill was drawn for his accommodation, failure to make due demand will not release him, but he may recoup for any damage he may have suffered by failure to make a demand. The question, therefore, is whether the bill was drawn for the firm. Did it create an indebtedness on the part of the partnership? Would Wallace have had recourse upon any one in the case of due presentment, and a refusal to pay? It seems evident that he would have had such recourse against Collins, who had agreed to pay the bills so drawn. Nor was Wallace or the firm liable for the indebtedness thus created. It is true, provision was made for the repayment of advancements to be made by Collins. But this was contingent, and in no event was Wallace to be held personally liable for it. He had an interest in it, for unless the adventure were a success he would get nothing, and, if the speculation were a success, Collins would be repaid. But Wallace had no other interest in the property than the chance that there might be a profit. Further than that, the risk was entirely that of Collins and Babcock. It cannot be said, therefore, that Wallace was the debtor. As between the parties, Wallace was entitled to require Collins to pay the bill. As between them, the bill was upon an indebtedness due the firm from Collins. It was for the share which he was to contribute to the business of the firm. Had the bills been drawn simply to obtain money to meet the current expenses of the adventure, it may be conceded that all parties would have been liable, if Wallace had the requisite authority to draw the bills, but no such claim can here be made. The payee knew of the arrangement between the parties, and the purpose for which bills were drawn. It was not a trading partnership, in which it is presumed that one partner has authority to bind the others in this way. In fact, it was not contemplated by the parties that any such thing should be done. Wallace was merely to expend the funds provided by Babcock and Collins. He had no authority to incur indebtedness. Nor can his authority be increased by calling the relation a partnership. The parties fixed by contract their own rights and obligations. They did not call themselves partners. If it be essential to a partnership that one should have the power to bind all by drawing bills of exchange, then this was not a partnership, for Wallace had no such power. If the speculation did not prove a success, then Babcock and Wallace were to have no interest in the property. The fund from which Collins was to be repaid might never exist. If not, Collins would take the property. In either event the firm—if we so speak of it—would not be liable to Collins. Wallace and Babcock had an interest, no doubt, in having the money repaid, for if it were not they would get nothing, but this is not saying that they were debtors. I think, therefore, Wallace had a right to insist upon due demand and notice.

Respondent also contends that demand was excused because Wallace represented to its cashier that, owing to the failure of the bank, Babcock could not pay, but that he (Wallace) would. The representation was not equivalent to the statement that the bill would be dishonored; but, had it been, the information was not given within 10 days of the maturity of the bill. It would not, therefore, excuse presentment and notice. Civ. Code, § 3156. This section works a change in the law applicable to the subject, the reason for which I do not comprehend. If the demand was not made because the person entitled to insist upon it as a condition to his own liability prevented it by representing that it would be unavailing, it ought to be held a valid excuse, whether the representation were within 10 days, or any longer period, before the maturity of the bill. But we cannot overrule the express statute. I think the judgment and order should be reversed and a new trial had.

I concur: BELCHER, C.

MATHEWS et ux. v. DAVIS et al. (No. 18,253.)

Husband and Wife — Conveyance of Wife's Property — Validity — Homestead — Conveyance—Specific Performance.

1. Under Civ. Code, § 1093, providing that no estate in a married woman's lands shall pass except by instrument duly acknowledged by her, specific performance of her unacknowledged executory agreement to convey her land cannot be enforced. Jackson v. Torrence, 23 Pac. 695, 83 Cal. 521, followed.

2. Under Civ. Code, § 1242, providing that a married woman's homestead cannot be conveyed unless the deed of conveyance be executed and acknowledged by both husband and wife, an agreement executed by husband and wife to convey the homestead is invalid without their acknowledgment.

3. The fact that the husband and wife executed, acknowledged, and tendered a deed cannot avail the grantee, to compel a conveyance of the property, he having refused payment when the deed was tendered him, and many years having elapsed since the deed was tendered, during which time several thousand dollars were expended in improving the property.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, San Joaquin county; Ansel Smith, Judge.

Action by H. O. Mathews and wife against John T. Davis and another. There was judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant Eltinge appeals. Affirmed.

Daniel Titus, for appellant. John B. Hall and Scrivner & Schell, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. This action is brought by H. O. Mathews and Mary H. Mathews, his wife, to quiet their title; to obtain a decree that a certain agreement is a cloud upon their title to a lot of land by them owned and possessed, situate and being in the city of Stockton, county of San Joaquin; and to cancel and annul such agreement. Plaintiffs had a decree as prayed for, from which, and from an order denying a motion for a new trial, the defendant Josephine Eltinge appeals.

The facts, as found by the court, are not assailed, for want of evidence in their support, by the brief of appellant. They are too lengthy to be reproduced here, but may be epitomized thus: (1) Plaintiffs are, and since a date prior to July 16, 1875, have been, husband and wife, and have resided upon, owned, and occupied the land described in the complaint. (2) On the 16th day of July, 1875, the plaintiffs made their declaration of homestead, in due form, as by law required, acknowledged, filed, and had the same recorded; have never abandoned, and still retain, the same, as a homestead. (3) On the 1st day of August, 1878, plaintiffs and J. T. Davis, one of the defendants, and who made default herein, signed and delivered to said Davis an agreement which recited that Josie Davis (now Josie Eltinge), the daughter of defendant Davis, was in the care and custody of plaintiffs; that they had no children of their own, and entertained for her the affection of parents for a child, and have intended that their property shall, upon the death of the last of them, inure to her benefit; and whereas the property described in the complaint was subject to a mortgage of about $3,500,—in consideration of all of which, and of a promissory note made to them by John T. Davis for $3,500, payable to them on or before September 12, 1878, to enable them, with said amount, to remove the lien upon their property, the plaintiffs agreed that, upon the payment of said promissory note according to its terms, they would execute and deliver to said Josie Davis a deed, to take effect and become absolute upon the death of the survivor of the plaintiffs, until which time plaintiffs, or the survivor of them, were or was to have possession, control, and use of the property, and were to keep the same in repair, etc. If the property came to the possession and ownership of Josie Davis during the lifetime of her father, John T. Davis, she was not to have the right or power of alienation without his consent and joinder in the same. (4) The foregoing agreement was not acknowledged or certified so as to entitle it to record by plaintiffs, or either of them, but was acknowledged and recorded by Davis on the 13th day of April, 1892. (5) Davis made and delivered his promissory note, as specified in the agreement, but on or about the 6th day of August, 1878, and before the note became due, he repudiated the whole agreement, so notified the plaintiffs, and demanded a return of the note. (6) Davis has never retracted his notice to plaintiffs, has never paid the note, or complied with any part of the agreement. (7) Defendant Josie Eltinge, the defendant herein, is the Josie Davis mentioned in the agreement. (8) Neither of the defendants demanded the deed or conveyance from plaintiffs to Josie Davis until May 3, 1892, when they made such demand. (9) The real property has enhanced in value since August, 1878, and is now worth $20,000, as against $5,000 at said date. (10) Plaintiffs have paid all taxes on the property, and have expended thereon more than $10,000. (11) Plaintiffs have suffered detriment by the failure of Davis to pay the note. (12) In 1879 plaintiffs obtained a judgment against John T. Davis on said note, issued execution, which was levied upon certain wheat, the property of one Vancil, the wheat sold, and the execution returned satisfied. No property of defendant Davis was ever levied upon, and none was taken from his possession. (13, 14, 15, 16) On the 7th day of October, 1878, plaintiffs executed a deed, as provided for in the agreement; placed it in the hands of A. Hewel, who had guarantied their compliance with the agreement, for the sole purpose of having a tender made, with demand of payment of the note, all of which was done by Hewel. Davis never offered to pay the note, or demanded a deed. It was subsequent to such tender that the action was brought on the note. (17, 18) After the tender of the deed, demand of payment of the note, and refusal, Hewel had no authority to deliver the deed. (19) In 1892 Charles S. Eltinge, representing himself as the husband of defendant Eltinge, demanded the deed of Hewel, which demand was refused. The findings further show: That the real estate in question, before it became a homestead, was the separate property of Mary H. Mathews, and was never community property. That a prominent object of plaintiffs, in entering into the agreement, was to clear their homestead from the lien thereon, which, by the refusal of Davis to pay the note, they were not only prevented from doing, but, by the litigation which followed, they were involved in costs to the amount of $5,000. That the agreement was not mutually beneficial to the parties, and was of no benefit, but the occasion of loss and injury, to them, etc. That defendant Davis did not make the agreement or note in good faith, and never at any time intended to perform or pay the same. That defendant Eltinge had notice of the facts connected with the suit upon the note, and the result thereof, about the time they occurred, etc.

Defendant Eltinge, in her cross complaint filed by leave of the court, asks that the deed executed by plaintiffs, and tendered by them at the date of the demand of payment of the promissory note, be decreed to be delivered to her, etc. As defendant John T. Davis made default, plaintiffs were entitled to a decree, as against him; and the only question involved is as to the right of defendant Josie Eltinge to the relief demanded in her cross complaint. The property in question being the separate property of Mary H. Mathews, and a homestead, under the laws of the state of California, at the date of the agreement signed by them, in 1878, and that agreement not having been acknowledged by them, or by either of them, we fail to see how it can be specifically enforced.

1. "No estate in the real property of a married woman passes by any grant purporting to be executed or acknowledged by her, unless the grant or instrument is acknowledged by her in the manner prescribed by sections 1186 and 1191." Civ. Code, § 1093. A married woman can only be divested of her estate in the manner prescribed by statute; and, under the requirements of the statute, the acknowledgment by her is an essential part of the execution of the conveyance, without which it has no validity. Leonis v. Lazzarovich, 55 Cal. 52, and cases there cited. In Jackson v. Torrence, 83 Cal. 521, 23 Pac. 695, we held "that specific performance of the unacknowledged executory contract of a married woman to convey her real property cannot be compelled." The reasoning of that case is conclusive here. Banbury v. Arnold, 91 Cal. 606, 27 Pac. 934; Carlton v. Williams, 77 Cal. 89, 19 Pac. 185.

2. Like considerations apply to the agreement in its relation to the homestead of the parties. "The homestead of a married woman cannot be conveyed or incumbered, unless the instrument by which it is conveyed or incumbered is executed and acknowledged by both husband and wife." Civ. Code, § 1242. The homestead can only be conveyed in the mode prescribed by the statute. Flege v. Garvey, 47 Cal. 371. The husband, alone, cannot sell it. The husband and wife, jointly, can only convey it by an instrument executed and acknowledged by both husband and wife. The agreement of plaintiffs to convey the homestead, as a basis upon which to decree a specific performance of the contract, was invalid without an acknowledgment of the parties. The contention that the plaintiffs in fact executed, acknowledged, and tendered a deed in 1878 cannot avail the appellant. It may well be that, although their contract to convey was invalid, they were willing to execute it in 1878; but, when payment was refused, it does not follow that after a lapse of 12 to 14 years, during which time, as appears, they had expended many thousand dollars in improvements upon the premises, they should be compelled to convey the property. The specific performance of contracts to convey real property will not be decreed, even upon a valid agreement, where, upon all the equities presented, such decree would be promotive of injustice; and there is much in the findings of the court going to indicate that the decree here should be denied, irrespective of the invalidity of the agreement, and the parties left to assert their rights, if any they have, at law. These views are conclusive of the case, and the errors complained of in the admission and rejection of evidence, conceding them to be well founded, cannot change the result. Upon the undisputed facts, we are of opinion the judgment and order appealed from should be affirmed, and it is so ordered.

BUCKLEY v. SUPERIOR COURT OF SAN FRANCISCO COUNTY. (No. 15,555.)

PROBATE COURTS—JURISDICTION—PARTITION.

1. A partition of property of which deceased was a tenant in common cannot be made by the probate court, as the subject-matter of its jurisdiction is the property of the deceased only, and this cannot be extended even by consent.

2. In order that a probate court under Code Civ. Proc. § 1675 et seq., may have jurisdiction to make a partition of deceased's property after the decree of distribution, the petition for the partition must have been filed before the decree.

In bank.

Petition by one Buckley for a writ of prohibition against the superior court of San Francisco county. Writ granted.

Freeman & Bates, for applicant. Blake, Williams & Harrison, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. This is an application for a writ of prohibition commanding respondent to refrain from further proceedings in the estate of Catherine M. A. Buckley, deceased, respecting the partition of certain real estate. The petition shows that, at the time of her death, C. M. A. Buckley was the owner of undivided interests in certain real property situated in the counties of Napa, Marin, and San Francisco; that on May 12, 1893, the final account of the executor was allowed and approved; that on the same day the decree of final distribution of the estate was entered, distributing one-half of the interest of decedent to Vincent P. Buckley, and the remaining one-half interest to E. J., Paul K., and Margaret G. Buckley. No petition for the partition of the estate of the decedent had been filed by any person at the time when the order of distribution was made, nor at any time prior to June 17, 1893. On the day last named, Vincent P. Buckley presented a petition praying that commissioners be appointed to make a partition of all the estate of decedent, including said undivided interests. Thereafter, August 30, 1893, the court made an order directing that partition of the estate be made among said persons entitled thereto in proportion to their respective rights, and that William E. White, Martin J. Burke, and Frank W. Lawlor be appointed commissioners to make the partition.

It is claimed by petitioner that the court below did not have jurisdiction in the proceedings sought to be prohibited—First, because the proceeding is for the partition in probate of property of which the decedent was a tenant in common; and, second, because jurisdiction cannot exist in any case to make partition in probate proceedings, unless the petition therefor is filed before the entry of the final decree of distribution. We see no escape from the conclusions contended for by the petitioner. Proceedings for the administration of the estates of deceased persons, and for their distribution, are purely statutory. The court, while sitting as a court of probate, has no other powers than those given to it by the statute, and such incidental powers as pertain to it for the purpose of enabling it to exercise the jurisdiction which is conferred upon it. It has no power to determine disputes between heirs or devisees and strangers as to the title to property. Smith v. Westerfield, 88 Cal. 378, 26 Pac. 206; In re Haas, 97 Cal. 232, 31 Pac. 893. Section 1675, Code Civ. Proc., conferring upon the probate department of the superior court power to partition estates held in common and undivided, applies only to cases before the court in which it is possible to set aside property to be held in severalty. Partition necessarily results in the termination of the cotenancy, and vests in each person a sole estate in a specific purparty or allotment of the lands; but here any one of the parcels which may be set aside to the minor heirs could not be finally held in severalty, under the decree, because of the title of the other cotenants not before the court. Another partition would follow, which might result in setting aside to the cotenants not now before the court the same land which the probate court had set aside to the minors. That partition cannot be made in probate unless the interest of the decedent is an estate in severalty we think is clear. Richardson v. Loupe, 80 Cal. 496, 22 Pac. 227. The subject-matter of the jurisdiction is the property of the deceased only, and this jurisdiction cannot be extended, even by the consent of all parties interested in the property. The probate court is authorized to make partition only in certain cases of joint tenure. Its action must be confined to a single estate. Under statutes like ours, partition is had only because the land was the property of the decedent, not because it is the land of heirs. The fact that jurisdiction of all undivided interests of a decedent is given does not evince a purpose to intrust the court with the power to make partition or allotment of property in which strangers have an interest. Snyder's Appeal, 36 Pa. St. 168. See, also, In re Walker, 136 N. Y. 28, 32 N. E. 633; Romig's Appeal, 8 Watts, 415. The cotenants not before the court could not be affected by the partition. Section 1686, Code Civ. Proc., makes the decree binding only "on all parties interested in the estate." The court may recognize the interests of grantees of the heirs or devisees, and the simple fact that the Code (section 1678) makes special provision for such grantees indicates that it was not intended to extend the rule any further. Sections 1676 and 1683 require that notice be given to all parties interested residing in the state before the commissioners are appointed, or partition is ordered, stating the time and place where the commissioners will proceed to make the partition; but the probate court can inquire only as to who are parties in interest claiming under the decedent, and whether the proper notice has been given to them. As it has no jurisdiction of any one except those interested in the estate, it is clear that it cannot determine whether proper notice has been given to the latter, or bring them within its jurisdiction. The authorities cited by counsel for respondent, we think, do not sustain his contention. Brennan v. Hill, which is reported in Gates v. Irick, 2 Rich. Law, 599, note, was decided upon the provisions of the acts of 1824 and 1839, referred to in the opinion, and the court said that these acts were intended "to save the delay and expense to these proceedings in equity by giving to the judges of the courts of ordinary jurisdiction to make partition of the real estates of deceased persons, by sale or division, in certain cases. * * * When a judge of the court of equity was required incidentally to decide upon questions of title, he, according to his discretion, determined for himself, or sent an issue to be tried at law. The act of 1824 transferred cases of a limited amount, within this branch of equity jurisdiction, to the courts of ordinary, thus making them, as to such matters, inferior courts of equity; and, by the right of appeal to the court of common pleas, a trial by jury was saved to any party who desired it." No such intention on the part of the legislature is manifested in our statutes. In Earl v. Rowe, 35 Me. 421, it appears that the statute authorized partition after settlement The parties were all heirs or devisees.

2. Section 1666, Code Civ. Proc., provides that in the decree of distribution the court must name the persons, and the proportions or parts to which each shall be entitled, and that such decree is conclusive; subject only to be reversed, set aside, or modified on appeal. Ordinarily, after the entry of this decree the court has no power over the property or the rights of the distributees (Wheeler v. Bolton, 54 Cal. 302), and courts of equity alone can afford relief. Estate of Hudson, 63 Cal. 454. Sections 1675 and 1676, Code Civ. Proc., however, provide for an exception, viz.: that when the estate assigned by the decree to two or more heirs, devisees, or legatees is common, and the respective shares are not separated, partition may be made by three disinterested persons. The partition can be ordered on the petition of any person interested in the estate, but said petition must be filed, and the attorneys, guardians, and agents representing absent parties must be appointed, and notice given, before the order or decree of distribution is made. It is claimed by counsel for respondent that the section as to time is merely permissive. It says the petition may be filed and notice given at any time before the decree, but we think the intention was that it must be filed before the decree of distribution. There is every reason for so holding. As stated before, ordinarily the court loses jurisdiction over the property after the entry of the decree of distribution, except to compel delivery. The section gives to the court the power to reserve its jurisdiction to proceed beyond the making of the decree. For this purpose the parties in interest must be kept before the court, and must be given an opportunity to protect themselves in the proceedings looking to a division of their property. If a petition may be filed at any time after the decree of distribution is entered, how are the parties to have notice of the intended proceedings? Must they watch the record for years at their peril? The notice required by section 1676 is confined to "all persons interested who reside in this state, or to their guardians, and to the agents, attorneys or guardians if any, in this state, of such as reside out of this state." Every one interested in the settlement of an estate is supposed to be before the court, and to take notice its proceedings, but, when the estate has been settled and the interests of all parties have been ascertained by the decree of distribution, and the property has been set over to them absolutely and unconditionally, without any previous proceedings indicating an intention to divide the property, the jurisdiction of the court is exhausted. We think that the court below ought not to proceed any further towards the partitioning of the undivided interests described in the affidavit filed herein. The rights of the parties should be settled by a suit for partition, in which all persons having any interest in the lands may be made parties, and in which the commissioners will not be required to divide the property in each county separately, as they would have to do under section 1677. It is ordered that the writ issue as prayed for.

BEATTY, C. J., being disqualified, did not participate in the foregoing decision.

SPIEKER v. LASH et al. (No. 18,195.)

TRADE-MARK — WHAT THE SUBJECT OF — INJUNCTION — SALE OF GOOD WILL.

1. Though the words "Kidney and Liver Bitters" are not the subject of a trade-mark, being merely descriptive, yet the name of the maker, and every device in the form and contents of a label and wrapper to denote that the goods are made by him, are proper subjects.

2. The label issued by L. & Co., manufacturers of a medicine, and filed with the secretary of state, indicated that the firm was the manufacturer and seller of the medicine, and stated that "none was genuine without the fac simile signature, L. & Co." L. transferred all his rights to his partner, and afterwards formed a partnership with his wife under the same name as the former firm, for the purpose of selling similar medicine. Held, that he might be enjoined from the use of any label indicating that such medicine was prepared and sold by L. & Co., or that L. was the original compounder of it.

3. Where a partnership, manufacturer of a medicine, is not a patentee thereof, one partner, who sells his interest to the other, cannot be restrained from manufacturing and selling similar medicine.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Sacramento county; W. C. Van Fleet, Judge.

Action by J. J. Spieker against T. M. Lash and others. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Judgment modified.

A. L. Hart and C. H. Oatman, for appellants. Johnson, Johnson & Johnson, for respondent.

VANCLIEF, C. Suit in equity to enjoin the infringement of a trade-mark and the diversion of the trade or custom of the plaintiff, to whom was transferred the good will of the business in which the trade-mark had been acquired and used. The complaint contains two counts, the first alleging an infringement of plaintiff's trade-mark and proprietary name, "Lash's Kidney and Liver Bitters," and the second, a cause of action for breach of warranty implied in a sale of the good will of the business, which included the manufacture and sale of said bitters. In the year 1884 the plaintiff and defendant formed a partnership at Sacramento under the firm name of T. M. Lash & Co., in the purchase and sale of drugs and medicines, and the manufacture and sale of medicinal preparations. In 1886 they made up a formula for a medicinal preparation of bitters, principally intended to benefit the kidneys and liver, and gave it the name "Lash's Kidney and Liver Bitters," and thereafter the partnership of T. M. Lash & Co. built up a large and profitable business in the manufacture and sale of that preparation. The preparation was not patented, but the firm registered a trade-mark thereof in the office of the secretary of state. In carrying on the business of the firm, Spieker remained at the store and attended to the business of manufacturing and filling orders for the bitters, while Lash traveled over the country, advertising the bitters and securing orders therefor. On November 9, 1889, the firm of T. M. Lash & Co. was dissolved by consent of the partners, and all the interest of Lash in the property of the firm was transferred by him to Spieker. It is alleged in the complaint and admitted by the answer, and found as a fact by the court, that this transfer included the good will of the business. On October 31, 1889, T. M. Lash and his wife, Jennie Lash, transferred to Spieker the trade-mark of "Lash's Kidney and Liver Bitters," together with the right to use the same, and covenanted to warrant and defend the same. In July, 1890, T. M. Lash commenced, at Sacramento, to manufacture a preparation similar to Lash's Kidney and Liver Bitters, which he called "Dr. Web's Liver and Kidney Bitters," and soon afterwards formed a partnership with his wife under the name "T. M. Lash & Co." for the purpose of manufacturing and selling the same. On the back label of this preparation he thereafter described himself as "T. M. Lash, Manufacturer of Dr. Web's, the Only Genuine Liver and Kidney Bitters," and notified the public to address all orders, "T. M. Lash & Co., Proprietors, 923 K Street, Sacramento, Cal." The court found, substantially, that the defendant began the manufacture and sale of Web's Bitters with intent to injure the plaintiff's business, and to detract from the reputation of Lash's Kidney and Liver Bitters; that the preparations are very similar, and composed mainly of the same ingredients, and that Web's Bitters, sold in the name of T. M. Lash & Co., were put up in bottles closely resembling the bottles in which plaintiff was accustomed to put up Lash's Kidney and Liver Bitters, and that defendant placed upon the bottles containing Web's Bitters labels which, in size and general appearance, very nearly resemble the labels placed by plaintiff on the bottles containing said Lash's Bitters; that by these acts the defendants intentionally deceived the general public into the belief that the manufacture of the original Lash's Kidney and Liver Bitters had been superseded by the same preparation under the name of "Web's, the Only Genuine Liver and Kidney Bitters," manufactured by T. M. Lash and sold by T. M. Lash & Co.; that defendants, with intent to injure the good will of plaintiff's business, and to prevent the sale of Lash's Kidney and Liver Bitters, as manufactured and sold by plaintiff, and to induce the customers of plaintiff and of the former firm of T. M. Lash & Co. to patronize them under the same firm name, formed a pretended partnership under that name, and sought to supplant the Lash Bitters manufactured by plaintiff with the Web's Bitters manufactured by T. M. Lash, and sold in the firm name of T. M. Lash & Co. to the patrons and customers of plaintiff, and sought to exchange Web's Bitters for Lash's Bitters, and to induce the public to believe that Web's Bitters was the only genuine Kidney and Liver Bitters, and have thereby intentionally drawn off from plaintiff to themselves a large number of plaintiff's patrons and customers.

The judgment of the court was in favor of plaintiff, enjoining the defendants as prayed for in the complaint; and defendants have appealed from the judgment, and from an order denying their motion for a new trial. While it is true that the words "Kidney and Liver Bitters" are merely descriptive of the thing manufactured, and therefore not the proper subject of a trade-mark, yet the name of the maker, and every device in the form and contents of a label or wrapper affixed to denote that goods are manufactured, produced, compounded, or sold by him, other than a name, word, or expression denoting that the goods are of some particular class or description, are proper subjects of a trade-mark; and any person may secure the exclusive right to the use of such trade mark or name by filing with the secretary of state his claim to the same, and otherwise complying with section 3197 of the Political Code; and, when the claimant has thus secured a trade mark or name, he may transfer the same, and the right to the exclusive use thereof, to another, and the property right so transferred will be protected from infringement by injunction. Id. § 3199.

The label filed with the secretary of state by the original firm of T. M. Lash & Co. clearly indicated that that firm was the proprietor, manufacturer, and seller of a medicinal preparation named "Lash's Kidney and Liver Bitters," which was described as compounded from the bark rhamnus purshianus, for use as a mild cathartic and regulator of the stomach, bowels, and liver, and as "helpful in all affections of kidneys and liver," and as sold by them for the price of $1 per bottle, and stated that "none is genuine without the fac simile signature, 'T. M. Lash & Co.'" Both the front and the back labels, while containing words which could not have been exclusively appropriated as a trade-mark, yet contained characteristics and devices indicative of original manufacture, compounding, and sale of the preparation by T. M. Lash & Co. The exclusive use of these labels, in so far as thus indicative, became the property of the original firm of T. M. Lash & Co., subject to transfer as personal property by the express terms of the statute; and the defendants, T. M. Lash and wife, expressly transferred all their rights in that trade-mark to the plaintiff, and, therefore, may properly be enjoined from the use of any label which indicates that medicine of the same nature is prepared and compounded or sold by T. M. Lash & Co., or that Lash is the original author or compounder of it. Schmidt v. Brieg (Cal.) 35 Pac. 623. And, apart from the infringement of a valid trade-mark, as said by this court in Schmidt v. Brieg: "A competing business firm is bound to deal fairly in placing its rival article upon the market; and if it clearly appears that the defendant has closely imitated the plaintiff's labels and style, and has done obvious damage to the latter's business through the unlawful business methods employed, the plaintiff is entitled to relief upon the ground of fraud. Sperry v. Milling Co., 81 Cal. 258, 22 Pac. 651; Pierce v. Guittard, 68 Cal. 68, 8 Pac. 645. Cases are not wanting of injunctions issued to restrain the use even of one's own name, where such use is made with such additions as to intentionally deceive the public, and make them believe he is selling the goods of another. McLean v. Fleming, 96 U. S. 251; Chemical Co. v. Meyer, 139 U. S. 542, 11 Sup. Ct. 625. See, also, Food Co. v. Baumbach, 32 Fed. 212; California Fig Syrup Co. v. Improved Fig Syrup Co., 51 Fed. 297; Stone Co. v. Wallace, 52 Fed. 438." It would seem, a fortiori, that the improper use of one's own name may be enjoined where, for a valuable consideration, he has voluntarily sold a trademark of which his name forms an essential part, and the good will of a partnership business wherein his own name was the leading and characteristic designation of the firm, as in this case. The evidence shows that the defendants' labels, while differing in some respects from those of the plaintiff, are a colorable imitation of them, the resemblance being such as to justify the conclusion that they were intended and adapted to lead the public generally to the belief that the manufacture of the original Lash's Kidney and Liver Bitters had been superseded by the same preparation under the name of "Web's, the Only Genuine Liver and Kidney Bitters," manufactured by T. M. Lash, and sold by T. M. Lash & Co. The evidence fully sustains the finding to the effect that defendants intended and endeavored to injure the plaintiff's business, and had effected that purpose by drawing off from plaintiff to themselves a large number of plaintiff's patrons and customers, and the facts found warrant equitable relief.

But the injunction as granted is too broad. The plaintiff is not a patentee of the preparation manufactured and sold by him, and defendants cannot be enjoined from the manufacture and sale of that or any similar preparation.

I think the order denying a new trial should be affirmed, but that the perpetual injunction granted by the judgment should be modified by striking out the words, "and from manufacturing and selling the said 'Dr. Web's, the Only Genuine Liver and Kidney Bitters,'" and inserting in lieu thereof the following: "And from using the name 'T. M. Lash,' or 'T. M. Lash & Co.,' to designate the business of manufacturing or selling any liver and kidney, or kidney and liver, bitters, and from any infringement of the trade-mark of 'Lash's Kidney and Liver Bitters,' and from any imitation of the form or appearance of the labels used by the plaintiff upon bottles in which he stores or sells Lash's Kidney and Liver Bitters"—and that in all other respects the judgment should be affirmed. Costs of appeal to be taxed to respondent.

We concur: SEARLS, C.; HAYNES, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the order denying a new trial is affirmed; the judgment is modified as indicated in the opinion, and, as so modified, is affirmed. Costs of appeal taxed to respondent.

GREGORY et al. v. GREGORY et al. (No. 18,154.)

ADVERSE POSSESSION — TENANTS IN COMMON — AGREED CASE—APPEAL — EFFECT—MOTION FOR NEW TRIAL—JUDGMENT ROLL.

1. Where one tenant in common enters into possession of the property under color of title, and remains in possession, exercising acts of ownership, openly and notoriously, claiming the same adversely to all the world, and paying all the taxes, his possession is sufficient notice to the other tenants to put the statute of limitation in motion. In re Grider, 22 Pac. 908, 81 Cal. 571, distinguished.

2. An appeal from an unappealable order does not stay proceedings, and deprive the court of power to hear other motions.

3. Where a case is submitted on an agreed statement, a finding of facts by the court is unnecessary.

4. An order denying a motion for a new trial cannot be reviewed on appeal, where the case was submitted under an agreed statement of facts, as a new trial is an examination of an issue of fact.

5. Where the agreed statement of facts is set out in the record, and the judgment recites that a statement of facts was submitted by the parties, and that the court files its decision based thereon, the statement may be considered a part of the judgment roll.

6. Where the judgment roll does not show when the action was commenced, but the brief of one of the parties states, without contradiction by the other, that it was commenced at a certain time, the statement will be considered as true.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Placer county; W. H. Grant, Judge.

Action by James W. Gregory and others against John H. Gregory and others. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

James Gartlan, for appellants. Tuttle & Tuttle, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. This is an action to quiet the plaintiffs' title to an undivided four-fifths interest in certain real property situate in the county of Placer. The case was submitted to the court below for decision upon an agreed statement of facts, from which the court drew certain conclusions of law, and, in accordance therewith, rendered judgment in favor of the defendants. From this judgment, and an order denying their motion for a new trial, the plaintiffs appeal.

1. After the judgment was entered the plaintiffs moved the court to set it aside, upon the ground that findings had not been waived, and there were no findings of fact to support it. This motion was denied, and the plaintiffs appealed from the order. Appellants now contend that, after that appeal was perfected, it stayed all further proceedings in the court below, and, therefore, that court had no power to hear and deny the plaintiffs' motion for new trial. A sufficient answer to this contention is that on March 9, 1893, the appeal referred to was dismissed by this court upon the ground that the order appealed from was not an appealable order. 32 Pac. 531.

2. Appellants also contend that the judgment should be reversed because findings of fact were not waived, and none were filed by the court below. This contention cannot be sustained. The agreed statement covered all the facts of the case, and, if findings had been made, they would have been simply a restatement of facts already agreed upon, and about which there was no controversy. But it is well settled that findings are never necessary upon questions about which there is no dispute. For example, findings are not necessary where the allegations of the complaint are not denied, or as to facts admitted by the pleadings. Pomeroy v. Gregory, 66 Cal. 572, 6 Pac. 492, 493; Taylor v. Railroad Co., 67 Cal. 615, 8 Pac. 436. And, where a finding made is conclusive against the right of the plaintiff to recover, findings upon other issues are unnecessary to support the judgment against him. Dyer v. Brogan, 70 Cal. 136, 11 Pac. 589. So a judgment will not be reversed, for want of a finding upon a particular issue, where it is apparent that the omission in no way prejudiced the appellant. Murphy v. Bennett, 68 Cal. 528, 9 Pac. 738. So an issue raised by a defense upon which no evidence is offered at the trial, and no finding made, is deemed immaterial, and the judgment will not be reversed for want of a finding. Senter v. Senter, 70 Cal. 619, 11 Pac. 782; Himmelman v. Henry, 84 Cal. 104, 23 Pac. 1098; Rogers v. Duff, 97 Cal. 66, 31 Pac. 836.

3. The order denying the plaintiffs' motion for new trial cannot be reviewed here on appeal, for two reasons: (1) A new trial is a re-examination of an issue of fact in the same court. Code Civ. Proc. § 656. In this case, as all the facts were agreed upon, there was no issue of fact to be re-examined, the only question being as to what was the law applicable to those facts. (2) The statement contains no specifications of the particulars in which the evidence was insufficient to justify the decision, or of any errors in law occurring at the trial.

4. The only remaining question to be considered is, does the agreed statement of facts support the judgment? Objection is made that the statement does not constitute a part of the judgment roll; but it is set out in full in the record, and the judgment recites that: "This cause came on regularly to be heard. * * * And the respective parties thereto having stipulated that an agreed statement of all the facts of the said action would be by them submitted to the court for its decision, and the same having been thereafter * * * regularly filed, and submitted to the court for consideration and its decision, and after due deliberation thereon, the court files its decision and conclusions of law, based upon said agreed statement, in writing, and orders that judgment be entered herein in favor of defendants, in accordance therewith." Under these circumstances, we think the statement may be considered, whether it in fact constitutes a part of the judgment roll or not.

One of the defenses interposed by the answer is that the cause of action was barred by the statute of limitations; and as to this the court found, as a conclusion of law: "That defendants have acquired full and perfect title to said land, and to the respective portions thereof hereinbefore mentioned, under and by virtue of the statute of limitations." The record does not show when this action was commenced, but a second amended complaint was filed May 22, 1891, and it is stated in the brief for respondents that the original complaint was filed in 1891. This statement is not denied in the reply brief for appellants, and we shall therefore accept it as true. It would subserve no useful purpose to set out the facts agreed upon at length. It appears therefrom that as early as 1877 the appellants were all of age, and were then, and ever since have been, residents of this state. It also appears that the respondents and their predecessors in interest entered into the actual possession of the parcels of land respectively claimed by them under claim and color of title, and thereafter continued to maintain such possession, and to exercise acts of ownership over the said parcels, openly and notoriously, claiming the same adversely to the plaintiffs and all the world, and paying all taxes assessed thereon, for more than five years before this action was commenced. Under the circumstances shown, we think the possession so taken and held was sufficient to give the appellants notice of respondents' adverse claims, and to put the statute of limitations in motion in their favor, though appellants were owners of interests in the said lands as tenants in common with respondents. In support of their contention that their rights were not barred by the statute, appellants rely mainly upon the case of In re Grider, 81 Cal. 571, 22 Pac. 908. That case is clearly distinguishable from this. In that case the proceeding was inaugurated in the superior court, sitting in probate, for the distribution of an estate, the administration of which had never been closed. It was held that, so long as the administration of an estate remains unclosed, the successor in interest of one of the distributees, who enters into possession of land under a decree of partial distribution, cannot acquire title by limitation or adverse possession, as against those who are legally entitled to claim an interest in the land as tenants in common, though he claims title to the whole of the land, and pays all taxes thereon, and also that a tenant in common cannot show title by adverse possession against his cotenant, in a case where such title is possible, without bringing himself within the rule that notice of his adverse claim must be brought home, actually or constructively, to the cotenant. And it was said that the party claiming adversely in that case had not brought himself within the rule declared. In this case, under orders of the probate court, a part of the land in controversy was sold, the sale approved, and a deed therefor executed to the purchaser. The deed was thereupon recorded, and under it the purchaser took possession of the property, and thereafter held and claimed the same adversely. The balance of the land was distributed by the court, by decrees regular on their face, to two of the respondents, who, under the decrees, entered into the possession of the same, and thereafter they and their grantees held and claimed it adversely; and here the facts were quite sufficient to bring the case within the rule declared in the Grider Case as to adverse possession by one tenant in common against his cotenant. It results that the court below did not err in its conclusion of law, and that the judgment and order must be affirmed. So ordered.

HOLBROOKE v. HARRINGTON. (No. 18,198.)

MINING CLAIMS—TENANTS IN COMMON—ACCOUNTING—APPEAL—HARMLESS ERROR.

1. One tenant in common of a mining claim is bound to contribute his proportion of the value of the yearly work required to be done thereon to perfect title, and performed by his cotenant, unless he abandons his interest in the unpatented claim, or offers to perform the work.

2. Where, in partition by one tenant in common of a mining claim, on an accounting for money spent upon the land in excess of her share, no personal judgment is rendered against the other tenant, but the property is ordered to be sold, plaintiff should be allowed the full amount of the sums properly paid out, instead of only one-half, before the residue is divided.

3. Where, in such an action, the amount allowed is less than plaintiff is entitled to, being for one-half the amount paid out, error in allowing improper credits is harmless.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Nevada county; John Caldwell, Judge.

Action by Ellen E. Holbrooke against Caleb Harrington. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

J. M. Walling, for appellant. P. F. Simonds, for respondent.

VANCLIEF, C. Action for partition of a tract of placer mineral land containing about 25½ acres, situate in Nevada county, in which the plaintiff and defendant are tenants in common, in equal portions, and for an accounting as to expenditures by plaintiff upon and for the benefit of the land, in excess of her share. It appears that prior to the year 1883 the land was owned and mined in equal shares by defendant and the husband of plaintiff, Daniel P. Holbrooke; that upon the death of Daniel P. Holbrooke, in 1883, his share and interest in the land descended to plaintiff, as his only heir, and was afterwards distributed to her by the probate court. And there is no question that she and defendant have been tenants in common, as aforesaid, since the death of her husband, though the defendant denied that they were ever partners in the working or mining of the land; nor does it appear that defendant opposed a partition. The only questions presented here relate to the accounting. The court found that it was impracticable to partition the land by metes and bounds. and therefore ordered a sale thereof. The court found that plaintiff had expended "in acquiring the title to said premises, and in necessary expenditures for taxes and annual labor and improvement on said claim since March 1, 1883, the sum of $1,005.75, and defendant no sum whatever, and that defendant refuses to repay to plaintiff any portion of said sum of $1,005.75 so expended by her, or to account to her for any portion thereof.' In the order of sale the court directed the proceeds of the sale to be applied as follows: "(1) To the payment of the costs and expenses of said sale and of this action, including attorney's fees allowed. (2) That there next be paid to said plaintiff, out of the proceeds of said sale, the sum of $502.85; being one-half of said sum of $1,005.75 paid by said plaintiff as aforesaid, in acquiring the title to said premises, and in necessary expenditures for taxes and annual labor and improvements on said claims. (3) That the rest and residue of the proceeds of said sale be divided equally between plaintiff and defendant." The defendant appeals from the judgment, and from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

There seems to be no merit in the appeal, though appellant claims a reversal of the judgment on two grounds:

1. It is contended that "the judgment is against law," because, it is said, the sum of $502.85 allowed to plaintiff from the proceeds of the sale improperly includes $200 for annual labor done by plaintiff on the unpatented portion (10 acres) of the land for the years 1890 and 1891. The evidence, without conflict, shows that plaintiff did the annual labor required by the laws of the United States—$100 a year—for each of the nine years immediately preceding the commencement of this action, amounting to $900, and is amply sufficient to prove that she did such work, during the first seven of said nine years, under an express agreement with defendant that he would pay her for one-half of the work. In 1890 plaintiff, for the purpose of working and mining the claims for a profit, in addition to the annual labor required by law, erected thereon hoisting works and machinery of the value of $3,500, and sunk or repaired a shaft. At or about the time this work was commenced, the defendant caused a written notice to be posted on the mine, stating that he was the owner of an undivided one-half of the mine, and that he would not be "responsible for the payment of any sum or sums due, or hereafter to become due, for any labor done upon, or materials furnished, to be or actually used upon said mine, by any person whatever; that E. E. Holbrooke, who is now working said mine, is not authorized to incur any obligation for or on my behalf, nor in any way to incumber or to cause to be incumbered, or taken as security, my interest in said mine, or any part thereof, for any labor done for her, or at her instance, or for any materials of any kind or supplies furnished at her instance, and used on said mine." It is claimed that this notice absolved the defendant from all obligation to contribute to the annual labor required by law to be done on the unpatented 10 acres for the years 1890 and 1891, but I think this is a mistake. The defendant was bound to contribute one-half of the value of that work, unless he preferred and offered to do his portion of the work, or abandon his interest in the unpatented portion of the claims, neither of which he did, as appears by the notice, and his answer to the complaint. Besides, under the circumstances, the obvious object of the notice was merely to prevent his liability for the proposed work or improvements by plaintiff in excess of the annual labor required by law; and it seems the plaintiff so understood the notice, for she has charged him nothing for the improvements made for the purpose of working the mine, and by the decree she is allowed to remove the hoisting works, valued at $3,500.

2. It is claimed that $106.50, for money expended by plaintiff in proceedings to obtain a patent for the unpatented 10 acres, is improperly included in the $502.85 allowed to plaintiff by the decree. These expenses were incurred and paid by plaintiff under an agreement between her and an agent of the defendant (defendant being out of this state), authorized in writing "to look after and defend my [defendant's] interest" in the whole of said mining claim, and having "full power and authority to do and perform all and every act and thing whatsoever requisite and necessary to be done in and about the premises, as fully, to all intents and purposes, as I [defendant] might or could do if personally present." It is contended that this instrument did not authorize the agent to make the agreement for defendant to join plaintiff in the application for a patent, and to pay half the expenses thereof. But it is unnecessary to decide this question, since the $502.85 allowed to plaintiff from the proceeds of the sale is $195.40 less than she was entitled to, according to the findings of fact, which are not excepted to; that is, after deducting the $200 for annual labor in 1890 and 1891, and the $106.50 for expenses of proceedings for patent from the sum of $1,005.75, which she is found to have expended altogether, there remains $698.25, which should have been paid her from the proceeds of the sale before a division of the residue. As there was no personal judgment against the defendant, the plaintiff should have been allowed from the proceeds of the sale all she had properly and necessarily expended for the preservation of the claims, before any division of the residue. But, instead of this, the court, after having found that she had properly expended $1,005.75, ordered that she be paid only $502.85, "being one-half of said sum of $1,005.75 paid by said plaintiff as aforesaid." By this mistake in the judgment the plaintiff is allowed nothing for what she is found to have expended on defendant's account. It is not denied that she did the annual labor required by law for each of the seven years prior to 1890, and all the taxes. For this she was entitled to retain from the proceeds of the sale over $700. It is very plain that there is no error in the judgment, to the prejudice of defendant, and, therefore, that the order and judgment should be affirmed.

PEOPLE v. CREWS. (No. 20,993.)

DYING DECLARATIONS—EXPECTATION OF DEATH.

Deceased, the morning after he was shot, not then expecting to die, made, signed, and verified a statement. The same evening his doctor told him he could not recover. He was then reminded of the statement, and said that he did not wish to change it, and signed an appended clause, affirming that he made the statement with full knowledge and sense of his impending death. The statement was not re-read to him, but it appeared that he clearly remembered its contents. Held, that this was a good dying declaration.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Sonoma county; R. F. Crawford, Judge.

Charles M. Crews, convicted of murder in the second degree, appeals. Affirmed.

Ross & Campbell and J. T. Campbell, for appellant. Attorney General Hart, for the People.

DE HAVEN, J. This is an appeal by the defendant from a judgment convicting him of the crime of murder in the second degree, and sentencing him to imprisonment for life, and also from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

The deceased, M. H. Byrn, was shot by the defendant during the evening of July 5, 1892, and early in the morning of the next day made a statement of the circumstances attending the shooting, which was reduced to writing, and signed and verified by the affidavit of the deceased. At the time this statement was made the deceased was not impressed with a sense of his impending dissolution; but, about 10 o'clock of the evening of the same day, he was informed by the attending physician that his wound was mortal, and of the impossibility of his recovery, and his attention was called to the statement previously made by him. He then said that he did not wish to make any change therein. There was then appended to the statement the following, which was read to the deceased, and signed by him: "The above and foregoing statement I have made as a true and correct account of the facts relative to my being shot by Charles M. Crews, and I make said statement with full knowledge that my recovery is impossible, and under the sense of impending death." Upon proof of the foregoing facts, the written statement was admitted in evidence as the dying declaration of the deceased. The defendant objected thereto, and this ruling of the court is assigned as error. The defendant contends that the declaration was not made under a belief of immediate death, and that the subsequent ratification was not sufficient to entitle it to be admitted as a dying declaration, especially in view of the fact that the statement was not read to the deceased at the time of such ratification.

We think the paper was properly received as a dying declaration, although, when originally given, the statement was not made under a belief by the deceased that he was in the immediate presence of death; still, his subsequent reaffirmation of the matters therein stated when all hope had gone was sufficient to constitute a repetition or restatement of the same matters and with the same effect as if such matters had then been reduced to writing and signed. Mockabee v. Com., 78 Ky. 380; Whart. Cr. Ev. (8th Ed.) § 287. The evidence leaves it entirely clear that, when the deceased reaffirmed the correctness of the prior statement, he had a clear recollection of its contents, and, under those circumstances, the fact that it was not then re-read to him becomes immaterial. The court did not err in any of the instructions given, or in refusing or modifying certain instructions requested by the defendant, nor in any of its rulings relating to the admissibility of evidence. The trial of the superior court seems to have been entirely fair to the defendant, and he has no legal reason to complain of the result. This conclusion renders it unnecessary to consider the motion of the assistant counsel for the people to strike out the bill of exceptions found in the record, or the motion to dismiss the appeal from the order denying a new trial. Judgment and order affirmed.

MARTIN et al. v. DEETZ et al. (No. 18,131.)

CORPORATIONS—CORPORATE EXISTENCE—ACTIONS—DAMAGES.

1. Where articles of incorporation state one county to be the principal place of business, and instead of being filed in that county, as required by the statute, are filed in another county, the corporation does not become one de jure.

2. If, after such an attempt at incorporation, the directors named in the articles never meet, and no stock is issued nor corporate act done, the corporation is not one de facto.

3. The corporate existence of a company which is neither a de facto nor de jure corporation may be questioned in a private action to which it is a party.

4. Damages arising from the act of a director named in the articles of incorporation, whereby the formation of the corporation was prevented, cannot be recovered in an action by the alleged corporation, as it is not in esse.

5. In an action for damages against a director of a corporation for the prevention of a directors' meeting, whereby the operation of its sawmill was prevented, it is error to consider as damages the prospective profits on the amount of lumber which could have been cut, as they are too remote.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Siskiyou county; J. S. Beard, Judge.

Action by H. P. Martin and another against Alva Jacob Deetz and others. M. A. Harding and the Deetz Mill & Lumber Company having been made defendants by order of the court, the latter filed a cross complaint, and the former filed an answer thereto. From the judgment rendered in the action, plaintiffs and the said Harding appeal. Reversed.

T. M. Osmont, Warren & Taylor, Geo. A. Proctor, and D. I. Mahony, for appellants. Maxwell & McEnerney, Gillis & Tapsott, Brown & Farraher, Whitworth & Shurtlefe, J. F. Lodge, and L. F. Coburn, for respondents.

McFARLAND, J. This action was brought by the plaintiffs against Alva Jacob Deetz, George Lewis Deetz, Susannah D. Hathaway, Mary Polly Metcalf, Mary Elizabeth Deetz, and Henry John Deetz, who are called in the papers the "Deetz Family," upon a note and mortgage made by them on April 15, 1891, for $22,000, to M. A. Harding, and assigned by the latter to the Bank of California, and by said bank to the plaintiffs herein. The mortgage was upon certain timber lands, with a sawmill thereon, owned by said Deetz family. The Deetz family, in their answer, set up certain defenses, and upon certain allegations made therein the court ordered that the said M. A. Harding and an alleged corporation called the Deetz Mill & Lumber Company be made parties to the action. Thereupon the said Deetz Mill & Lumber Company filed a cross complaint, to which answers were made by the plaintiffs, and also by said M. A. Harding. The court first heard the issues made by the cross complaint and answers thereto. It then considered the defenses set up by the Deetz family in their answer, and gave judgment in their favor, that the plaintiff take nothing by this action. The principal contest here is made upon the cross complaint of the said Deetz Mill & Lumber Company, and upon the findings made by the court upon the issues made by said cross complaint and the said answers thereto. The court found that said Harding had done certain acts which caused damage to the said mill and lumber company to the extent of $20,000, gave judgment for said amount in favor of said cross complainant, and against said Harding, for said amount of $20,000, and ordered that said damages should be substantially applied to, and deducted from, the amount of said mortgage. The court found that the acts of said Harding upon which it based said damages were known to the plaintiffs at the time they acquired said note and mortgage, and therefore the case was treated practically as if the suit had been brought by said Harding himself. The plaintiffs and said Harding appeal from the judgment upon the judgment roll, which includes findings. The findings follow, in the main, the averments of the cross complaint, and appellants contend that their demurrer to the cross complaint should have been sustained, and that the findings are not sufficient to warrant the judgment. The facts alleged and found are numerous and complicated, and it would be impossible to state them all here without exceeding all reasonable length. We will confine ourselves to those which are absolutely necessary to an understanding of the case.

The note and mortgage sued on were given in lieu of, and to take up, two other notes of the Deetz family,—one given to F. N. Handy for $10,000, and another to said M. A. Harding for $7,785,—which were secured by mortgages on the land covered by the mortgage here in suit. The Deetz family had been operating a sawmill on the mortgaged premises, and were very much involved in debt; and being thus embarrassed, on or about February 20, 1891, they applied to one George F. Day for aid and assistance, and a certain written contract was entered into between them and the said Day, which is called in the pleadings and findings "Exhibit A." This Exhibit A was made by said Day, party of the first part, and the said persons called the "Deetz Family," as aforesaid, parties of the second part; and by said contract it was agreed that they should organize a corporation to be called the Deetz Mill & Lumber Company, for the purpose of carrying on the manufacturing of lumber, the capital stock to consist of $20,000, divided into 200 shares of $100 a share, and that one-half of said shares should be issued to said Day, and the other half to said Deetz family; and the said Deetz family were to convey the premises described in the complaint herein to said corporation. It was further provided that Day was to give his time and attention to the business, and to act as superintendent, and his said one-half of the stock should be placed in the possession of George H. Maxwell, in escrow, as security for his performance of the contract; but it was further provided that said stock might be hypothecated as security for any money borrowed by Day and advanced to said company. It was further provided, also, that any profits which the stockholders would be otherwise entitled to as dividends should be first applied to said mortgages given to Handy and to Harding, as aforesaid. (It was also agreed by the said Deetz family, in another instrument executed about the same time, that Harding might substitute the $22,000 note and mortgage sued on in this action for the said other two mortgages given to Handy and Harding as aforesaid; and it was agreed by said Day, in another instrument of writing, that the note and mortgage herein sued on should precede and take precedence over any rights of the parties accruing under said Exhibit A.) In pursuance of said Exhibit A, the parties thereto undertook to form a corporation; and said Harding agreed to become a director of said corporation for the first year, and for that purpose was to have a share of stock, and he did sign the articles of incorporation, which provided that he should be one of five directors for the first year. The property above described, belonging to the Deetz family, and mortgaged as aforesaid, was situated in the county of Siskiyou, in which county the business of the said corporation to be formed was to be carried on. Articles of incorporation were prepared and properly signed, showing that the principal place of business of the intended corporation was in the county of Siskiyou; but the said articles were not filed, and never were filed, in the clerk's office of said county of Siskiyou. They were filed in the clerk's office of the city and county of San Francisco, and a copy thereof was certified by the clerk of said city and county to the secretary of state, who issued a certificate of incorporation, reciting that they were certified by the county clerk of Siskiyou. Afterwards, a copy of the certificate of the secretary of state was filed with the county clerk of Siskiyou county. The other four directors were said Day, one J. O. Whitney, and Alva J. D. Deetz and George L. Deetz, two of the said Deetz family. But nothing more was done towards organizing the corporation, and the Deetz family never conveyed the property to said company.

It is alleged in the cross complaint, and found by the court, that, after the filing of the articles of incorporation, Harding conceived the fraudulent purpose of preventing the organization of the corporation, and of throwing its business into confusion and injuring its credit, so that it could not continue its business, and he would be able to foreclose his mortgage and secure the whole property, "the value of which greatly exceeded the amount of said mortgage;" and for this purpose (as is averred and found) he refused to meet or act as a director, or in any way to participate in the organization of the corporation; and he also, as averred, falsely represented to the Deetz family that Day intended to rob said family of all interest in the corporation and in said property, and to "ruin them all," and that the only way for the Deetzes to protect themselves was for George and Alva Deetz, who were named as directors, to refuse to act as directors, and prevent the organization of the corporation. The Deetz family were thus induced to act as advised by Harding; and George and Alva refused to meet or act as directors, and in this way they and Harding prevented the organization of the corporation. However, after the filing of the articles of incorporation, the Deetzes and Day commenced, and for several weeks continued, the business of manufacturing lumber at the mill; but at the end of that time, owing to their unpaid liabilities, and particularly to their pressing need of $3,000, they were compelled to quit, and the business and property went into the hands of a receiver. The court attributes the failure of the corporation to organize entirely to Harding; and finds that the failure to organize prevented the borrowing of said $3,000, which would have enabled the company to go on with its business. It is found that "arrangements had been made by said Day" to advance $3,000 to the company, provided shares of stock had been issued to him which he could have hypothecated as security for a loan; but, as the directors would not meet or organize, there could be no certificates of stock, and therefore no loan, and so the business was thus stopped by the said acts of Harding, to the great damage, as is alleged and found, of said alleged corporation. As damages it is found that for four months after the mill stopped it could have cut 1,000,000 feet of lumber per month at a cost of $6.50 per thousand; that the stumpage would have been $2 per thousand; that there could have been realized therefor $13 per thousand; and that, therefore, the net profit for the four months would have been $18,000. Other alleged damages for the forced sale of certain green lumber and injuries to logs from exposure to the weather are found to be $2,000—making in all $20,000; and for this $20,000 judgment is rendered for the said mill and lumber company against Harding, and it is decreed that it be applied as payment on the amount of principal and interest due on said mortgage for $22,000, upon which this action was brought.

The first contention made by appellants is that the Deetz Mill & Lumber Company, the cross complainant, never was a corporation either de jure or de facto, and therefore cannot maintain this or any action. This contention is, in our opinion, a sound one. It is quite clear that the cross complainant was never a corporation de jure. Under our system of incorporation through general laws, a corporation de jure is an artificial body created by operation of law upon the execution, filing, and certification of certain written instruments by persons desirous of incorporating, and certain public officers, in accordance with the provisions of such general laws. When these instruments are executed, filed, and certified as required, the corporation, eo instante, comes into legal existence. Its corporate life is then complete, without any further act or user; and it can be destroyed only by some subsequent act of forfeiture. The corporation is then regularly formed. But this result can be accomplished only by compliance with the prerequisites of the statute. It may be conceded that a substantial compliance is sufficient; but it is clear that a necessary prerequisite cannot be omitted. Under our Code, the first necessary thing to be done, after signing and acknowledging the "articles of incorporation," by the parties, is to file that instrument "in the office of the county clerk of the county in which the principal place of business of the company is to be transacted," and to have a certified copy thereof made by said clerk, and sent to the secretary of state. Civ. Code, § 296. These are conditions precedent in that statutory process by which an artificial person existing only in legal contemplation can be created. We are dealing now entirely with the notion of a corporation de jure, and leaving out of view the rights which an irregularly formed body may acquire as a corporation de facto; and we have been referred to no case where a corporation has been held to have been regularly and legally created without filing its original articles in the office of the clerk of the proper county. No doubt, in such a case, subsequent acts might give the body rights as a corporation de facto. We have nothing to do with the reason why the legislature made this requirement, although it may be said that a fundamental characteristic of a corporation has always been that it must have a place (Ang. & A. Corp. § 103); and it is quite reasonable that the articles should be filed at that place. At all events, the whole process is an artificial one; and the requirement mentioned is an essential part of that process by which an imaginary, invisible, intangible, legal entity is brought into contemplative existence. As to the necessity of filing the articles with the proper county clerk, the law, as deduced from the authorities cited, is thus stated in Morawitz on Corporations (section 27): "A substantial compliance with all the terms of a general incorporation law is a prerequisite of the right of forming a corporation under it. Thus, where it is provided that a certificate, or articles of association, setting forth the purposes of the corporation about to be formed, the amount of its capital, and other details, shall be filed with some public officer, a performance of this requirement is essential; and until it has been performed the association will have no right whatever to assume corporate franchises." And, again, the same author says: "In order to prove the existence of a corporation de jure, i. e. a corporation having a legal right to exist, it is necessary to prove not only the existence of the corporation de facto, but also the legislative authorization of its existence. A public law authorizing the formation of a corporation will be judicially recognized without proof; but proof would be necessary to establish that a corporation was formed pursuant to the law, and that any conditions precedent to the legal right of forming a corporation have been fulfilled." Our Code provides that the original articles of incorporation shall designate the place where its principal business is to be transacted (Civ. Code, § 290), and that they shall be filed with the clerk of the county where such business is to be done. In the case at bar the articles set forth the principal place of business as in Siskiyou county; and they were filed not in Siskiyou county, but in the city and county of San Francisco. This was an entire failure to comply with the necessary prerequisite of the statute, and the cross complainant never became a corporation de jure.

But respondents also rely upon the doctrine that the existence and acts of a corporation de facto can be inquired into only by the state. This is, no doubt, true. The rule is stated in the second sentence of section 358 of the Civil Code. The whole section is as follows: "If a corporation does not organize, and commence the transaction of its business or the construction of its works within one year from the date of its incorporation, its corporate powers shall cease. The due incorporation of any company claiming in good faith to be a corporation under this part, and doing business as such, or its right to exercise corporate powers, shall not be inquired into collaterally, in any private action to which such de facto corporation may be a party; but such inquiry may be had at the suit of the state on information of the attorney-general." This does not mean, however, that whenever a pleading is signed and filed in an action by an attorney at law, in which some named company whom he appears for is averred to be a corporation, all the world except the state is at once estopped from denying the existence of such a corporation. In referring to this section, this court, in Oroville & V. R. Co. v. Supervisors of Plumas Co., 37 Cal. 360, per Rhodes, J., said: "This provision does not go to the extent of precluding a private person from denying the existence, de jure or de facto, of an alleged corporation. It cannot be true that the mere allegation that a party is a corporation puts the question whether it is such a corporation beyond the reach of inquiry in a suit with a private person. It must be a corporation either de jure or de facto, or it has no legal capacity to sue or be sued, nor any capacity of any kind. It is an indispensable allegation in an action by a corporation that the plaintiff is a corporation; and it results from the logic of pleading that the opposite party may deny the allegation. * * * To say that the 'due incorporation' cannot be inquired into does not mean that no inquiry can be made as to whether it is a corporation."

An averment of the existence of a de facto corporation is as issuable as an averment of the existence of a corporation de jure; and its existence does not consist in the mere assertion of its existence in a pleading. What is a corporation de facto? It exists where a number of persons have organized and acted as a corporation; have put on the habiliments of a corporation; have assumed the form and features of a corporation; have conducted their affairs, to some extent at least, by the methods, and through the officers, usually employed by corporations; and have assumed the appearance, at least, of the counterfeit presentment of a legal corporate body. Nothing of this kind was done by the Deetz Mill & Lumber Company. The court finds, it is true, in general terms, that said company became and is a corporation, and has claimed in good faith to be such, and has done business as such, and, "under and in pursuance of said contract (Exhibit A), entered into the possession of the mill," and manufactured lumber "under the management of said Day, as provided in said contract;" but this general finding is inconsistent with the specific findings and averments, which show what was, and what was not, done in the premises. And it is clear from those other findings, and from the averments of the cross complaint, that said Deetz Mill & Lumber Company never did any corporate act, or exercised any corporate power. Indeed, it was impossible, under the circumstances, for it to have done so, for it was never so organized that it could have acted, or could have pretended to act, as a corporate body. The directors named in the articles for the first year never met or acted, but deliberately refused to do so; no stock was ever issued; no by-laws were ever passed; no seal was adopted; no persons ever met, or pretended to meet, in corporate body assembled; no officers were ever elected; no person was ever appointed by the asserted corporation to represent it in any way, or to act as its agent; no journal or record of the proceedings of the body corporate was ever kept; and it was never in a position to exercise, or to pretend to exercise, any of the powers granted to corporations by title 1, pt. 4, of the first division of the Civil Code. The first sentence of section 358, above quoted, provides that, if a corporation does not "organize" within a certain time, its corporate powers shall cease; and the second sentence, which provides that the "due incorporation" of a company and "its right to exercise corporate powers" shall not be inquired into by a private party in a suit to which "such de facto corporation" is a party, evidently refers to a corporation which has not failed to "organize," and which does "exercise corporate powers," and thus becomes and is a de facto corporation. In all the cases where a party to a suit has been held to be a de facto corporation, it has appeared that such party had assumed in some way the appearance of a corporation, and had pretended to act as a corporate body. For instance, in Ditch Co. v. Crane, 80 Cal. 181, 22 Pac. 76, Mr. Justice Paterson, in delivering the opinion of the court, says: "We think that the evidence in support of the finding that the plaintiff was a corporation, acting in good faith as such, is sufficient. It was recognized in the community as a corporation, the records of its proceedings show that it was so acting, and in all its dealings it was styled as a corporation. It has pursued corporate forms of action, held corporate meetings, and, we think, comes within the provisions of section 358 of the Civil Code." No part of this language would apply to the cross complainant in the case at bar. Indeed, a thorough consideration of the cross complaint itself shows that the burden of the grievance alleged is that Harding prevented the Deetz Mill & Lumber Company from acting or being a corporation de facto, or at all. But, if any legal damage arose from such act of Harding, it could be recovered only by some of the natural persons whom he prevented from forming such corporation; it could not be recovered by an alleged artificial person not in esse.

The foregoing views are determinative of the case against the cross complainant, and make necessary a reversal of the judgment. The judgment in favor of the cross complainant, however, would have to be reversed on other grounds. The legal wrong which Harding did, if he did any, consisted in his refusal to meet and act as a director. The averment that he persuaded the Deetz family to help to prevent the organization of the corporation can hardly be considered as of any value. It is averred that he did this "by false and fraudulent misrepresentations to said Deetz family as to the purposes and intentions of said Day;" but there are no facts stated as to the nature of said misrepresentations. The finding is that the misrepresentations were that "Day intended to, and would, if said company was organized, deprive and rob said Deetz family of all interest in said corporation and in said Deetz property, and ruin them all." This is very general, and it amounts to little more than mere business advice as to a matter about which the Deetzes had as good opportunity as Harding to form an opinion. But if we were to waive all other points, and assume that it was Harding's duty to assist in the formation of a mere de facto corporation, and that his refusal to meet with the other directors, and his advice to the Deetzes not to so meet, were wrongful acts, and the cross complainant could recover for any damages resulting from said acts, still we see no just basis for the measure of damages by which the amount of the judgment was arrived at. Of course, prospective profits are sometimes allowed as damages for breach of contract or tort; but they must be the clear, proximate, and natural results of the wrong, and must be confined to the principal thing complained of, and to its naturally attendant consequences. 2 Greenl. Ev. § 256; Anderson v. Taylor, 56 Cal. 132. The rule stated by our Code is that for a breach of a contract the measure of damages is "the detriment proximately caused thereby, or which, in the ordinary course of things, would be likely to result therefrom" (Civ. Code, § 3300), and, for a tort, "the amount which will compensate for all detriment proximately caused thereby." Remote results, produced by intermediate sequences of causes, are beyond the reach of any just and practicable rule of damages. Lumber Co. v. Miller, 67 Cal. 464, 8 Pac. 40. "Each cause produces results that in time, alone or by combination with other causes, produce other effects, and so on ad infinitum." Field, Dam. § 10. And in the case at bar, between the alleged wrong of Harding in refusing to act as director, and the final damages alleged to have been caused by the results of the financial embarrassment of the Deetz company, there is a series of consecutive causes and effects which carries those alleged damages so far away from the alleged wrong as to make them entirely too remote to be called in any sense "proximate." They are entirely too contingent, speculative, indirect, and uncertain to come within any legal measure of damages. The judgment allows full prospective profits that might possibly have been made out of the timber and the mill during four months, while the timber and the mill still remain with the same possibility of making, in the future, the very profits for which the judgment was rendered. And it is a curious result that the Deetzes reap the main advantage of an alleged wrong which they themselves helped to perpetrate, and which they could easily have prevented. By the judgment they get their note and mortgage for $22,000 almost entirely wiped out, merely because Harding refused to act as director, when, if they had acted with the other two directors, Day and Whitney, the corporation would have been organized, and the alleged consequent calamities averted, despite the action of Harding. The excuse that the latter tempted them is not very cogent.

Our conclusion is that upon the cross complaint and findings the judgment should have been against the cross complainant, and in favor of plaintiffs and defendant Harding. The case has been argued on both sides almost entirely upon the issues made by the cross complaint and the answers thereto, and as if the determination of those issues would be determinative of the whole case. Appellants contend that, upon a reversal of the judgment in favor of the cross complainant, the court below should be directed to give judgment foreclosing the mortgage, as prayed for in the complaint. The judgment as a whole, no doubt, so involves the rights of all parties that it must stand or fall as an entirety, and its reversal will perhaps practically end the litigation; but upon the record we do not see our way clear to direct the court below to at once enter a judgment in favor of plaintiffs, and against the Deetzes, foreclosing the mortgage. Upon that branch of the litigation the cause must be remanded for further proceedings. The entire judgment is reversed, with directions to the court below to dismiss the cross complaint of the so-called "Deetz Mill & Lumber Company," with costs to plaintiffs and defendant Harding; and, with respect to the defendants Alva Jacob Deetz, George Lewis Deetz, Susannah D. Hathaway (formerly Deetz), Mary Polly Metcalf (formerly Deetz), Mary Elizabeth Deetz, and Henry Deetz, the cause is remanded for further proceedings in accordance with this opinion.

LORD v. THOMAS et ux. (No. 18,220.)

RES JUDICATA—EJECTMENT—EVIDENCE.

1. In ejectment against several defendants a judgment in a former action between plaintiff and one of the defendants, offered generally against all, is inadmissible, unless they are privy in estate and bound by such judgment.

2. A prior judgment is conclusive upon the parties only as to matters actually and necessarily decided therein.

3. Upon an issue that plaintiff's grantor had taken title for the joint benefit of himself and defendants, and that plaintiff took title from him with notice of defendants' rights, it is competent to show the circumstances of the purchase by such grantor, and his declarations at that time, as tending to show defendants' interest.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Stanislaus county; William O. Minor, Judge.

Action in ejectment by William J. Lord against Stephen Thomas and Annie Thomas. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

R. C. Minor and Eastin & Griffin, for appellant. P. J. Hazen, for respondents.

HAYNES, C. Action in ejectment to recover possession of two acres of land in Stanislaus county. The complaint is in the usual form. The answer, after denying the allegations of the complaint, for a second defense alleged that defendants were tenants in common with the plaintiff, and were entitled to possession as such, and that they did and always had permitted plaintiff to have possession as such cotenant. For a third defense, they alleged that in April, 1885, Joseph Lord, the father of the plaintiff, agreed with defendant Stephen Thomas to purchase the demanded premises (which were then about to be sold at administrator's sale), for himself and Thomas, each to have an undivided one-half interest therein; that Joseph Lord bought the premises pursuant to said agreement, that Thomas paid a part of his proportion of the purchase money, and Lord advanced the remainder, and took a conveyance thereof in his own name for the benefit of himself and Thomas, and thereafter held the title in trust for the benefit of both; that defendant went into possession as such cotenant in his own right, and had ever since occupied the premises as such cotenant; and that plaintiff took a conveyance of the whole of the premises from his father, Joseph Lord, with full knowledge of said facts and of the rights of defendants therein. Special issues were submitted to the jury covering the controlling facts alleged in the third defense, all of which were found in favor of defendants, and those were adopted by the court, and full findings on all the issues were added, and defendants had judgment. The plaintiff's motion for a new trial was denied, and this appeal is from the judgment and the order denying a new trial.

The principal question arises upon the exclusion of certain evidence offered by the plaintiff. On January 25, 1890, the plaintiff, William J. Lord, commenced an action in the superior court against Stephen Thomas, one of the defendants herein, upon two causes of action; one for the recovery of rent for the same premises involved in this action from April 28, 1888, to January 20, 1890, at $9 per month, amounting to $183, and in the second cause of action, which was for unlawful detainer, sought to recover possession of the same premises, alleging a written lease made January 20, 1890, for three months at $10 per month, and that notice to quit was served April 22, 1890. The answer of defendants in that case, in addition to denials, alleged substantially the same facts set up in the third defense in this action, and, as to the written lease alleged in the complaint, answered that it was intended as an acknowledgment of plaintiff's interest in the premises as tenant in common, and an agreement to pay rent for such interest, and that under said lease he paid the rent up to May 20, 1890. That action was tried by the court without a jury, and resulted in a judgment for plaintiff for $183 upon the first cause of action, and against the plaintiff on the second, upon the ground that the lease had been extended by receiving rent beyond the term, and for want of the proper notice. The findings were very full, and to the effect that the defendant never had any ownership as tenant in common or otherwise, that he had always occupied the premises as the tenant of the plaintiff and his grantor, at a monthly rental of $9 up to the date of the written lease, and that said lease was of the entire property, and not of an undivided interest.

Upon the trial of the present action, the plaintiff offered in evidence in chief the judgment roll in said first action, upon the ground that it was an estoppel. Defendants objected that, if relied upon as an estoppel, it should have been pleaded, and made the further objection that it was irrelevant, immaterial, and incompetent, and that the judgment in that case is not inconsistent with the defense in this. I think the evidence was properly excluded. The judgment roll offered in evidence was in a case against Stephen Thomas alone. In this action his wife was made a defendant, and the complaint alleged that "the defendants are in possession, * * * and wrongfully withhold," etc. The offer was general, and was not restricted to the defendant Stephen Thomas. It constituted no estoppel as against Annie Thomas. It does not appear that she claimed by title acquired subsequently to that judgment, or that she is in any sense a privy in estate affected in any manner by the judgment offered in evidence. The effect of a judgment as an estoppel is declared by subdivision 2, § 1908, Code Civ. Proc. The plaintiff was not required to plead the former judgment in bar, but the form of the plea, if it had been pleaded, would have indicated the circumstances under which he could use it in evidence. If pleaded, it must appear, not only that it was upon the same cause of action, but between the same parties or their privies; and hence, where it is pleaded against one not a party to the former record, the facts showing that such party is bound must be pleaded, and, if used in evidence against such party without being pleaded, the facts showing that such party is bound or estopped by the judgment must first be given in evidence. There is nothing in the record to rebut or contradict the supposition that Thomas may have conveyed his entire equitable interest in the property to his wife before the former action was commenced. But, were it otherwise, we think the evidence was properly excluded. Two causes of action were stated in the complaint in the first suit. Upon the second cause of action, which was in forcible detainer, the judgment was not upon the merits, and it must have been against the plaintiff, whatever the facts as to the ownership may have been; and no findings as to ownership were necessary to support the judgment, or were in any manner pertinent. The first cause of action was for the recovery of rent under an alleged verbal lease. Some uncertainty as to what the issues were upon the first cause of action arises from the failure of defendant to specify the causes of action to which his defenses were intended to apply. Under the first cause of action, the right to the possession of the premises was not involved, and under the evidence disclosed by the record in the present case, and consistently with the facts alleged by the defendant in his second defense in the former case, and in his answer in this, that judgment upon the first cause of action was sustainable, even if the facts as to the tenancy in common had been found to be as alleged by defendant. He had been in the sole possession of the premises, conducting a saloon business thereon in which the plaintiff had no interest, and also occupied the premises with his family; and, whether there had been an express leasing or not, the plaintiff was entitled to compensation for the use of his undivided interest in the property. The fact there directly decided was that the plaintiff was entitled to rent at the rate of $9 per month for the time claimed; and, as to that fact, and as to facts which it was necessary to decide as the groundwork or foundation of the fact directly adjudged, the judgment is conclusive as between the parties thereto and their privies (Reg. v. Inhabitants of Hartington Middle Quarter, 4 El. & Bl. 793); or, as stated in Code Civ. Proc. § 1911: "That only is deemed to have been adjudged in a former judgment which appears upon its face to have been adjudged, or which was actually and necessarily included therein, or necessary thereto." "The true doctrine is that facts found sufficient to uphold the decree conclude the parties and nothing else." Coit v. Tracy, 8 Conn. 268. See, also, Bosquett v. Crane, 51 Cal. 507; People v. Johnson, 38 N. Y. 63.

Some other exceptions were taken by appellant which are noticed in his brief, one of which is that the court erred in permitting the witness Joseph Lord to testify on cross-examination as to when and how he obtained title to the demanded premises. This witness, when examined in chief, produced, and there was read in evidence, a deed from himself to the plaintiff, evidently for the purpose of showing title in the plaintiff, and this was followed by the introduction of a lease from the plaintiff to defendant Stephen Thomas, made after the conveyance. The witness had testified without objection that defendants were in possession before the execution of the lease, which bore date January 20, 1890. I think it was entirely proper on cross-examination to show, as was shown by the answers of the witness, that he acquired the title in 1885, and that defendants went into possession a month or two thereafter; thus showing that their entry was not under the lease given in evidence, and was prior to the title shown in the plaintiff. The witnesses John Roberts, Capt. James, and Annie Thomas were properly permitted to testify to statements made by Joseph Lord at the time he bid off the property in question, tending to show that the purchase was made for himself and Thomas. The plaintiff acquired his title from Joseph Lord, and it was alleged that he had full knowledge of the circumstances under which his grantor obtained title; and the testimony of these witnesses tended strongly to show, by the statements and admissions of Joseph Lord at the time of the transaction, that defendants had an interest in the purchase to the extent of an undivided one-half of the property.

I have examined the other exceptions taken, but find no prejudicial error in any of them. The point that the evidence is insufficient to justify the findings is not well taken. The judgment and order appealed from should be affirmed.

We concur: BELCHER, C.; SEARLS, C.

WITTENBROCK v. PARKER et al. (No. 18,194.)

RELEASE OF MORTGAGE—CONSTRUCTIVE NOTICE OF MISTAKE—KNOWLEDGE OF ATTORNEY.

1. Where a mortgagee's attorney drew a full, instead of a partial, release of his mortgage, and he executed it without reading, the constructive knowledge of such attorney's partner of the mistake does not bind a subsequent mortgagee, by whom such partner was employed to examine the title to the same property, and who accepted a mortgage thereon upon his opinion that the former mortgage was fully released of record.

2. Where a mortgagee's attorney drew a full, instead of a partial, release of his mortgage, and he executed it without reading, his lien is inferior to that of a subsequent mortgagee relying upon the record of the release.

3. Where a person by mistake executed a full, instead of a partial, release of his mortgage, in an action to set it aside and foreclose the mortgage the burden is upon him to show that a subsequent mortgagee had notice of the mistake.

4. An attorney employed by a person to examine the title to real estate upon which he contemplates loaning money is his agent, although he is paid by the person seeking the loan.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Tehama county; John F. Ellison, Judge.

Action by Henry Wittenbrock against John Parker, James Bithell, G. W. Harlow, and others. From a decree in favor of defendants James Bithell and G. W. Harlow, and an order denying his motion for new trial, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Armstrong & Platnauer and P. H. Coffman, for appellant. A. L. Hart, S. Solon Holl, Robert T. Devlin, and Isaac Josephs, for respondents.

SEARLS, C. This was an action by Henry Wittenbrock, as plaintiff, to have a satisfaction of a mortgage set aside and canceled, and to foreclose said mortgage, which was executed by the defendant John A. Parker. Defendants Bithell and Harlow were made defendants, and set up mortgages in their favor, which, by the decree of the court, were adjudged valid and subsisting against the defendant Parker, and the liens thereof prior to the lien of plaintiff's mortgage. Plaintiff appeals from the decree, and from an order denying a motion for a new trial.

The following facts illustrate the important question in the case: Plaintiff's mortgage was executed May 22, 1885, by the defendant John A. Parker, upon certain real property in the county of Tehama, to secure the payment of his certain promissory note for $6,000, and interest, payable two years after date to the Union Building & Loan Association or order. The mortgage was duly recorded May 23, 1885. L. S. Taylor and S. Solon Holl were attorneys at law and copartners under the firm name of Taylor & Holl, and engaged as such firm in the practice of law in all its various branches, including the examination of land titles, giving opinions as to the validity thereof, and drawing deeds, mortgages, assignments, and other instruments in writing. In February, 1888, the note of Parker was due and unpaid, and the Union Building & Loan Association was pressing him for payment, whereupon L. S. Taylor, the senior member of the firm of Taylor & Holl, at the request of Parker, negotiated with plaintiff for the purchase by him of said note and mortgage, and to grant further time for the payment thereof. To this plaintiff agreed, and in February, 1888, the holder of the note and mortgage, in consideration of $7,000, which plaintiff paid, assigned to him, the said plaintiff, the note and mortgage. This assignment was drawn by Taylor, and at his request recorded March 5, 1888. Holl knew nothing of the assignment. On or about October 4, 1888, John A. Parker, the maker of the note and mortgage, had contracted to sell a portion of the mortgaged premises, and applied to plaintiff through said Taylor for a release of the lien of his mortgage upon the land to be sold upon his payment of $4,000 upon the note, the mortgage to remain upon the residue of the land as security for the balance due on the note. Plaintiff agreed to this, and said L. S. Taylor then prepared a release, which he represented to plaintiff and Parker was a release of the land to be sold, and plaintiff, believing this to be true, executed and acknowledged the release, but which in fact was, as the court finds, by mistake and inadvertence so drawn as to read "that said mortgage was fully paid and satisfied." Plaintiff did not himself read the release, but took the statement of Taylor that it was all right. This release came into the hands of W. F. Huntoon, at whose request it was duly recorded on the 22d day of October, 1888. The copartnership between Taylor and Holl was formed January 1, 1885, prior to which time Taylor had been an attorney for plaintiff and defendant Parker; his services consisting mainly in preparing deeds, mortgages, assignments, and releases, and examining abstracts. That, after the formation of said copartnership, plaintiff and Parker continued to employ his services in like manner, and his partner, Holl, who occupied a separate office or room, knew little or nothing of their business, and knew nothing of the mortgage in question, its assignment, or the release thereof, or of any of the agreements relating thereto, nothing in relation thereto having been in fact imparted to him. For some years prior to 1888 defendant Bithell was accustomed to loan money on real-estate security, and was accustomed to require the borrower to furnish an abstract of title to the land offered as security, and to submit such abstract to an attorney selected by him, the said defendant, and to pay said attorney for his opinion as to title, and for preparing mortgages, etc., where the loans were consummated. Bithell had for some years selected S. Solon Holl as the attorney to examine and report upon titles in all such cases, and to prepare all necessary papers, to which said Holl gave his individual attention. On the 24th day of October, 1888, defendant John A. Parker applied to defendant Bithell for a loan of $6,000, and offered real estate as security therefor. Bithell applied to Holl to examine the abstract of title of the real estate offered, and to prepare notes and mortgages if he approved the title. The title was approved by Holl, and the notes and mortgages prepared and executed by Parker on the same day, and the money, $6,000, was then and there received by said Parker. The mortgages, four in number, covered the property mortgaged to plaintiff. Neither Bithell nor Holl knew of the plaintiff's mortgage, or the assignment or release thereof, except as shown by the abstract, and had no actual notice or knowledge of any mistake in the release. The record showed plaintiff's mortgage to have been released. Holl advised Bithell that the land was clear of incumbrance, and Bithell relied upon and acted upon this belief in making his loan, and neither he nor Holl had in fact any information as to the mistake in plaintiff's release until January, 1891.

Upon this state of facts, the question arises, had Bithell such constructive notice of the mistake in the release of the mortgage of plaintiff that the lien of his own mortgages upon the same land was postponed and rendered subject and subordinate to that of plaintiff under his mortgage, so by mistake released? Taylor and Holl being engaged as copartners in the practice of the law, including business of the character transacted for the several parties to this controversy, the knowledge acquired by one member of the firm, obtained while transacting such business and relating thereto, was constructive notice to the firm as to such knowledge. An attorney is an agent for his client within the scope of his employment, and two or more attorneys practicing together as copartners are joint agents as to the business transacted for their clients as such copartners. Notice to one of two or more joint agents is notice to all. Wade, Notice, § 681; Fulton Bank v. New York & S. Canal Co., 4 Paige, 127; Bank v. Aymar, 3 Hill, 262; Bank v. Davis, 2 Hill, 451; Bank v. Cushman, 121 Mass. 490. Like other copartners, each is at the same time a principal and an agent for all the others.

The important branch of the question relates to the situation of defendant Bithell as affected by the knowledge imputed to Holl, who was his attorney and agent in passing upon the abstract of title to the land and in preparing the mortgages. We say he was the attorney and agent of Bithell in the transaction, because he was employed by him, and it was to and for him the services were rendered, and the fact that his employer required the mortgagor to furnish an abstract and pay Holl for his services did not constitute him the attorney of the latter. The burden cast upon the mortgagor of paying for the services of the attorney selected by Bithell to guard his interests was simply a condition of the loan, and did not alter the status of such attorney, or diminish the duty or responsibility which he owed to his employer. Holl was, then, the agent of Bithell. It was not a general and continuing agency, extending to a range as comprehensive as the functions of an attorney, but limited to the particular business in hand, for the transaction of which he was specially employed. It is not sought to charge Bithell with any actual notice of plaintiff's mortgage or of any knowledge of facts to put him upon inquiry as to the mistake in its satisfaction or cancellation of record. The case turns upon the point of the constructive notice to the principal of the facts within the knowledge of the agent. This question presents a broad field of inquiry. A somewhat careful examination of its several phases awakens a desire to discuss it at length, and to review some of the many authorities converging and diverging in relation to its several branches, but economy of time and space forbids, and I content myself with a concise statement of what seem to be the settled propositions on the subject, so far as applicable to this case, which may be briefly stated thus: A principal is bound by the knowledge of his agent, and will in law be deemed to have constructive notice of such knowledge. In order to thus bind the principal by knowledge possessed by the agent, it is, as a general rule, essential that the information "be obtained by or imparted to the agent while he is in fact acting as agent,—while he is actually engaged in doing his principal's business, in pursuance of his authority, and in his character as agent." Pom. Eq. Jur. § 670. Within these limits and to this extent there has been but little divergence of opinion on the part of the courts, either in England or this country, and the doctrine is elementary. Connelly v. Peck, 6 Cal. 348; May v. Borel, 12 Cal. 91; Stanley v. Green, Id. 148; Hunter v. Watson, Id. 363; Bierce v. Hotel Co., 31 Cal. 161; Donald v. Beals, 57 Cal. 399; Watson v. Sutro, 86 Cal. 500, 24 Pac. 172, and 25 Pac. 64. It is the duty of an attorney at law, or other agent, to communicate to his client or principal whatever information he acquires in relation to the subject-matter involved in the transaction, and he will be presumed to have performed his duty in that respect; and notice to him is constructive notice to his client or principal. Bierce v. Hotel Co., supra; The Distilled Spirits, 11 Wall. 356; Watson v. Sutro, supra. The facts constituting knowledge, or want of it, on the part of the agent, are proper subjects of proof, and are to be ascertained by testimony as in other cases; but, when ascertained, the constructive notice thereof to the principal is conclusive, and cannot be rebutted by showing that the agent did not in fact impart the information so acquired. Watson v. Sutro, supra. In the present case it does not appear that Holl, who acted as the attorney of Bithell, acquired any knowledge in relation to plaintiff's mortgage, or the mistake in its satisfaction, during the time he was engaged in effecting the Bithell loan. Whatever notice he had of the mistake in such satisfaction of plaintiff's mortgage, if any, was constructive and previously obtained. There is abundant authority to the point that notice to an agent, to be notice to his principal, must be given to him while acting in the course of his employment. Weisser v. Denison, 10 N. Y. 68; Doe v. Ingersoll, 49 Am. Dec. 57; Russell v. Sweezey, 22 Mich. 235; Smith v. Dunton, 42 Iowa, 48; Goodwin v. Dean, 50 Conn. 517; Pringle v.

Dunn, 37 Wis. 449. Lord Hardwicke, in discussing this rule, remarked that a different rule "would make purchasers' and mortgagees' titles depend altogether on the memory of their counselors and agents, and oblige them to apply to persons of less eminence as counsel, as not being so likely to have notice of former transactions." In Trentor v. Pothen, 46 Minn. 298, 49 N. W. 129, Mitchell, J., in referring to the question, expresses like views in the following language: "If a party who employs an attorney for the special purpose of examining an abstract, and passing upon the record title, is to be charged with notice of all knowledge which the attorney may have previously acquired from other transactions for other parties, it would be very dangerous to employ an attorney at all for any such purpose; and the one whom it would be most dangerous to employ would be the attorney having the most experience and the most extensive practice." The authorities in this state have, so far as observed, confined the limits of constructive notice to the bounds hereinbefore stated. It must be admitted, however, that the rule has in many instances and by eminent jurists been extended so as to deem the principal to have constructive notice of information acquired by the agent prior to and independent of the scope of the agency. A synopsis of the rule as thus indicated, taken from the syllabi of The Distilled Spirits, 11 Wall. 356, indicates fairly well the result of the reasoning of the court in that case: "The rule that notice to the agent is notice to the principal applies, not only to knowledge acquired by the agent in the particular transaction, but to knowledge acquired by him in a prior transaction, and present to his mind at the time he is acting as such agent, provided it be of such a character as he may communicate to his principal without breach of professional confidence." Pom. Eq. Jur. § 672, states the general rule to be limited by cases in which the transaction in question closely follows, and is intimately connected with, a prior transaction in which the agent was also engaged, and in which he acquired material information, or where the information obtained by the agent in a former transaction was so precise and definite that it is or must be present to his mind and memory in the second transaction; then such information operates as constructive notice to the principal in such second transaction. The same author adds that, "while this particular rule is settled by a strong array of authorities, the courts show a plain determination not to extend it, but to keep it confined within narrow and necessary limits."

It seems conceded on all hands that clear and satisfactory proof that the knowledge of the former transaction was present in the mind and memory of the agent, at the time of the second transaction, is necessary in order to bind the principal in such second transaction by constructive notice of the prior information of the agent. Conceding, then, this enlargement of the rule of notice, which in a few cases may prove a salutary one, but which needs to be closely guarded to prevent injustice from the difficulty and uncertainty which must attend its application, and it is not perceived how appellant's case is strengthened. The constructive notice to a principal comes from information—knowledge—possessed by his agent. Holl, as the attorney and agent of Bithell, had no knowledge or information to put him upon inquiry as to the prior mortgage of plaintiff, its assignment, or the mistake in its satisfaction. His only information was that furnished by the abstract and satisfaction, all of which showed the property clear of incumbrance. Constructive notice to the principal springs from actual knowledge, or such information as should awaken inquiry in a reasonable man, imparted to or acquired by the agent. The reason of the rule is that the agent has acquired knowledge which it was his duty to impart to his principal, and the presumption is that he has performed that duty. The knowledge of the agent is a prerequisite to the presumption, and, where the former fails, the latter has no application. The knowledge which Taylor possessed that plaintiff's mortgage was not to be satisfied in full, and which constructively bound his law partner, Holl, applied to their then principal, the plaintiff, and to their liabilities to each other. When Holl came to act in another capacity for a new principal and in a different matter, the notice to him which constructively bound such new principal was actual notice, founded upon knowledge or information which it was in his power to impart, the facts constituting which it was necessary to prove, and which, when proven, would raise an irrebuttable or conclusive presumption against such principal. The evidence and findings show that the mistake in the satisfaction of plaintiff's mortgage was a separate and distinct transaction, and that, so far from being in the mind of the attorney, Holl, at the date of the execution of the Bithell mortgage, he had not previously been aware of any fact in the matter, and did not become aware of the mistake in satisfying plaintiff's mortgage for many months thereafter. The case presented is this: Plaintiff and Bithell are both innocent parties. Plaintiff had a prior mortgage, which he, by mistake, satisfied in full without reading the satisfaction. This was negligence on his part, and, as one of two innocent parties must suffer as a consequence of such negligence, it is equitable and just that the loss should fall upon the plaintiff, by whose negligence the mishap was brought about. Schultz v. McLean, 93 Cal. 356, 28 Pac. 1053; Somes v. Brewer, 2 Pick. 201; Mundorff v. Wickersham, 3 Am. Rep. 531; Civil Code, § 3543.

The argument of appellant directed to the allegations of the pleadings, and the issues formed thereby, does not call for special notice, for the reason that, so far as any doubt is left as to the matters discussed, it is upon questions not going to the merits of the case.

The several objections made to the introduction of evidence, and the errors assigned upon the rulings relating thereto, do not require special notice, beyond the remark that, as between plaintiff and Bithell, they involved no error, and, as between them, the judgment and order appealed from should be affirmed. G. W. Harlow, administrator with the will annexed of the estate of David Fuhrman, deceased, was made a party defendant, who, it was alleged, claimed "some estate or interest in said mortgaged land, but that said estate or interest therein is subsequent to said mortgage lien (of plaintiff) thereon, and should be postponed thereto," etc. Harlow answered, denying that his estate or interest in certain of the mortgaged land, which he described, was subsequent to the alleged mortgage lien of plaintiff, but alleged that plaintiff's mortgage lien was inferior and subject to the mortgage lien of defendant thereinafter set forth. Defendant then proceeds, as it is expressed, in "further answering said amended complaint," to set out in an orderly and usual manner, as in a complaint or cross complaint, and to aver that on the 23d day of January, 1889, the defendant Parker made to David Fuhrman his promissory note for $2,000, payable one year after date, with interest at 10 per cent. per annum; the execution of a mortgage, to secure the payment thereof, upon certain described land, being upon a part of the land described in plaintiff's mortgage; the due recording of the mortgage on the 24th day of January, 1889; that the note is due and unpaid; the death of Fuhrman February 22, 1889; probate of his will; appointment of Harlow as administrator with the will annexed; that he duly qualified, etc.; that plaintiff and certain other named parties claim some interest in the premises, or some part thereof, as purchasers, mortgagees, or otherwise, all of which interests and claims, except that of the defendant Bithell, are subsequent to the lien of defendant's mortgage. The prayer is in the usual form for foreclosure of the mortgage, sale of the property, etc. In other words, although denominated an answer, it is in fact a cross complaint. The court in its findings and decree designates it as a cross complaint, and such in point of law it was and is. So treating it, the court found as follows: "I find all the allegations of the defendant Harlow's cross complaint true." There is in the complaint no allusion to the mortgage of Fuhrman or to Harlow, except that, as administrator, etc., he, in common with others, claimed some interest in the mortgaged premises, which was averred to be subsequent and subject to the lien of the plaintiff's mortgage, and should be foreclosed. Harlow denied that the lien of plaintiff's mortgage was prior to his, as above set forth. This was all there was in the complaint for him to deny. Having set out the mortgage of his testator, and asked for its foreclosure, he was entitled to make proof, as was done. of its due execution, etc. There was neither allegation nor proof that he had notice of plaintiff's mortgage. When Harlow's mortgage was recorded, it was constructive notice to the world; and, as against the prior mortgage of plaintiff, which had before that time been discharged of record, it is, in the absence of proof of actual notice, to be deemed prior in lien. If there was actual notice of plaintiff's mortgage imparted to Harlow, it was an affirmative matter, the proof of which devolved upon plaintiff; failing in which, he cannot complain. The judgment and order appealed from should be affirmed.

BEVERLY v. BLACKWOOD. (No. 18,185.)

CONSTRUCTION OF CONTRACT—EXCHANGE OF LANDS—GUARANTY OF PROFITS — AGREEMENT TO PAY MORTGAGE.

1. Defendant traded 840 acres of land to plaintiff for 95 acres; plaintiff giving a mortgage of $9,000 on the 840 acres to secure a guaranty that the 95 acres would sell for $23,000. Defendant agreed to place the property with certain persons to sell; the mortgage for $9,000 to be held "as collateral security until the" $23,000 was paid defendant from sales, and to be released "at any time" he received said $23,000. The agreement also provided that "the time of such sale is to be made on or before the first day of December, 1890." Held, that time was not of the essence of the contract, so that a failure to make sale of the 95 acres by December 1, 1890, would relieve defendant from any obligation to thereafter release the mortgage of $9,000.

2. Defendant having had an opportunity to sell the 95 acres for more than the $23,000 guarantied by plaintiff, the mortgage securing the guaranty was properly canceled.

3. Where the vendee of land agrees to "take up certain mortgages" thereon, provided the mortgagee will accept his money, he is bound to pay the principal, with interest to the maturity of the mortgage, if demanded by the mortgagee, and his offer of principal with accrued interest is insufficient.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Tehama county; John F. Ellison, Judge.

Action by Frank P. Beverly against William C. Blackwood to cancel a certain note and mortgage, in which defendant filed a cross complaint asking a foreclosure of such mortgage. From a judgment for plaintiff, and from an order denying a motion for a new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

N. P. Chipman, for appellant. Spencer & Burchard and Johnson & Chase, for respondent.

VANCLIEF, C. Action to cancel a note and mortgage made and executed by plaintiff to defendant March 15, 1890, in connection with, and as part of, a transaction by which an exchange of lands between the parties was effected. The judgment of the trial court was in favor of the plaintiff, and the defendant appeals from the judgment, and from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

The material facts, as found by the lower court, are substantially as follows: The plaintiff owned 95 acres of land in Santa Clara county, subject to two mortgages,—one to Roach, for $10,000, drawing interest at 8½ per cent. per annum, payable semiannually, to mature November 14, 1892; and the other to Frink, for $1,000, to become due May 15, 1890. The defendant owned a tract of 840 acres of unincumbered land situate in Tehama county. On March 15, 1890, an exchange of these lands was effected, in the following manner: Each executed to the other a deed of his land; the conveyance of the Santa Clara land to defendant being subject to, and defendant assuming the payment of, the said mortgages thereon. The plaintiff having represented that his 95 acres of land was worth $225 per acre, aggregating $21,375, and defendant desiring to realize that price, it was agreed that the land should be sold for a sum not less than $21,375 ($225 per acre), and that defendant should pay out of that sum the Roach and Frink mortgages, and that he would advance to plaintiff $1,000 at the time of the trade, which he did, and that this advancement of $1,000 should be considered a loan, in case the land should not sell for the price of $21,375; otherwise, to be considered paid from the proceeds of the sale. The plaintiff, on his part, agreed to guaranty that the land would sell for $21,375 if put upon the market according to the agreement; and as collateral security for the performance of this guaranty, and for no other purpose or consideration, plaintiff, contemporaneously with the execution of the exchange deeds, and as a part of the same transaction, executed the mortgage in question, for the sum of $9,550, upon the land in Tehama county conveyed to him by defendant. On the same day, and as part of the same transaction, the parties executed the following written agreement: "This agreement, made and entered into this 15th day of March, 1890, between Wm. C. Blackwood and Frank P. Beverly, that the said Wm. C. Blackwood is to allow the said tract of ninety-five acres near the town of Old Mountain View, deeded to him this day by Frank P. Beverly, to be sold in tracts to suit, and, should any cash payments be made on such sales, then the same shall be applied on the mortgage now held by Wm. C. Blackwood against the said Frank P. Beverly, as said mortgage is to be paid out of the sale of the said ninety-five acres of land; the price of said land to be two hundred and twenty-five dollars per acre, and such portion as may be sold on deferred approved payments, wherein the same shall draw a rate of interest, then said interest received from such sales shall be applied to the interest on the mortgage now held by Wm. C. Blackwood from Frank P. Beverly. The time of making such sale to the first day of December, 1890. Said Beverly agrees to keep place in good order and repair during the existence of this contract. [Seal.] Wm. C. Blackwood. [Seal.] F. P. Beverly. Witness: N. K. Spect." Two days later the defendant complained to plaintiff that this agreement was imperfect, as not expressing the understanding of the parties, and asked that it be modified. To this request the plaintiff assented, and thereupon the following, drawn by or for the defendant, was substituted: "This agreement, made and entered into the 17th day of March, 1890, between Wm. C. Blackwood, the party of the first part, and Frank P. Beverly, the party of the second part: That, for and in consideration of a certain sale and exchange made between the within-named parties, the said party of the first part agrees to take up certain mortgages, of $11,500, now standing against the lands deeded to him by the said party of the second part, provided the party holding the same will accept his money. Then the said party of the first part is to place said tract of ninety-five acres in the hands of W. R. Mathews and N. K. Spect, to at once place on the market, in tracts to suit purchasers, at not less than $250 per acre, or as much more as they may obtain on said sale per acre; and in the event of any sales the said party of the first part shall receive the sum of $23,000; simply holding as collateral security, until the within-named $23,000 is paid, a mortgage on the 840 acres of the party of the second part, of $9,550. But at any time that the party of the first part shall receive the within-named $23,000, with interest on $11,500 of that amount, with interest at eight and one-half per cent. per annum, the mortgage holding [holden] against the lands of the party of the second part shall be released by the holder of the same. The terms of such sale shall be one-third cash, and the balance secured by mortgage on said land at eight per cent. per annum, said interest payable annually; and when the said party of the first part shall receive the sum of eight thousand dollars cash, and a mortgage for balance on said tract of land, drawing interest at the rate of eight per cent. per annum, then he is to release the mortgage of $9,550, which he now holds against said party of the second part. The time of such sale is to be made on or before the 1st day of December, 1890, unless otherwise agreed to by both parties. All former contracts between said parties are this day canceled. Wm. C. Blackwood. F. P. Beverly. Witness: N. K. Spect."

It will be observed that this modified agreement is not only more explicit than the first, but materially differs from it, in that the Santa Clara land is to be sold for the price of $250 per acre, from the proceeds of which defendant was to receive $23,000, with interest on $11,500 thereof, out of which he was to satisfy the mortgage in question. The court found that the defendant could have sold the Santa Clara land within the period specified in the agreement for a much larger sum than $23,000, to wit, $25,000, and was requested and urged by plaintiff to do so, but that he refused to sell, or to permit a sale, at that price, and that his only excuse for so refusing to sell was that Roach would not accept the principal and the then accrued interest as satisfaction of his mortgage, but demanded interest up to the date at which the note and mortgage would mature,—November 14, 1892. It is claimed for appellant that he was not bound to sell the Santa Clara land unless, before December 1, 1890, Roach would accept as satisfaction of his mortgage a sum equal to the principal and accrued interest; and it is further contended that the time mentioned in the agreement, within which the sale should be made, was of the essence of the contract, and therefore defendant was not bound to sell at any price after December 1, 1890, but was at liberty to keep the land, and yet hold and enforce his mortgage for $9,500 on plaintiff's land in Tehama county. This is the theory of his defense and of his cross complaint, by which he seeks to foreclose his mortgage on the Tehama county land in this action; and, accordingly, it is found that before the trial of the action he conveyed the Santa Clara land to his daughters by deeds of gift, and thus put it out of his power to sell that land at any price. That the conclusion drawn from this theory works a gross injustice upon the plaintiff is not denied, but counsel for appellant say in their brief that the apparent injustice results from the facts that the Tehama land has greatly depreciated in value, while the value of the Santa Clara land has increased, since the exchange; but this is negatived by the findings of the court, amply justified by the evidence. The court found that at the date of the exchange the market value of the Tehama land was only $4,200, and that it has never since been of any greater value, and that the Santa Clara land, at the time of the exchange, had a market value of $25,000, and has continued to be of that value ever since. It does not appear that there was any express estimate of the value of the Tehama land at the time of the exchange, but it may fairly be inferred that it was estimated to be worth about $9,500.

The point that the time mentioned in the contract within which the Santa Clara land should be sold was of the essence of the contract is not supported by the language of the contract, besides being inconsistent with the extrinsic facts and circumstances, which may be properly considered as helps to the construction of that language. It is not declared in the contract that time shall be of the essence of the contract, and there is no limitation of the time within which the contract for the release of the mortgage on the Tehama land must be performed, and no provision that it should become an independent charge upon the Tehama land if the Santa Clara land was not sold within a limited period. On the contrary, the contract expressly provides that that mortgage was held simply "as collateral security until the within-named $23,000 is paid," and that "at any time the party of the first part shall receive the within-named $23,000, with interest on $11,500 of that amount at the agreed rate of eight and one-half per cent. per annum," or "when the said party of the first part shall receive the sum of eight thousand dollars cash, and a mortgage for the balance, on said tract of land, drawing interest at the rate of eight per cent. per annum, then he is to release the mortgage of $9,500 which he now holds against the said party of the first part." The general rule of equity is that time is not of the essence of the contract, unless it clearly appears from the terms of the contract, in the light of all the circumstances, that such was the intention of the parties. Steele v. Branch, 40 Cal. 11. But, if time was of the essence of the contract, the defendant was the only party in default, and can take no advantage from his own wrong. Newton v. Hull, 90 Cal. 493, 27 Pac. 429.

But it is claimed that the defendant was not in default, because he was not bound to sell unless Roach would accept the principal and the accrued interest as satisfaction of his mortgage. But I think this is a mistake. Roach demanded only what he was entitled to by the terms of his mortgage, which terms were known to defendant at the date of his agreement with plaintiff, of March 17, 1890, the language of which is: "The said party of the first part agrees to take up certain mortgages of $11,500 now standing against the lands deeded to him by the said party of the second part, provided the party holding the same will accept his money." How much money? Undoubtedly, so much as he was entitled to receive. There is no pretense that Roach refused to accept, as satisfaction of his mortgage, what he was entitled to receive, or that he demanded more. The difference between what Roach asked and what defendant offered was the interest on the interest to be paid in advance, which was more than compensated by the increased price which plaintiff was offered for the land over and above the price named in the contract. The judgment rests firmly upon the equitable maxim that "that which ought to have been done is to be regarded as done, in favor of him to whom and against him from whom performance is due" (Civ. Code, § 3529), as applied in Daggett v. Rankin, 31 Cal. 327, where it is said that "equity looks upon things agreed to be done as actually performed; the true meaning of which is that equity will treat the subject-matter, as to collateral consequences and incidents, in the same manner as if the final acts contemplated by the parties had been executed exactly as they ought to have been." The defendant could and ought to have sold the Santa Clara lands for the price and within the time contemplated by the parties, and satisfied the mortgage in question from the proceeds of the sale, as he agreed to do; but, instead of doing so, he elected to hold the lands, and to give them to his daughters, and thereby to put it out of his power to perform his contract. Therefore, the mortgage on the Tehama lands should be deemed satisfied, as it ought to have been; and the judgment, being to this effect, is clearly right.

Some points are made upon the admissibility of evidence, on the ground of irrelevancy; but all the evidence objected to, if not relevant to the issues upon the decision of which the judgment depends, were relevant to the issue of fraud, upon which the court found for defendant. Evidence as to the value of the lands at the time of the exchange was most earnestly objected to, but it was not only relevant to the issue of fraud, but was relevant as a circumstance to be considered in construing the contract. I think the order and judgment should be affirmed.

We concur: HAYNES, C.; BELCHER, C.

JACOB v. CARTER. (No. 18,214.)

EJECTMENT—DEFENSES — PLEADING AND PROOF—NEW TRIAL.

1. Where, in ejectment, the complaint merely alleges plaintiff's ownership and right to possession, and that defendant is in possession, and refuses to surrender the same, and the answer denies the ownership and right to possession, defendant may prove any facts showing that plaintiff had no right of entry or possession when the action was commenced.

2. Where, in ejectment, the defense is possession under contract of purchase, indebtedness of plaintiff to defendant for salary and money paid in excess of the payments required may be considered as a performance of the contract, under Code Civ. Proc. § 440, which provides that, where cross demands have existed between persons under such circumstances, that, if one sued the other a counterclaim could have been set up, the two demands shall be deemed compensated so far as they equal each other.

3. A new trial may be granted as to the issues raised by a cross complaint without granting one as to those raised by the complaint and answer.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Tulare county; Wheaton A. Kent, Judge.

Action by Elias Jacob against D. F. Carter. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Bradley & Farnsworth, for appellant. Daggett & Adams, for respondent.

VANCLIEF, C. Action of ejectment to recover a tract of land in Tulare county. The complaint alleges, generally, the plaintiff's ownership and right of possession, and that defendant was in possession, and refused to surrender possession to plaintiff on demand therefor. The answer denies plaintiff's title and his right to possession, and avers defendant's right of possession. The defendant also filed a cross complaint, in which he alleged that on October 18, 1888, the plaintiff and defendant entered into a written agreement, whereby plaintiff agreed to sell, and the defendant to purchase, the land in controversy, at the price of $2,500, upon which $250 was paid and credited at the date of the contract, and whereby it was agreed that the balance of the principal should be payable on or before October 18, 1893, with interest at 8 per cent. per annum, payable annually in advance on or before October 18th of each year, and, if not punctually so paid, then the said party of the first part "shall have the right to enter upon and take possession of said premises, with all the improvements thereon;" that from the date of said agreement until May 4, 1890, the defendant was in the employ of plaintiff as general agent at a salary of $50 per month, and during that period paid and expended money for the plaintiff, and boarded his employes, for which plaintiff agreed to compensate him, over and above said salary; and that it was understood and agreed, at the date of said written agreement, that plaintiff should credit said salary and all other indebtedness of plaintiff to defendant for money paid and for board of employes which might accrue, as payments on the purchase price of said land; and that on May 4, 1890, plaintiff and defendant had a settlement, upon which it was found and agreed that the land had been fully paid for, and that plaintiff would make defendant a deed therefor, as soon as he received a deed for the same from the Southern Pacific Railroad Company, which, it is averred, he has received since the date of said settlement. Upon these facts the defendant, by his cross complaint, seeks to enforce a conveyance of the land from plaintiff to himself. Plaintiff, in answer to the cross complaint, denied all the averments thereof, except that he had received a deed from the railroad company since the date of the alleged settlement. By agreement of the parties all the issues raised by the complaint and answer thereto and by the cross complaint and answer thereto were tried together by the court and a jury, it being agreed that the jury should render a general verdict upon the issues raised by the complaint and answer thereto, and a special verdict upon such of the issues raised by the cross complaint and answer thereto as might be submitted by the court. The verdict of the jury, both on the general issue and on the special issues submitted, was in favor of the defendant. The court adopted the verdict on the special issues, and made some additional findings upon issues in the cross suit, and rendered judgment in favor of defendant upon the whole case, including a decree that plaintiff convey the land in question to defendant. The plaintiff moved for a new trial, which was denied as to the issues arising on plaintiff's complaint and the answer thereto, but granted upon the issues in the cross suit. The plaintiff appeals from the judgment, and from an order denying his motion for new trial upon the issues raised by his complaint and the answer thereto.

1. There can be no doubt as to the power of the court to refuse to disturb the general verdict upon the issues raised by the complaint and answer thereto, and, at the same time, to grant a new trial as to the equity part of the case. Duff v. Duff, 35 Pac. 437, and cases cited. The cross suit is distinct from the action of ejectment, and might have been separately tried; but, since the plaintiff expressly stipulated that the two actions should be tried together, as they were, he would not be heard to object, and cannot be allowed any advantage on this ground; nor have his counsel made any such point.

2. The order denying a new trial in the ejectment suit is not, as contended by appellant, inconsistent with the order granting a new trial in the cross suit. The complaint is extremely general, alleging merely plaintiff's ownership and right of possession, and that defendant wrongfully withholds the possession; and the answer of the defendant is quite as general. It denies plaintiff's ownership, and his alleged right of possession, and affirmatively avers "that on the 18th day of October, 1888, he was, and that he ever since has been, and that he still is, entitled to the possession of all the real property described in said complaint." Under this answer defendant was entitled to prove any facts showing that plaintiff had no right of entry or possession at the time the action was commenced (Semple v. Cook, 50 Cal. 29; Roberts v. Columbet, 63 Cal. 22); and, even if this were not so, I think those facts alleged in the cross complaint which constitute a defense to the action at law, if proved, might have been properly considered as such defense, whether sufficient to entitle defendant to equitable relief or not; namely, the alleged facts that defendant was in possession by plaintiff's consent, under a contract to purchase which defendant had fully performed on his part, up to the time of the commencement of the action of ejectment. Meeker v. Dalton, 75 Cal. 154, 16 Pac. 764. The evidence, though conflicting, is amply sufficient to justify a finding by the jury that the indebtedness of plaintiff to defendant for money paid and for salary accrued prior to the commencement of the action more than equaled the interest on the purchase money and the taxes on the land up to that time; and, if not, technical payment of such interest and taxes was more than compensation therefor, by the effect of section 440 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which provides: "When cross demands have existed between persons under such circumstances that, if one had brought an action against the other, a counterclaim could have been set up, the two demands shall be deemed compensated so far as they equal each other, and neither can be deprived of the benefit thereof by assignment or death of the other." The only default on the part of defendant claimed by counsel for appellant is the failure to pay $360 interest on the purchase money which had become due before the commencement of the action, for they admit that, by the true construction of the contract, the principal was not to be paid until October 18, 1893, but insist that the interest was to be paid on or before October 18th of each year, and, if not so paid, the plaintiff was entitled to the possession. Therefore, the evidence being sufficient to justify the jury in finding that the $360 interest had been paid or compensated before the commencement of the action, a new trial of the action of ejectment was properly denied. At the same time the evidence may not have been sufficient to justify a finding that the principal of the purchase money had been fully paid, or a finding of the settlement alleged to have been made on May 4, 1890; and, if such was the case, a new trial of the cross suit was properly granted. But whether properly or not is immaterial, as there is no appeal from the order granting a new trial. It is considered only so far as necessary to show that it is not inconsistent with the order denying a new trial of action of ejectment. I think the judgment and order should be affirmed.

CLARKSON v. HOYT. (No. 14,716.)

ACTION ON NOTE—PLEADING AND PROOF—AMENDMENT—ACCOUNT STATED—EFFECT.

1. In an action on a note given for services for managing defendant's cattle ranch, where plaintiff simply introduced his note and rested his case, defendant's motion thereupon to have the court appoint a referee under Code Civ. Proc. § 639, subsec. 1, providing that, when an issue of fact requires the examination of a long account, the court may appoint a referee to decide the issue, was properly denied, the note implying a settlement of the account between the parties, and it not then appearing that the examination of a long account was necessary.

2. In an action on a note given to settle a balance found due on a statement of accounts, the overruling of defendant's motion to amend his answer so as to attack the statement of accounts on the ground of fraud is not an abuse of discretion where the proposed amendment alleges the fraud only in general terms, without pointing out the facts which constitute it.

3. In an action on a note given for a balance found due on a settlement of accounts, where defendant failed to allege fraud in the account, his offer to show that plaintiff received money as his agent, for which he failed to account, was properly overruled.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1.

Appeal from superior court, Siskiyou county; Edward Sweeny, Judge.

Action by James F. Clarkson against Perry Hoyt on a promissory note. From a judgment for plaintiff and order denying defendant's motion for a new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

H. B. Warren and Mesick & Maxwell, for appellant. John V. Brown and H. B. Gillis, for respondent.

BELCHER, C. This is an action to recover the amount due on a promissory note for $1,969, given by defendant to plaintiff, and dated "Lakeview, Or., May 25, 1888."

The material parts of the answer are as follows: It is alleged that in 1880 defendant was a resident in Siskiyou county, Cal., and was the owner of two fully-equipped stock ranches in Lake county, Or., and also of a large number of cattle, horses, mares, and mules, and was then engaged in the business of stock-raising in that county and state; that in September, 1880, he employed the plaintiff, at an agreed salary of $40 per month, to take the sole care, management, and control of all said real and personal property in Oregon, as the agent of defendant, and in his name and for his benefit to conduct the business of raising, caring for, and managing the stock of cattle, horses, and mules aforesaid, and to preserve and keep in good repair the said ranches, machinery, and all appliances used in said business, to purchase all necessary supplies and hire all necessary labor that should be required in conducting the said business, and to market, from time to time, as the same should become salable, said cattle, horses, and mules; that, pursuant to such employment, the plaintiff, on September 15, 1880, received into his possession, and took the entire and sole control, care, and management of, said real and personal property, and thereafter continued to have and exercise such control, care, and management until December 15, 1888, when he resigned his position; that from time to time during his employment plaintiff informed defendant that he did not wish to draw all of his salary, but preferred to leave the same in defendant's hands, drawing interest at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum, and that a portion of his salary did remain in defendant's hands until the 25th of May, 1888; that on said last-mentioned day, and while defendant was temporarily on a visit to plaintiff at Lakeview, Or., plaintiff demanded of defendant a settlement of all of his salary then unpaid, and defendant, then believing that he had faithfully discharged his duties as agent, and upon his representation that the full amount of $1,969 was due him on account of his salary and interest thereon to that date, executed and delivered to him the promissory note sued upon; "that said promissory note was so executed and delivered without any accounting or settlement between plaintiff and defendant as to the general business of plaintiff's said agency, and under the said representations by plaintiff to defendant that his said business was all in good condition, and under the belief by defendant that all of plaintiff's said representations were true;" that early in the summer of 1888, and after the execution of the said note, defendant commenced to investigate the true condition of his said property and business, and upon such investigation he for the first time learned that all of plaintiff's statements and representations were false, and "that the plaintiff had fraudulently and in violation of his said trust spent large sums of money belonging to the defendant for matters and things personal to himself, and entirely foreign to the necessary management and care of defendant's said property and business, and that he had from time to time sold and otherwise disposed of a large number of defendant's said cattle, horses, and mules, and rendered no account whatever thereof to the defendant, nor paid to defendant any of the profits of said sales;" that at the time of the execution of the said note the defendant was not indebted to the plaintiff in the sum named therein, or in any other sum or amount whatever, for salary due plaintiff, or the interest thereon, or otherwise, but that, on the contrary, the plaintiff was then, and now is, indebted to the defendant in the sum of fully $6,000; and that the said note was made, executed, and delivered as aforesaid without any consideration whatever. And the prayer was that plaintiff take nothing by his action. The court below found against the defendant upon all the issues raised, and rendered judgment in favor of the plaintiff according to the prayer of his complaint, from which, and from an order denying his motion for a new trial, defendant appeals.

When the plaintiff had introduced in evidence his note and rested his case, the defendant moved the court to appoint a referee to take and report an accounting between plaintiff and defendant. The plaintiff objected, upon the ground, among others, that the parties had settled their accounts in full up to the date of the note, and the note was given for the balance then found due. The court denied the motion, and held that it was premature at that stage of the case; that under section 639, subsec. 1, Code Civ. Proc., a referee should not be appointed until it is made to appear that there is an issue of fact which requires the examination of a long account; and, also, that the execution of the note by defendant to plaintiff implied a settlement at that time. This ruling is assigned as error, but we think it clearly correct. The defendant was then called and sworn as a witness in his own behalf. It appears from his testimony that there were three settlements between the parties,—one in November, 1883, one in October, 1885, and one in May, 1888,—and that in making the last settlement plaintiff and defendant spent about a week in going over and examining all plaintiff's accounts concerning his agency business; that, as a result of such examination, a balance of $1,969 was found due from defendant to plaintiff, for which the note in suit was then given; and that defendant then understood that the accounting was full and complete. At the conclusion of defendant's testimony, he renewed his motion for the appointment of a referee. The plaintiff again objected, and the court denied the motion, holding that it could not be granted under the pleadings as they then stood. The court said "that defendant, having alleged that there had been no account stated, embracing the matters entrusted to plaintiff as agent, which allegation set forth in the answer is deemed in law to be denied, might have an accounting of those matters, if such allegation should be found to be true. But the evidence introduced by the defendant, pertinent to said matter, conclusively shows that there was an account stated, embracing the agency business, as well as plaintiff's claim for wages, that there was a balance struck, and that defendant gave the note sued on for the exact amount of such balance, whereby he promised to pay it." There was obviously no error in this ruling. Thereafter the defendant moved the court for leave to amend his answer by striking out the part thereof which alleged that the said note was executed and delivered without any accounting or settlement between plaintiff and defendant as to the general business of plaintiff's said agency, and by inserting the following: "That settlements between these parties plaintiff and defendant in regard to the transactions of plaintiff's agency were had as follows: One about October 1, 1883, the next about October 1, 1885, and the last one about May 25, 1888. That defendant kept no books of account of the transactions of plaintiff's agency, and that said settlements were made upon such books and papers as plaintiff produced at such settlements, and that plaintiff at such settlements stated to defendant that such books and papers so presented by him at such settlements contained all the items of accounts of receipts and expenditures touching his transactions as such agent. That defendant, shortly after said last-mentioned settlement, ascertained that the said statements of plaintiff were false, and that plaintiff's books of account and papers so presented at said settlement, and upon which said settlements were had and made, did not contain a full and complete statement of the items of such receipts and expenditures, and that plaintiff had received large amounts of money as herein stated, and which did not appear on plaintiff's said books or other papers at the times of such settlements, and of which defendant at such time and times had no knowledge, and that plaintiff had charged this defendant with large sums of money in said settlements, which were never received by said defendant, and of which defendant at such time and times had no knowledge."

The plaintiff objected to the amendment on the ground, in substance, that it admitted that there were three settled and stated accounts between the parties, the last settlement resulting in the giving the note sued on, and that, while it attempted to set up fraud on the part of the plaintiff for the purpose of having the account opened and reexamined, it failed to state the facts constituting the fraud specifically or sufficiently, but charged it only in general terms. The court sustained the objection, and this ruling is also assigned as error. The Code provides that "the court may likewise, in its discretion, after notice to the adverse party, allow, upon such terms as may be just, an amendment to any pleading or proceeding." Code Civ. Proc. § 473. Applications to amend pleadings are addressed to the discretion of the trial court, and, while that discretion should be liberally and freely exercised to effect the ends of justice, orders granting or refusing such applications will not be disturbed on appeal unless it appears that the court abused its discretion. Emeric v. Alvarado, 90 Cal. 448, 27 Pac. 356; Wixon v. Devine, 91 Cal. 477, 27 Pac. 777. An account stated may be impeached for fraud or mistake (Green v. Thornton, 96 Cal. 67, 30 Pac. 965), but the burden is upon the party seeking to impeach it to set out in his pleading the particular facts constituting the fraud or mistake relied on. "It is not sufficient to aver fraud in general terms; the facts constituting the fraud must be alleged. This is held in many cases decided by this court. This course of decision commenced at an early date in this state." Spring Valley Waterworks v. City of San Francisco, 82 Cal. 321, 22 Pac. 910, 1046, and see cases cited. "In defense to an action on a promissory note, it is not sufficient to plead in general terms want of consideration, and that the note was obtained by fraud. The answer should set out the circumstances under which the note was given, and point out the facts which constitute the fraud." Gushee v. Leavitt, 5 Cal. 160. Here the offered amendment fails to point out particularly the facts constituting the alleged fraud of the plaintiff. It charges that the plaintiff, at the time of the settlements, made statements that the books and papers presented by him contained all the items of accounts of receipts and expenditures touching his transactions as such agent, and that defendant shortly after the last settlement ascertained that these statements were false, but it wholly fails to point out wherein or in what particulars they were false. It also charges that plaintiff had received large amounts of money which did not appear in his books or papers, and of which defendant at that time had no knowledge, but it does not say what amounts, or when or from what source they were received. It also charges that plaintiff had charged defendant with large sums of money which were never received by him, and of which at such time or times he had no knowledge, but does not state what the sums were, nor under what dates they were charged, nor how defendant could have been ignorant at the time of the settlement as to the money charged to have been paid to himself. Such being the character of the proposed amendment, we do not think it can be said that the court abused its discretion in refusing to allow it to be filed.

The defendant next offered "to introduce evidence to prove that plaintiff in the month of July or August, 1883, as the agent of the defendant, sold and delivered to one J. H. Sherez twelve head of mules, the property of the defendant, at the price of one hundred dollars per head; that the said sale was never accounted for or included in the settlements made by plaintiff and defendant, and that said plaintiff represented to defendant that no such sale was made." The plaintiff objected to the offered evidence upon the ground that it appeared from the defendant's testimony that there had been three settlements between the parties since the date of the alleged transaction, and that, under the pleadings, the evidence was inadmissible to impeach and open up the settlements so made. The court sustained the objection, and the plaintiff excepted to this ruling. We think the ruling proper. The evidence was manifestly offered for the purpose of impeaching and reopening a settled and stated account on the ground of fraud. But this, as we have seen, could not be done under the answer as it was framed and stood when the offer was made. In our opinion the judgment and order appealed from should be affirmed.

We concur: SEARLS, C.; HAYNES, C.

W. A. Anderson and Grove L. Johnson, for appellant. Clinton L. White, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. On June 22, 1891, an ordinance "regulating saloons, barrooms," etc., "and providing the amounts of city licenses to be paid by keepers of saloons, barrooms and other places where wines and liquors are sold," was passed by the board of trustees of the city of Sacramento. The ordinance provided that every person within the limits of the city who keeps a barroom, saloon, or other place where liquors are sold by the glass or bottle, to be drank on the premises, shall pay quarterly in advance "a city license for pursuing said business of $45 for each and every quarter," and that all licenses collectible under the ordinance should become due and payable on the 1st days of January, April, July, and October of each year. It also provided that it should be in force from and after June 30, 1891, and all ordinances and parts of ordinances in conflict with its provisions were repealed. The only action taken by the board in reference to the publication of the ordinance was an order made on the day of its passage "that the matter be referred to the mayor for publication or not, as he saw fit." It was, however, by direction of the mayor, published in the Daily Bee, a newspaper published and having a general circulation in the city, for the period of 10 days, commencing June 22 and ending July 2, 1891. Prior to the time of the passage of the said ordinance, an ordinance regulating saloons, and fixing a different sum to be paid as a license for that business, was in force in the city. On July 1, 1891, and thereafter, until this action was commenced, defendant kept a saloon in the city, where liquors were sold by the glass, to be drank on the premises. He tendered the quarterly amount which was due under the old ordinance, but refused to pay the $45 required by the new one. On July 24, 1891, the plaintiff, by order of its city collector, commenced this action against the defendant, alleging the passage of the said ordinance, and that $45 became due from defendant thereunder on July 1st; and also that, under the provisions of plaintiff's charter, $1 should be added for defendant's failure to pay the license money within five days after it became due, and $15 for liquidated damages; and praying judgment for the said several sums. The defendant answered, denying all the averments of the complaint, and alleging that the "action was not brought by the proper person, namely, city collector of the city of Sacramento." The case was tried by the court without a jury, and the findings and judgment were in favor of the plaintiff, from which judgment, and an order denying his motion for a new trial, defendant appeals.

1. The charter of the city provided that the board of trustees "shall publish all ordinances for ten days in some newspaper published in said city." St. 1863, p. 415, § 16. Appellant contends that this required all ordinances to be published by order of the board, and that, as the ordinance in hand was not so published, it never became valid and effective. In support of this position several decisions of this court are cited, but they were all made in cases for the enforcement of street assessments, where publication was declared necessary to give the boards jurisdiction to make orders for the proposed improvements. Those cases are not in point here. In this case there was no provision that the ordinance should not take effect till after its publication, and, in our opinion, it took effect on its passage, and publication thereafter was a ministerial act to give the people notice of its requirements, like the publication of statutes after they are passed by the legislature. See People v. Cole, 70 Cal. 59, 11 Pac. 481, where it was held that, although there was express direction that the ordinance should be recorded, yet the recording was not a condition precedent to its taking effect. And see, also, Com. v. Davis, 140 Mass. 485, 4 N. E. 577, where it was held that a requirement that a city ordinance should be published was directory merely.

2. It is next contended that the ordinance and section 50 of the city charter, under which the action was brought, are unconstitutional, because in conflict with section 12 of article 11 of the constitution; and in support of this contention People v. Martin, 60 Cal. 153, is cited. The constitutional provision is as follows: "The legislature shall have no power to impose taxes upon counties, cities, towns or other public or municipal corporations, or upon the inhabitants or property thereof, for county, city, town or other municipal purposes, but may by general laws vest in the corporate authorities thereof the power to assess and collect taxes for such purposes." The case cited was an action to recover the amount of license tax claimed to be due from the defendant under certain sections of the Political Code, because he was carrying on the business of selling goods, wares, and merchandise at a fixed place of business. It was held that, such taxes being imposed for county purposes, the sections of the Code imposing them were clearly inconsistent with the section of the constitution above quoted, and therefore no longer in force. That case has obviously no bearing upon the question in hand, for here the license was not imposed by the legislature, but by a municipal ordinance which was authorized.

3. It is further contended that the ordinance under which the action was brought was a police regulation simply, and hence a civil action cannot be maintained for the collection of a license fee imposed by it. Section 50 of the city charter gives to the city a remedy by civil action in any case where a person, required by any ordinance to take out a license and pay therefor, shall fail to do so. No distinction is made as to the object for which the license is required, but the licenses which may be collected by civil action are such as are required of a person to authorize him to "transact, do, or carry on any business, trade, or occupation, matter or thing." And, as said in a similar case (County of San Luis Obispo v. Hendricks, 71 Cal. 245, 11 Pac. 682): "The license tax sought to be recovered in this action is not a penalty, but in the nature of a debt due from the defendant to the county [city], or, what is the same thing for present purposes, a duty devolved upon the defendant personally, which can be enforced precisely as though he had contracted with the county [city] to pay such sum of money [citing cases]. A penalty is in the nature of a punishment for the nonperformance of an act, or for the performance of an unlawful act, and in the former case stands in lieu of the act to be performed. Here the action is to enforce the precise duty."

4. Some other points are made for a reversal, but we see no particular merit in any of them, and they need not be specially noticed. It follows that the judgment and order must be affirmed, and it is so ordered.

BRAVERMAN v. FRESNO CANAL & IRRIGATION CO. (No. 18,210.)

Review on Appeal—Instructions.

An assignment of error to the giving of an instruction recited must be supported by a statement in the substantive part of the bill of exceptions showing that such instruction was given.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Fresno county; M. K. Harris, Judge.

Action by Louis Braverman against the Fresno Canal & Irrigation Company for damages. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Geo. E. Church, for appellant. L. L. Cory, for respondent.

FITZGERALD, J. This is an action for damages caused to plaintiff's vineyard by an overflow of water from the canal of defendant, through its alleged negligence. The case was tried by a jury, with a verdict and judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals from the judgment and the order denying its motion for a new trial.

The principal ground relied on by appellant for a reversal of the judgment is the alleged error of the court in giving to the jury, against its objection, a certain instruction relating to exemplary damages. This point cannot be considered, for the reason that the stating or substantive part of the statement contains no such instruction. The incorporation of the instruction complained of in the assignment of errors, coupled with the statement that it was given against the objection of appellant, is not sufficient to show that such instruction was given or excepted to. The specification of the particular errors upon which the moving party will rely, although an essential part of the statement, is, as was said by Mr. Justice Harrison in People v. Faulke, 96 Cal. 17, 30 Pac. 837, "the act of the attorney annexed to the bill of exceptions after the trial, and for the purpose of pointing out the particulars in which errors were committed at the trial. The matters to which such specifications point must be found in the substantive portion of the bill of exceptions; otherwise, they cannot be considered." With reference to the remaining errors complained of, it is sufficient to say that they are either immaterial or untenable. Let the judgment and order be affirmed.

SECULOVICH v. MORTON. (No. 15,393.)

(Supreme Court of California. March 24, 1894.)

SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE—LACHES.

A bill for specific performance of a parol agreement to convey land on demand, after the happening of a contingency, alleging a demand 24 years thereafter, and defendant's continued absence from the state, is demurrable, as, in spite of defendant's absence, plaintiff could have had a commissioner appointed to convey the land to him, and the demand was not made within a reasonable time.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco.

Action by Peter T. Seculovich against Samuel P. Morton for specific performance. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Moses G. Cobb, for appellant. A. C. Freeman, for respondent.

PATERSON, J. On January 16, 1862, plaintiff purchased and caused to be conveyed to George H. Morton, infant son of defendant, a certain lot of land in the city and county of San Francisco, upon the parol agreement that if the child should die unmarried, and without issue, before he arrived at the age of 21 years, defendant, after distribution of the property to him as heir, would, on demand of plaintiff, immediately convey the same to the latter. The child died when a little over five years of age,—December 16, 1866,—but no demand was made by plaintiff for a conveyance until February 14, 1890. In February, 1891, this action was brought for a judgment declaring that defendant holds the land in trust for plaintiff, and requiring him to convey the same. A demurrer to the complaint was sustained, and, plaintiff failing to amend, judgment was entered in favor of defendant.

It is claimed that the cause of action stated is not stale, or barred by the statute of limitations, because it is alleged in the complaint that within six months after the death of George H., defendant left this state, and has ever since resided in the state of Maryland, where the demand above referred to was made upon him February 14, 1890. We think the demurrer was properly sustained. The defendant's absence from the state did not deprive the plaintiff of a remedy. He might have invoked the authority of the court, and, upon service of process in the manner prescribed by the statute, could have procured the appointment of a commissioner to convey the property to him. Perkins v. Wakeham, 86 Cal. 580, 25 Pac. 51; Applegate v. Mining Co., 117 U. S. 266, 6 Sup. Ct. 742; Arndt v. Griggs, 134 U. S. 320, 10 Sup. Ct. 557; Adams v. Cowles, 95 Mo. 501, 8 S. W. 711; Felch v. Hooper, 119 Mass. 52. Irrespective of the question whether the defendant's absence from the state prevented the running of the statute of limitations, we think the judgment of the court below was right, because the plaintiff did not make a demand within a reasonable time. Failing to do so, his cause of action became barred by his laches. True, it is a general rule that the statute does not run against an express trust where there is concealed fraud; but when the injured party has been guilty of great laches in the prosecution of his remedy he will be barred in equity, on account of the paramount importance of having titles settled. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, San Diego county; E. S. Torrance, Judge.

Action by the San Diego Savings Bank against one Lowenstein. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Modified and affirmed.

Luce & McDonald, for appellant. Conklin & Hughes, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. The questions involved in this case were determined in the case of Clemens v. Luce (Cal.) 35 Pac. 1032, and upon the authority of that case the judgment herein must be modified by striking out the amount allowed for attorney's fees. There is also a clerical error in the judgment, by which the sheriff is directed to pay to the plaintiff out of the proceeds of the sale the sum of $8,861.64, instead of $7,861.94, the amount found due upon the promissory note, and the respondent consents that the proper correction may be made. The court below is directed to modify the judgment as herein indicated, and, as thus modified, the judgment and order will stand affirmed.

(Supreme Court of California. April 11, 1894.)

ACTION FOR SERVICES—EVIDENCE—CONTRACT BY AGENT—FINDING OF JURY.

1. In an action for services rendered by plaintiff's assignor, the complaint alleged that they were rendered at the special request of defendant. Defendant, in its answer, admitted that the services were rendered, and set out a copy of the agreement between such assignor and its manager. Held, that it was not error to admit such agreement in evidence against an objection by the defendant.

2. In setting forth the agreement, defendant alleged that it was made by G. "as" manager of defendant corporation. The agreement purported to have been made on defendant's behalf, and G. testified that he made it on behalf of defendant. Held, that an objection by defendant that it was on its face not its agreement, but the agreement of G., its manager, was not tenable.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; John Hunt, Judge.

Action by one Caffrey against the Omilak Gold & Silver Mining Company to recover for services rendered defendant by one Taggart, plaintiff's assignor. From a judgment for plaintiff, and from an order denying a motion for a new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Estee & Miller, for appellant. A. Morgenthal, for respondent.

HARRISON, J. The plaintiff brought this action to recover for services rendered to the defendant in Alaska by his assignor, Taggart, between September 7, 1889, and September 22, 1891, for which he alleged that the defendant had agreed to pay the sum of $75 per month for a portion of the time, and $100 per month for the remainder. The defendant, in its answer, admitted that Taggart, the plaintiff's assignor, had rendered services to it, as specified in the complaint, during a portion of this period, and set forth a copy of the agreement between him and its manager, under which the services had been rendered, and alleged that by reason of the failure of Taggart to perform his part of said agreement it had suffered damage in excess of the amount claimed by the plaintiff for said services. The case was tried by a jury, which rendered a verdict in favor of the plaintiff. A new trial was denied by the court, and from this order and the judgment the defendant has appealed.

Upon the issue whether the services had been rendered by Taggart during the period claimed in the complaint, as well as upon the issue whether he had been faithful in such service, the evidence is conflicting, and the verdict of the jury must be accepted as conclusive against the contention of the defendant. The claim in the answer that the defendant had suffered damage by reason of the acts of Taggart in an amount greater than the alleged value of the services was an affirmative defense, in which the burden of proof was upon the defendant, and we cannot say that the jury was not authorized in finding that this defense was unsustained by the evidence. The court left to the jury the determination of these questions of fact, and no exception was taken to its instructions. The court did not err in admitting in evidence the written agreement between Taggart and the manager of the defendant. The allegation in the complaint that the services had been rendered at the special instance and request of the defendant did not preclude the plaintiff from showing that such request, or the promise to pay for such services, had been in writing, or that a written agreement therefor had been made on behalf of the defendant with his assignor. The defendant had set forth a copy of the agreement in its answer, so that it could not have been misled as to the character of the averments, or as to the proof by which they were to be sustained; nor could the defendant object that the instrument contained other conditions to be observed by Taggart in the rendering of such services.

The objection by the defendant that the agreement was, upon its face, not its own agreement, but an agreement of Green, its manager, is not tenable. The defendant, in setting forth the agreement, had alleged that it had been made by Green "as manager of the defendant corporation." The agreement itself purports to have been on behalf of the defendant, and recites that the consideration for the agreement to render the services is the agreement by Green, "as manager of the said mining company, to pay me the sum of seventy-five dollars per month," etc. If there was any ambiguity in the instrument itself, it was made clear at the trial by the testimony of Green that it was executed by him on behalf of the defendant, and the jury was authorized in finding that it was the agreement of the defendant. The judgment and order are affirmed.

HOPPE et al. v. HOPPE et al.

FOUNTAIN v. HOPPE (HOPPE et al., Interveners). (No. 18,225.)

PROBATE HOMESTEAD — MORTGAGE BY WIDOW — RIGHTS OF MINOR CHILDREN.

1. Where a complaint to foreclose a mortgage prays a receiver to take and hold the premises, and collect and apply the rents and profits, third persons may intervene to assert an adverse title to the possession, and an interest in the rents.

2. Code Civ. Proc. § 1465, requires the court, if no homestead has been declared in decedent's life, to set one apart out of the common property for the use of the surviving spouse and the minor children. Section 1468 provides that such homestead is the property of the survivor, if there be no minor children; otherwise, it belongs half to such survivor, and half to such children. Held, that an order setting apart such homestead, made without notice to the minor children, cannot vest title in the widow alone, so divesting the children's interest both in the homestead use and in the inheritable fee.

3. Though the proceeding is in rem, the widow, as administratrix, cannot represent the children, further than to withdraw the premises from administration.

4. The judgment setting apart a homestead to the widow, though it recite the names of the children, does not necessarily imply that these, or any of them, are minors, nor adjudicate their interests in the premises.

5. If the effect of the order were to vest the fee in the widow, still she would be estopped to deny her trusteeship, as to the minors' half interest.

6. A homestead set apart by the probate court under Code Civ. Proc. § 1465, for the benefit of the widow and minor children, will not be partitioned until the youngest child comes of age, unless the interests of the minors clearly demand it.

7. That the minor joins in the petition, and is represented by a guardian ad litem, makes no difference, as the court will interpose sua sponte.

8. A widow's mortgage of a homestead set apart to her by the probate court for the use of the family is not void, as such homestead involves a joint use merely.

9. Such mortgage attaches to the widow's interest, subject to the homestead use; and there being minor children entitled, with her, to such use, as well as to an undivided half of the fee, foreclosure is postponed till partition may be had, viz. when the youngest comes of age, and meantime the homestead use includes both possession and the rents and profits.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Sacramento county; A. P. Catlin, Judge.

Suit by Herman W. Hoppe and others against Julia Hoppe and W. A. Fountain for partition, consolidated with suit by W. A. Fountain against Julia Hoppe (Herman W. Hoppe and others intervening), to foreclose a mortgage. Partition suit dismissed, and foreclosure decreed. Julia Hoppe and Herman W. Hoppe and others, separately, appeal. The dismissal was affirmed, and the judgment of foreclosure reversed.

Armstrong & Platnauer and Henry C. Ross, Jr., for appellants. Clinton L. White, for respondent.

HAYNES, C. The first of these actions (Herman W. Hoppe et al. v. Julia Hoppe and W. A. Fountain), was to obtain a partition of the lands described in the complaint, between the plaintiffs and Julia Hoppe; Fountain being made a party defendant because he claimed to be a mortgagee of the whole of the premises under a mortgage executed by the defendant Julia Hoppe. The second of these actions was afterwards brought by Fountain against Julia Hoppe to foreclose said mortgage, and the plaintiffs in the first action intervened in the second, and by order of the court these actions were consolidated. Fountain demurred to the complaint in partition, and also to the complaint in intervention, and to the answer of Julia Hoppe in the foreclosure case; and these demurrers were each sustained, and judgment dismissing the action for partition, and the complaint in intervention, and foreclosing the mortgage, was entered. The interveners and Julia Hoppe separately appeal from the judgment upon the judgment roll, and a bill of exceptions setting out the order consolidating the actions, and excepting to the rulings upon demurrer. The facts set out in the several pleadings demurred to are substantially the same, and show the following facts: F. W. Hoppe died August 10, 1881, leaving the appellant Julia, his widow, and nine children, of whom these interveners were minors, the others being of full age. At the time of his death he was possessed of a tract of land, upon which he and his family resided, containing about 160 acres, situated in Sacramento county, the same being community property. The widow was appointed administratrix, and on October 1, 1881, filed an inventory and appraisement of the estate, wherein said land was appraised at $4,000. She also filed a petition praying for an order setting aside said land, with the dwelling house thereon, "for the use of the family of deceased," and alleged that the family consisted of herself and nine children, all of whom were named therein, but their ages were not given, nor was it alleged that any of them were minors. Upon this petition, on the 7th day of October, 1881, the court made an order, of which the following is a copy: "In the Matter of the Estate of F. W. Hoppe, Deceased. Julia Hoppe, the administratrix of the estate of F. W. Hoppe, deceased, having on the 21st day of September, 1881, made application to the court, by petition, for an order setting apart, for the use and benefit of the family of said deceased, the real estate mentioned in said petition, together with the improvements thereon, as a homestead, and it duly appearing to the satisfaction of the court, from the papers on file in the matter of said estate, and other evidence, that said deceased was a resident of Sacramento county at his death, and left estate therein; that letters of administration were duly issued to said Julia Hoppe on the 5th day of September, 1881, and said administratrix duly returned an inventory and appraisement of said estate that the family of said deceased consist of said Julia Hoppe, his widow, and Emma, Frank, Edward, Othelie, Clara, Robert, Herman, Louis, and Lena Hoppe, his children; and that said applicant, Julia Hoppe, is entitled to have the said premises set apart to her for a homestead, and that the same does not exceed in value five thousand dollars,—it is hereby ordered, adjudged, and decreed that all that certain piece or quantity of land lying and being in the county of Sacramento and state of California, and particularly described as follows, to wit, the east ½ of the northwest ¼ of section 34, township 8 north, range 5 east, and the west ½ of the northeast ¼ of section 34, township 8 north, range 5 east, Mt. Diablo base and meridian, containing about 160 acres, together with the dwelling house thereon, and its appurtenances, be, and the same is hereby, set apart to the widow of said F. W. Hoppe, deceased, as a homestead, and shall not be subject to administration, and it is further ordered that a certified copy of this decree be duly recorded in the office of the county recorder of Sacramento county. Done in open court this 7th day of October, 1881. Robt. C. Clark, Judge of the Superior Court." The complaint in intervention further alleged that in the application for letters of administration the names of the interveners were stated, together with their respective ages; that no homestead had been selected, declared, or recorded by F. W. Hoppe and his wife, or either of them, prior to his death, that at the time said homestead was set apart they were minors, the eldest being then 14 years old and the youngest 5; that the court did not fix a day for the hearing of said petition; that no notice was given, in any manner, of the hearing; that they had no notice of the hearing; that they had no guardian, general or special; and that they were not represented at the hearing by attorney appointed by the court, or by any person. On December 20, 1888, Julia Hoppe executed a mortgage upon the whole of the homestead to respondent, Fountain, to secure the sum of $5,000, and it was this mortgage which was foreclosed; and, in regard to the mortgage, it was alleged that Fountain took it with full knowledge of all the facts.

Appellants contend that the order setting apart the homestead, rightly construed, was an order for their benefit, and vested title to an undivided one-half thereof in them in accordance with section 1468 of the Code of Civil Procedure; and, if that proposition cannot be sustained, that the order must be held void, as, if sustained, it would have the effect of divesting them, not only of their homestead rights under the statute, but also of their inheritance as heirs, without notice, or any opportunity of protecting their interests; while respondent contends that the order was simply erroneous; that it was appealable, and, not having been appealed from, it is a final judgment, and vested the title in the widow, and, being a proceeding in rem, no notice was required; and that, therefore, his mortgage is valid as against the interveners, as well as the widow.

1. As to the complaint in intervention, respondent insists that the demurrer was properly overruled, for the reason that the interveners assert a hostile title, and that such title cannot be litigated in an action to foreclose the mortgage. It was so held in Ord v. Bartlett, 83 Cal. 428, 23 Pac. 705, and Cody v. Bean, 93 Cal. 579, 29 Pac. 223, and in other cases cited therein. So far as the foreclosure proceeding is concerned, it can have no effect upon the title of the adverse claimant, unless he is made a party. It is only such title as the mortgagor may have that would be acquired by the purchaser at a foreclosure sale, and the title of the adverse claimant may be afterwards litigated with the purchaser, unaffected by the decree in foreclosure. But this case presents a feature distinguishing it from the cases above cited, though it is true in this case, as well as in those, that the title of the interveners would not be affected by the foreclosure. Respondent's complaint alleged that the mortgage contained a covenant that, in any proceeding to foreclose it, the court should, upon the filing of the complaint, or at any time thereafter, if requested by the plaintiffs, name some disinterested person as receiver, and authorize such receiver to at once take possession of the mortgaged premises, and collect the rents and profits thereof, and apply them to the satisfaction of the judgment, and to continue in the use and possession of the premises, and collect the rents and profits, until the premises should be redeemed, or title vested in the purchaser, and prayed that, upon the filing of the complaint, such receiver be appointed by the court. Here it is apparent there was an attack upon the right of the interveners to the possession of their interests in the homestead, and a demand that the rents and profits of the whole of the land, including their shares, should be taken, and applied towards the satisfaction of the plaintiffs' mortgage. To such issue the interveners had a right to come in, and plead their title, and thus protect their possession and their interest in the rents and profits of the land, whether any part of such rents and profits accrued to the adults, personally, or pertained generally to the homestead right. The demurrer to their complaint in intervention should therefore have been overruled, unless the facts stated therein failed to show that they had an interest in the land which would be affected by the relief sought in plaintiffs' complaint. It therefore becomes necessary to consider the principal question in the case, viz. whether the order setting apart the homestead had the effect of vesting the entire title to the homestead in the widow, and barring the minor children of all right therein.

At the time of the death of F. W. Hoppe, and at the time the homestead was set apart, section 1465, Code Civ. Proc., as amended in 1880, and section 1468, as amended in February, 1881, were in force. 3 Deering's Codes. Under section 1465, where no homestead had been declared in the lifetime of decedent, it is made the imperative duty of the court, either of its own motion, or upon petition, to set apart a homestead out of the common property for the use of the surviving husband or wife "and the minor children;" and section 1468 provides that: "When property is set apart to the use of the family in accordance with the provisions of this chapter, if the decedent left a widow or surviving husband, and no minor child, such property is the property of the widow or surviving husband. If the decedent left also a minor child or children, the one half of such property shall belong to the widow or surviving husband, and the remainder to the child, or in equal shares to the children, if there be more than one." The questions arising upon the order of the court setting apart the homestead, and relieving the land from administration, must be solved in the light of the Code provisions above mentioned, and the law relating to the jurisdiction of courts and the conclusiveness of judgments; the ultimate questions being: (1) In whom did the order vest the title to the homestead? And (2) if it vested the entire title in the widow, are the interveners estopped by the judgment or order from now asserting the right which the demurrer concedes they were entitled to under the statute, and which should have been secured to them by the order? As against the interveners, respondent's rights must rest upon the fact that a homestead was set apart, as otherwise the land was not released from administration, and in such case the mortgage could only affect such interest as the widow might have in the land subject to administration. Clearly, it could not affect the rights of creditors, nor the interests of the children, as heirs of their deceased father, unless the land was released from administration. To sustain his judgment as against the interveners, he must therefore go a step further, and show that the order in question not only relieved the land from administration, and took away from the minors their right to an undivided one-half of the homestead, but also the rights of all the children as heirs. That all this could be accomplished without notice to the children, and without being in any manner represented or heard, is sufficiently startling to challenge our most careful consideration. It is doubtless the general rule that no one is concluded or bound by a judgment, in the absence of notice, actual or constructive. It is said, however, that the legislature may authorize a judgment to be rendered against a party without notice. But, "if the expression used in the statute will admit of a doubt, it will not then be presumed that a construction dispensing with notice can be agreeable to the intention of the legislature, the consequences of which are so unreasonable. But, where the signification is manifest, there is no power of dispensation in the courts." Steamboat Co. v. Foster, 5 Ga. 194. See, also, Meade v. Deputy Marshal, 1 Brock. 324, Fed. Cas. No. 9,372, where a similar statement of the law is made by Chief Justice Marshall. Assuming, as respondent contends, that the statute does not require notice of a proceeding to set apart a "probate homestead," under the principles laid down by the cases above cited, it follows that the action of the court, in the absence of notice to the minors, can go no further than the statute expressly authorizes; and, if it assumes to take away from any one not before the court a right given by the statute, such person cannot be bound by the judgment. This also results from a principle applicable to all judgments, viz. that no one, not even a party with notice, is bound by the adjudication of a fact not necessary to be adjudicated in the proceeding. Greenl. Ev. § 534. That a proceeding to set apart a probate homestead is in rem is conceded; but the question to be solved is, how far, and as to what matters, a judgment in rem is conclusive. A judgment strictly in rem is binding and conclusive on all the world, while a judgment inter partes only concludes parties and privies; and hence it is that, in setting apart a homestead, only those facts which are essential to the determination of the status of the property are conclusively adjudged. For such purpose the executor or administrator represents all persons affected by the order, but it is obvious that he cannot represent adverse interests in the homestead so set apart, so as to bind them, nor litigate for them a controversy as to whether A. is or is not a minor, his age being disputed. The probate of a will, for example, does not establish the fact that the dispositions therein were not beyond the power of the testator. The result is that it is the judgment of the probate court on the will, as distinguished from specific findings, or facts necessarily involved therein, that is binding on all persons.

Bigelow, Estop. p. 222. The case of De Mora v. Concha, 29 Ch. Div. 268 (decided in 1885), is a most instructive case upon this subject. A native of Chile made his will in London, and shortly thereafter died there. A caveat having been entered on behalf of the testator's daughter, the will was propounded by the executors, they alleging that the testator was domiciled in England. The daughter alleged that the testator was domiciled in Chile, and that his will was not executed according to Chilean law. The judge of the probate court made a decree declaring the will valid, found that the testator was domiciled in England, and decreed probate to the executors. The daughter afterwards filed a bill against the executors, alleging that the testator was a domiciled Chilean, that his will, being executed in England according to English law, was good by the law of Chile, but only so far as the testator could, by the law of Chile, dispose of his property by will; that, according to that law, he could only dispose by will of one-fourth of his personal estate; and that the other three-fourths belonged to the plaintiff. The executors set up the decree of the probate court, that he was domiciled in England, as a bar. It was held that the decree of the probate court was not conclusive in rem as to the domicile, for that it did not appear that the decree was necessarily based on the finding as to domicile; and held, further, that the finding by the probate court as to domicile was not binding inter partes, as between the daughter and the legatee, for that it was a finding between the daughter and the executors; that the executors could not, by litigating a question of domicile, which it was not necessary to decide for the purposes of the suit, conclude the legatee, and as the legatee was not bound the daughter could not be bound. So far as the power of the court to declare a homestead was concerned, the existence or nonexistence of minor children was a wholly immaterial fact, not necessary to be either considered or decided, since it could not affect either the character, extent, duration, or value of the homestead. Nor was it in the power of the widow, as administratrix, to represent the minor children, or any one interested in the estate, whether heir or creditor, further than the proceeding was strictly in rem, viz. to withdraw or relieve the land from administration, and devote it to homestead purposes for those whom the statute declared to be entitled to it. The proceeding, in the absence of parties duly notified, could go no further than to give effect to the legislative provision, leaving the parties so entitled to assert their interests in the homestead whenever a hostile claim should make it necessary.

Respondent further contends that the order in question was appealable, and, not having been appealed from, is final and conclusive. This question was considered in the recent case of In re Moore, 96 Cal. 530 (par. 7) 31 Pac. 584, where it was held that an order setting apart a homestead, "the undivided one-half thereof to the widow," and the undivided one-sixth to each of three children named, out of the separate property of the deceased, though erroneous, in that it should have been set apart for a limited time, only, and not in fee, no appeal having been taken therefrom, the title was in the persons named in the decree, as against the heirs of the deceased. Mr. Justice Paterson dissented upon this point, while concurring in the reversal upon other grounds, and placed his dissent squarely upon the ground that the court "could not—had no power to—set aside a homestead in fee," out of the separate property of the deceased, and that no appeal from the order was necessary. But that case is clearly distinguishable from this. There the minor children were adverse parties. The widow in that case petitioned for a homestead. The children appeared by their guardian, and filed objections to granting the prayer of the petitioner. Their objections prevailed, the petition was denied, the petitioner appealed, and the supreme court reversed the order, and remanded the case for further proceedings. See Estate of Moore, 57 Cal. 437. After the case was remanded the superior court made the order referred to, and that order was not appealed from. In that case the minor children were before the court, and were represented by their guardian, and had an opportunity to litigate every question relating to the homestead, and to make a record upon which this court could have reviewed any alleged error, while in this case the minor children were not in fact before the court, nor constructively present for any purpose, except in so far as the proceeding was in rem. For that purpose they were represented by the administratrix, who was the petitioner, but who certainly was not authorized to represent them in a proceeding by which she acquired, as respondent contends, their interest in the homestead. Besides, neither the petition nor the order disclosed the fact that these interveners were minors, and it is at least questionable whether an appeal upon that record would not have been fruitless. But the rights of the minors were not adjudicated. The statute is mandatory. The judge must set apart the homestead; the word "may" in section 1465, Code Civ. Proc., being used for "shall." In re Ballentine, 45 Cal. 696. "That only is deemed to have been adjudged in a former judgment which appears upon its face to have been adjudged, or which was actually or necessarily included therein, or necessary thereto." Code Civ. Proc. § 1911. That there were children is recited in the order, but it does not appear that the court investigated or decided as to the age of any of them, for such investigation was not necessary to the validity of the order setting apart a homestead; and, as the minors were not parties to the proceedings for the purpose of litigating their right to an interest in the homestead, the order should not be construed as having excluded them. The order does not necessarily affirm or deny that any of the children were minors. If the homestead could not have been set apart unless there were minor children, the inference that the court found that there were minor children would be inevitable; but, as the homestead must have been set aside if there had been no minor children, there being a widow, an inference that the ages of the children were adjudicated can only be drawn by argument, and such adjudication cannot be inferred by argument or construction. Freem. Judgm. § 258, and cases there cited. This proceeding being in rem, and without notice, all that could be properly adjudged was the status of the property, viz. that it was a homestead, and was relieved from administration; and the order should be so read and construed, if its language will permit it. In Watson v. His Creditors, 58 Cal. 558, speaking of a homestead declared before the death of either spouse, this court said: "The law fixes the rights of the parties, and the title by which the property shall be held; and, when the statute declares that the title shall vest absolutely in the survivor, no order of the probate court could make it the joint property of the husband and the children of the husband and wife." And in Rich v. Tubbs, 41 Cal. 34, in relation to the same character of homestead, it was said: "The purpose and effect of the order is merely that the property be relieved from administration. The question of title, as between claimants, is to be determined in another forum." We think that only that effect should be given to an order setting apart a probate homestead. If it be true that the statute does not require notice, such ought to be the only effect of the order. If, however, the effect of the order was to vest the title in the widow, she is estopped to deny the right of the minors therein, and, if necessary for their protection, would be held a trustee of that title for them, to the extent of their interest; for, as they are not estopped by the judgment from asserting their interest, nothing more than the legal title could pass to her by the judgment. If the mortgage to Fountain had not been executed, I apprehend that no one would contend but that the interveners could successfully assert their right to an undivided one-half of the land. Whether an incumbrancer without notice other than that imparted by the record in the proceeding to set apart the homestead, seeing therein the names of the children, their ages not being stated, would not be obliged to presume that they were all minors, and so interested in the homestead, it is not necessary to decide, inasmuch as the demurrer admits that he took the mortgage with knowledge or notice of the fact that the interveners were all minors, and in such case he could be in no better position than his mortgagor.

2. The demurrer to the complaint for partition was properly sustained. For the purposes of this demurrer, we assume that the facts stated show that the petitioners have an interest in the homestead to the extent claimed; but we think that a homestead cannot be partitioned, at least until the youngest child attains his majority. There are many instances in which the right to partition must be denied because the property has been charged with some trust, or dedicated to some purpose which would be defeated or impaired by the division of such property. In Outcalt v. Appleby, 36 N. J. Eq. 81, among other reasons for refusing a partition, it was specified that the testator did not contemplate a division of the residuary estate as then proposed; that by his will he expressed his wish that the trustees hold the improved property unsold for 10 years, unless, in their judgment, it would not be advisable to do so. In Gerard v. Buckley, 137 Mass. 478, the intention of the testator was also held to control the right of partition. See, also, Hill v. Jones, 65 Ala. 214. In Missouri the statute vests in the family of the deceased husband an estate in his realty which does not cease to exist until the widow dies and the youngest child becomes of age; and it was held that a purchaser from the mother of a minor child, who has a homestead right in the property bought, is not entitled to partition against the child; that the child is entitled to a homestead in the property, and not merely an aliquot part thereof. Rhorer v. Brockhage, 13 Mo. App. 397. So in Trotter v. Trotter, 31 Ark. 145, it was held that there can be no partition of the homestead. The question whether there may be a partition of a probate homestead has not heretofore been presented to this court. Principles, however, have been announced which I think are conclusive of the question. In Estate of Moore, 57 Cal. 442, 443, it was said: "A homestead right, or a right to have a homestead, is not a right which vests under the law by succession. It is a right bestowed by the beneficence of the law of this state for the benefit of the family. * * * The homestead, when set apart, is to be set apart for the benefit of the widow and children. Every minor child has an interest, and has a right to be named in the decree. The property set apart is to be a home for them all; she, the widow, taking her place as the head of the family. It certainly could not be said that her deed, conveying her interest as successor, would interfere with and defeat the purpose of the law in giving the family an abiding place." And quoting from Bates v. Bates, 97 Mass. 395, the court further said: "The estate of homestead is one of a peculiar nature. It is a provision by the humanity of the law for a residence for the owner and his family." It is true that section 1468, Code Civ. Proc., provides that the homestead so set apart shall belong to the surviving husband or wife, if there be no minor child or children; but, if there be a minor child, one-half of the homestead shall belong to the surviving husband or widow, and the remaining one-half to the minor child, or in equal shares to the minor children, if there be more than one. But this provision only declares the ultimate ownership, and does not at all affect the use of the property as a family homestead. The homestead is of the same character, value, and extent, whether there be one minor child or several; and the necessity for the continuance of the homestead until the youngest child has attained majority is as imperative as the creation of the homestead when there was but one. In this case one of the children is still a minor. If the homestead is partitioned, it is destroyed as a homestead, and the interest of this minor is restricted to one-eighth of what had been the homestead. Which of the parties, in case of partition, shall have the dwelling house which has sheltered the family? And, if allotted to another, can the minor still claim shelter therein? Has he not received his portion, and shall he now say that he has any right in the portion allotted to another? A partition is therefore a destruction of the homestead, an undoing of the imperative requirement of the statute that a homestead shall be set apart for the use of the family (In re Ballentine, 45 Cal. 696), and would be in violation of a wise and beneficent public policy; and surely, if the will of a testator, expressing his desire or intention that his property shall be held in common, and not divided, is sufficient to prevent a partition, the obvious purposes and intent of the statute ought to be held sufficient. It may be said, however, that the minor has joined in the petition for a partition of the homestead, and is represented therein by a guardian ad litem, and that, therefore, no objection to a partition should be urged in his behalf. But the court will, sua sponte, interpose for the protection of a minor, and especially where, as here, a question of public policy is involved. We do not say that no case could arise where the court would not order a partition of a homestead. Circumstances might exist where it would be the duty of the court, for the benefit of the minor, to decree a partition, or order the interest of the minor to be sold. But this qualification need not be discussed. It is sufficient to say that no reason appears upon the face of the complaint why the homestead should be partitioned during the minority of one of the plaintiffs, and therefore it does not state facts which would authorize the partition of a homestead, which, if it can be partitioned at all during the minority of any of the beneficiaries, could only be done under special circumstances alleged in the complaint, and proved at the hearing. Even in case of application by or on behalf of infants for the partition of lands held under an ordinary tenancy in common, and not affected by homestead or other special right, it is said the courts are specially charged with their protection; and, if the conclusion is reached that the partition will not prove beneficial, it ought to be denied. Freem. Coten. § 457; Hartmann v. Hartmann, 59 Ill. 104; Freeman v. Freeman, 9 Heisk. 306.

3. The answer of Julia Hoppe in the foreclosure case set out all the facts in relation to the homestead hereinbefore stated, and alleged that the mortgage was void, and a cloud upon the homestead, and prayed that it be canceled. The question is made whether the mortgage created a lien upon her interest in the land, whatever that interest may be. Unquestionably, she is the owner of an undivided half. It is contended, however, that a homestead cannot be mortgaged without the concurrence of all who are interested in the title; and cases are cited of homesteads declared upon community property in the lifetime of both spouses, in which it is held that neither can convey any interest in the homestead by a separate deed. These cases are not in point. The effect of such declaration of homestead is to create a joint tenancy with survivorship. It ceases to be community property, and therefore the husband cannot convey it by his deed. Nor does it become the wife's separate property, and she cannot convey it. And, as the statute provides the mode in which it can be conveyed, neither, separately, can convey any interest therein. But upon the death of one of the joint tenants the estate vests in the survivor, and may then be conveyed or mortgaged. A probate homestead does not create a joint tenancy, though it creates a joint use.

It is further argued that, if the widow may mortgage her interest in the homestead, the mortgagee may foreclose; that the purchaser would become tenant in common with the minors, the homestead be destroyed, and the object of the legislature defeated. So far as homestead purposes are concerned, the principal object of the statute is accomplished when the youngest child arrives at majority. The homestead may then be partitioned, and each hold his interest in severalty. We have already held, in considering another branch of this appeal, that a partition cannot be had until all the children have arrived at majority; and, if this cannot be done by action, it cannot be accomplished in an indirect manner. No stranger can be admitted to the benefits and privileges of the homestead by succession to an undivided interest. But all this does not make the mortgage void, though it may postpone the possession of the purchaser. As the widow is the head of the family, and as the homestead must continue until the minors have all reached majority, she has the same interest in retaining the possession, and controlling the rents and profits, that the interveners have, and therefore, though her mortgage is not void, her answer is not obnoxious to a general demurrer.

The order sustaining the demurrer to the complaint in partition, and the judgment dismissing that action, should be affirmed. The judgment foreclosing the mortgage should be reversed, with directions to overrule the demurrers of respondent to the complaint of the interveners and to the answer of the defendant, with leave to respondent to answer the complaint in intervention.

We concur: SEARLS, C.; BELCHER, C.

McFARLAND and FITZGERALD, JJ. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment dismissing the action for partition is affirmed, and the judgment foreclosing the mortgage is reversed, with directions to the court below to overrule the demurrers to the complaint in intervention, and to the answer of Julia Hoppe, respectively, with leave to the plaintiff to answer the complaint of the interveners.

DE HAVEN, J. I concur in the judgment.

TREZEVANT v. W. R. STRONG CO. (No. 18,212.)

VENUE—SUIT AGAINST CORPORATION.

Code Civ. Proc. § 395, giving a defendant a right to have the action tried in the county where he resides, gives a corporation no absolute right to a change of venue to the county where its principal office is situated, when sued in one of the counties named in Const. art. 12, § 16, providing that corporations may be sued in the county where the contract was made, or the liability arose, or the breach occurred, or where its principal place of business is situated.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Fresno county.

Action by N. M. Trezevant against the W. R. Strong Company for goods sold and delivered. From an order denying its motion for a change of venue, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Stanton L. Carter and Johnson, Johnson & Johnson, for appellant. J. P. Meux, for respondent.

DE HAVEN, J. This is an appeal by the defendant from an order denying its motion for a change of venue from the county of Fresno to the county of Sacramento. The defendant is a corporation, and its principal place of business is in the county of Sacramento. The action is one to recover the value of merchandise alleged to have been sold and delivered to the defendant by the plaintiff, and it was admitted upon the hearing of the motion in the superior court that the liability of defendant accrued in the county of Fresno, where the action was commenced. The motion of the defendant for a change of the place of trial to the county of Sacramento is based solely upon the ground that its residence is in that county, within the meaning of section 395 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and that, under that section, it is entitled to have the action tried in the county of its residence. It must be conceded that, the defendant being a corporation, its place of residence is in the county of Sacramento, where it has its principal place of business. Jenkins v. Stage Co., 22 Cal. 537; Cohn v. Railroad Co., 71 Cal. 488, 12 Pac. 498; Buck v. City of Eureka, 97 Cal. 135, 31 Pac. 845. It will thus be seen that the question presented for decision is whether a corporation which is sued in a county other than that in which it has its principal place of business, but where its liability arose, has the absolute right, under section 395 of the Code of Civil Procedure, to have the action tried in the county of its residence.

Section 16, art. 12, of the constitution of this state, declares: "A corporation or association may be sued in the county where the contract is made, or is to be performed, or where the obligation or liability arises, or the breach occurs, or in the county where the principal place of business of such corporation is situated, subject to the power of the court to change the place of trial as in other cases." It is argued upon the part of the defendant here that the right of a plaintiff to sue a corporation in any other county than that of its residence is, by the last clause of the section of the constitution just quoted, made "subject to the power of the court to change the place of trial, as in other cases," and as, under section 395 of the Code of Civil Procedure, a natural person who is a defendant has the right to have a personal action against him tried in the county where he resides, the same right is secured by the constitution to a defendant corporation, when sued upon a personal demand. The constitution, however, can receive no such construction. That instrument, in the section above quoted, gives to a plaintiff the right to sue a corporation in either of the counties therein referred to; and the option thus given includes something more than simply the bare right to choose the county where the complaint shall be filed in the first instance. The words "may be sued," found in the section of the constitution just cited, are broad enough to confer upon a plaintiff, not only the right to commence an action in either of the counties named for the recovery of a real or supposed right, but also the right to prosecute such action in the county where it is commenced, unless the place of trial is changed for some other reason than that of the residence of defendant. It was held in Lewis v. Railroad Co., 66 Cal. 209, 5 Pac. 79, that an action against a corporation to recover damages for injuries sustained was properly tried in the county where the injury was inflicted, and that the defendant corporation had no right to have the place of trial changed to the county of its principal place of business; and the principle upon which the case was necessarily decided is really decisive of the question involved here. In defining the scope of the decision in that case, it was said by this court in Fresno Nat. Bank v. Superior Court, 83 Cal. 498, 24 Pac. 157: "By this decision, it is settled that, where a corporation is sued in any one of the counties mentioned in this section, it cannot demand a change of venue as matter of absolute right, but only as in other cases, and for other reasons than that the county in which the action is commenced is not the proper county." It seems entirely clear to us that the motion of defendant for a change of venue was properly denied, and that the right claimed by it is inconsistent with the right given the plaintiff to sue in the county where defendant's liability arose, if he elected so to do, rather than in the county of defendant's residence. Order affirmed.

We concur: FITZGERALD, J.; McFARLAND, J.

Action by H. Burness against the W. R. Strong Company. From an order denying its motion for a change of venue, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

PEOPLE ex rel. HART, Attorney General, v. CARUTHERS SCHOOL DIST. et al. (No. 18,188.)

School District—Elections—Notice—Sufficiency.

1. Under Pol. Code, § 1880, providing that trustees of a school district may submit to the electors thereof the questions whether bonds shall be issued for purchasing a school lot and for building school houses, the question of buying a lot and building a school house may be submitted jointly with the question of the issuance of bonds.

2. Under Pol. Code, §§ 1831, 1832, requiring the trustees to give notice of such elections by posting notices in three public places, and by publishing notice in the county newspaper,—the notice to specify time and place,—an election is void where the posted notice first stated that the election would be held in the school house in Caruthers, and, further along, that it would be held at the hall in Caruthers, and where the published notice stated that it would be held at the hall in Caruthers, and also stated that it would be held at the school house in Caruthers.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Fresno county; M. K. Harris, Judge.

Action by the people, at the relation of W. H. H. Hart, attorney general, on the affidavit of Mary E. Caruthers, against the Caruthers school-district trustees, to determine the regularity of an election held in Caruthers school district. From a judgment declaring the election valid, relator appeals. Reversed.

Atty. Gen. Hart and J. P. Meux, for appellant. L. L. Cory, for respondents.

GAROUTTE, J. The validity of an election held in Caruthers school district is here assailed, and a determination of the regularity of the proceedings under which such election was held is determinative of the case. Subdivision 5 of section 1617 of the Political Code provides that the trustees of a school district shall have power, "when directed by a vote of the district, to build school houses, or to purchase or sell school lots." The question voted upon by the electors of this school district was: "Shall bonds to the amount of $10,000 be issued and sold for the purpose of purchasing a school lot, and building a school house thereon?" Under the statute, two ways are provided by which funds may be secured to purchase lots and erect school houses. It may be done either by direct tax, or by the issuance and sale of bonds; but, in both cases, it can only be done after a vote of the district to that effect. And sections 1833 and 1880 of the Political Code expressly allow the board of trustees to submit either of these propositions to a vote of the district whenever such board deems it advisable; thus clearly indicating that the question of the buying of a lot and building of a school house may be submitted—and, we think, properly should be submitted—jointly with the question of the issuance of the bonds, or the voting of the tax. This construction involves no contradiction, or even inconsistency, with the terms of the general provision found in section 1617; but, on the contrary, these sections fall directly under, and in line with, that general provision. It follows that the proposition presented to the voters of this school district was, in form, entirely justified by the law.

It is intimated by respondents that, while this election may have been sufficiently invalid to nullify all of the bonds issued thereunder, still it was sufficiently valid as a favorable expression of the voters of the district looking towards the purchase of the lot and the erection of the building. This view is unsound. The election must be conducted in substantial compliance with the statute, whatever may be its purpose; and, if there be no substantial compliance with the statute, it is insufficient to form the basis for any future proceedings of any kind or character. The statute provides certain requirements to be observed in the holding of such an election as is here involved, and also provides that in other respects it must be held, as nearly as practicable, in conformity with the general election law. And, as to the course adopted in the conduct of the present election, we shall now direct our attention. The board of trustees are required to give notice of the election by posting notices thereof in three public places, and also by publication in a newspaper printed in the county, if there be one.[1] Among other things, this notice is required to state the time and place of holding such election, and the hours during the day (not less than six) in which the polls will be open.[2] The record discloses various irregularities in the conduct of the election, the most important of which—and one which we think fatal to its validity—being defects in the notice of election. There is no requirement of the election law more important in its observance than that the notice should clearly state the particular place where the election is to be held; and, in that regard, we think the present notice so contradictory and misleading that it fails to satisfy the statute. The notice ordered to be given by the board of trustees informed the electors of the district that the election would be held "at the hall in the town of Caruthers, in said Caruthers school district." The notice posted stated first that the election would be held "at the public school house in the town of Caruthers, in said Caruthers school district;" and, further along, it stated that the election would be held "at the hall in Caruthers, in Caruthers school district." The notice which was published in the newspaper informed the electors that the election would be held "at the hall in Caruthers, in the town of Caruthers, in said Caruthers school district," and also it stated that the election would be held "at the school house in Caruthers school district." There appears to have been a studied attempt upon the part of some one having these matters in charge to locate this election at a different place at every opportunity presented. The notices posted and published are inconsistent and contradictory in themselves, and also inconsistent and contradictory with each other. We cannot say that the town hall and the public school house in the town of Caruthers are the same place, or that the school house in Caruthers school district and the public school house in the town of Caruthers refer to the same building. They may be the same, and, again, they may be situated miles apart. We might conjecture that these various places were one and the same, but we are not allowed to enter the domain of conjecture. We can only judge of these notices by the facts they state; and, read by their face, they are misleading and contradictory, and do not substantially comply with the statute that requires the place where the election is to be held to be clearly and unmistakably set forth.

There are a few other irregularities, which, although not so serious, might well be remedied, if another election be held. The order for the publication of the notice runs to the Fresno Daily Republican. The notice was published in the Fresno Morning Republican. This is a variance, but it is unnecessary to decide whether or not it be a substantial one. The polls were open from the hour of 12 m. to 7 p. m. Under the general election law the polls close at 5 p. m.; and while, in an election of the present character, it is only necessary that the polls be open six hours, the better practice, certainly, would be to confine those six hours within the time prescribed for keeping the polls open at a general election.

Upon the principal ground discussed, we think the election void. The judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to the lower court to quash the proceedings.

COSTS ON FORECLOSURE—ATTORNEY'S FEE.

Where an attorney's fee on foreclosure is taxable "in the bill of costs," an appeal from a judgment allowing costs, taxed at $22.90, and plaintiff's attorney's fee, of $100, is frivolous.

[1] Pol. Code, § 1831. [2] Pol. Code, § 1832.

Purington & Curtis, for appellant. Curtis & Oster, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. Action for the foreclosure of a mortgage. Judgment was rendered in favor of the plaintiff, and the defendant has appealed from the judgment, without any exceptions. It was provided in the mortgage that "in the event of foreclosure of this mortgage, a reasonable attorney's fee shall be taxed by the court, and included in the bill of costs." Findings of fact were waived, and the court, in its judgment, fixed the sum of $100 as the amount of attorney's fees to be allowed the plaintiff, and directed that the property be sold, and that the proceeds be applied to the payment "of the expense of sale and costs of this action, the plaintiff's attorney's fee, of $100, and the amount found due on said promissory note," and taxed the costs of the plaintiff at the sum of $22.90. The only point presented in support of the appeal is that the stipulation in the mortgage did not give the court any authority to allow an attorney's fee, except as a part of the bill of costs, and that its action in making a special allowance in the decree was error. There is no merit in this proposition, and, as the appeal is evidently frivolous, the judgment is affirmed, and the sum of $100 is allowed to the respondent, for damages, as a part of his costs on appeal.

BACIGALUPI v. CADAMARTORI et al.

(No. 18,222.)

(Supreme Court of California. March 23, 1894.)

EQUITY—RESCISSION OF CONTRACT—FRAUD.

An allegation of fraud in procurement of a mortgage, in that it was given merely to obtain a reconveyance of property held in trust by the mortgagee, which he wrongfully refused to reconvey, is not supported by proof that the mortgagors met the mortgagee at the office of their attorney, with whose aid and advice they compromised their dispute with the mortgagee, and gave the mortgage in settlement.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Tuolumne county; Joseph H. Budd, Judge.

Action by Louis Bacigalupi against Francisco Cadamartori, for himself, and as executor of the will of C. Lombardo, deceased, and others. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendants appeal. Affirmed.

F. W. Street, for appellants. J. B. Curtin, for respondent.

FITZGERALD, J. Action to foreclose a mortgage. The defendants, in their answer, admit the execution of the note and mortgage, but deny that there was any consideration therefor, and aver fraud in the procurement thereof. The facts constituting the fraud complained of are substantially alleged as follows: That, prior to the execution of the note and mortgage, plaintiff held the legal title to certain mining property theretofore conveyed to him in trust by the defendants; that, upon repeated demands being made upon him by the defendants for a reconveyance of said property, plaintiff, in violation of his trust, refused to do so unless the defendants acceded to certain demands made upon them by him, among which was the execution of the note and mortgage in question; that, in making these demands, plaintiff, with intent to deceive, and defraud the defendants of their said property, falsely and fraudulently represented to them that the title thereto was vested absolutely in him, and that he could not be legally compelled to reconvey it; that defendants, relying upon these representations, which they believed to be true, and being in fear of losing their property unless they yielded to his demands, although they were not indebted to him at the time in any sum whatever, executed the note and mortgage upon which this action is brought. Conceding, for the purpose of this case, that the mining property referred to was conveyed by defendants to plaintiff in trust, as alleged, and that it was so accepted and held by him, although the court, in its decision, found to the contrary, still, the evidence shows that, subsequent to the alleged refusal to reconvey, and the making of the fraudulent representations complained of,—as to which, however, it might be well to state there was no evidence, and the court so found,—the plaintiff and defendants met at the office of the attorney of the latter, and then and there, acting upon the advice and with the assistance of their said attorney entered into an agreement with the plaintiff, by the terms of which the matters in dispute between them were compromised and settled, and the note and mortgage herein given in pursuance thereof. In view of this settlement, which the court, in its decision, finds was a compromise agreement, and was made "without any menace, duress, or fraud, or fraudulent intent, false statement, or misrepresentation," the terms of which "were fully understood and agreed to by all of the parties," which finding is fully sustained by the evidence, it follows that the errors complained of are either untenable or immaterial. Let the judgment and order be affirmed.

CHRISTENSEN v. McBRIDE. (No. 18,182.)

(Supreme Court of California. March 24, 1894.)

APPEAL—QUESTIONS OF FACT—NEWLY-DISCOVERED EVIDENCE.

1. Findings of fact cannot be reviewed on conflicting evidence.

2. Newly-discovered evidence, which is merely cumulative, is no ground for a new trial.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, San Joaquin county; Ansel Smith, Judge.

Action by one Christensen against one McBride. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. Affirmed.

James H. Budd and John E. Budd, for appellant. F. T. Baldwin, R. D. Baldwin, and Nicol & Orr, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. The principal point upon which appellant relies is that the evidence does not support the findings. We have carefully examined the testimony of the witnesses, and find a sharp conflict on all material questions. Under the well-settled rule, therefore, the findings cannot be disturbed. Whatever transactions the parties may have had prior thereto, the court evidently believed, and so found upon sufficient evidence, that on the 1st day of April, 1891, after a consideration of the items of their accounts, they agreed that the defendant was owing the plaintiff $2,260, and that the plaintiff was indebted to the defendant in the sum of $200. It is claimed that as the court found plaintiff was to pay the defendant for his board at the rate of $4 per week, and as he had boarded with the defendant 78 weeks, the defendant ought to have been allowed a credit of $312 instead of $200. This claim is based upon the assumption that the plaintiff boarded with the defendant continuously from October 1, 1889, to April 1, 1891; but the plaintiff testified that he had "been boarding in his family a portion of the time." The court doubtless believed that some allowance had been made on account of plaintiff's absence, and that the parties had agreed, as testified by the plaintiff, to allow the defendant $200. The findings with respect to the defendant's counterclaim for use and occupation, and other affirmative matters, are as broad as the averments of the complaint, and are therefore sufficient. The affidavits filed on motion for a new trial set forth matters of evidence which are merely cumulative, and were properly disregarded by the court. Judgment and order affirmed.

MERCED COUNTY v. HELM et al. (No. 18,269.)

INTOXICATING LIQUORS — ILLEGAL SALES — CONSTRUCTION OF STATUTES.

St. 1891, p. 306, authorizes counties to license, for the purpose of revenue, all kinds of business not prohibited by law. Merced County Ordinance, § 12, requires persons who "sell" intoxicants therein to pay a license tax. Other sections declare the tax a debt payable from persons who engage in any "business" on which the tax is imposed, without having first paid the tax and procured the license. Held that, as St. 1891, p. 306, does not authorize counties to exact a license tax for the mere act of selling intoxicants, and as the ordinance does not purport to require a license tax for the "business" of selling intoxicants, but merely for the "sale" thereof, one is not liable for a license tax because he sold liquor.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Merced county, Joseph H. Budd, Judge.

Action by the county of Merced against Helm & Nolan. From a judgment for defendants, and an order denying a new trial, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

F. G. Ostrander, Dist. Atty., and Frank H. Farrar, for appellant. T. C. Law and E. D. McCabe, for respondents.

HARRISON, J. In January, 1893, the county of Merced passed an ordinance fixing the rate of county license taxes upon certain occupations within the county, and providing for the collection of the same by suit, in case the persons liable to pay the tax should engage in any business subject thereto, without having first procured a license therefor. The present action was brought against the respondents to recover the sum of $3,000, claimed to be a debt due from them to the county by virtue of their having sold intoxicating liquors within the county without having first paid the license tax required by said ordinance for the quarter commencing March 1, 1893. The right of the county to prohibit the sale of intoxicating liquors in the exercise of the police power conferred upon it by article 11, § 11, of the constitution, which has been so fully discussed by counsel, is not involved in the determination of this case, as the ordinance in question does not purport to have been enacted under this power. By its very terms the ordinance is a revenue measure, and this suit is simply a civil action to recover a liability alleged to have been incurred by the defendants by virtue of the provisions of the ordinance, and the collection of a tax does not come within the exercise of police power as a prohibitory measure. That power is exercised in the enforcement of a penalty prescribed for a noncompliance with the law, or for the doing of some prohibited act. San Luis Obispo Co. v. Hendricks, 71 Cal. 245, 11 Pac. 682. As the county has chosen, by this ordinance, to require a license tax for engaging in certain kinds of business, and that this tax shall be collected by suit, and has fixed no penalty for engaging in the business, the ordinance is not to be regarded as the exercise of its police power, but rather as its desire to regulate the business and derive a revenue therefrom.

The power to pass the ordinance in question is given in subdivision 27 of section 25 of the county government act (St. 1891, p. 306), in the following terms: "To license for the purposes of regulation and revenue all and every kind of business not prohibited by law, and transacted and carried on in such county, and all shows, exhibitions and lawful games carried on therein; to fix the rates of license tax upon the same, and to provide for the collection of the same by suit or otherwise." Under this power to license for revenue and regulation, prohibition cannot be effected (Cooley, Tax'n, 598); and, as the business to be licensed is one which is "transacted and carried on" within the county, the very terms of the power preclude its exercise to such an extent as to prevent the carrying on of the business. An attempt, by virtue of its exercise, to place such restrictions upon the sale of wine as would prevent its manufacture, would be in apparent contradiction to the policy of the state, as manifested in that portion of its legislation which has been directed to the encouragement of the manufacture of wines (see St. 1880, p. 52; St. 1885, p. 9; St. 1887, p. 46); and, if the county of Merced can place such restrictions, every other county can do the same, and the legislative power of the state would be thwarted by the action of the several counties. This power to impose a license tax upon a "business" cannot be extended to any subject not enumerated in the statute by which the power is conferred. The right to demand a license tax as the condition of engaging in any business within the county must be expressly conferred upon the county, and the right to impose a tax upon a "business" will not authorize imposing a tax upon the individual acts connected with such business, nor can a license tax required for one business be demanded for any act or business not specified in the ordinance providing for such taxes. Any attempt on the part of the state, or of the county as one of the political subdivisions of the state, to take the property of an individual for public purposes by way of taxation, must find an express statutory warrant, and all laws having this object are to be construed strictly in favor of the individual as against the state. Whether his property is to be taken by seizure or by suit, the rule is the same. In the one case the officer must show his warrant for the seizure, and in the other the plaintiff must establish every fact essential to the maintenance of his right of recovery. In either case the proceeding is in invitum, and no presumption is to be indulged in favor of the right to take the property, or of any intention that is not distinctly expressed in the statute under which it is sought to be taken. Suth. St. Const. § 363; Monterey Co. v. Abbott, 77 Cal. 542, 18 Pac. 113, and 20 Pac. 73; City of Camden v. Allen, 26 N. J. Law, 398; Sewall v. Jones, 9 Pick. 412. A tax can never be extended by construction to things not named or described in the statute as the subject of taxation. It was said by Lord Cairns in Partington v. Attorney General, L. R. 4 H. L. 122: "The principle of all fiscal legislation is that, if the person sought to be taxed comes within the letter of the law, he must be taxed, however great the hardship may appear to the judicial mind to be. On the other hand, if the crown, seeking to recover the tax, cannot bring the subject within the letter of the law, the subject is free, however apparently within the spirit of the law the case might otherwise appear to be. In other words, if there be admissible in any statute, what is called an 'equitable construction,' certainly such a construction is not admissible in a taxing statute, where you can simply adhere to the words of the statute."

The portion of the ordinance in question which fixes the amount of the license tax and the subjects upon which it is imposed is contained in the twelfth section, and in the other sections provision is made that this license tax shall be deemed a "debt" payable in advance, and due to the county from any person who "commences, carries on, engages or conducts" in the county any "business, trade, occupation, or employment" upon which the tax is imposed, without having first paid said license tax and procured said license; and the district attorney is directed to institute an action in the proper court for the collection of this tax. This section, in which is enumerated the different subjects of the license tax, declares that "all persons * * * who sell either spirituous, malt or fermented liquors, wines or ciders in said Merced county * * * shall pay quarterly in advance a license tax of $3,000 for each quarter of a year." It thus appears that, while this section purports to impose a tax for the sale of the enumerated articles, the right to collect the tax by a suit is limited to the instances in which the persons commence, carry on, engage in, or conduct some "business" for which a license tax is required; and it is a well-settled principle that without some special authority, either by the statute or by the ordinance itself, a civil action cannot be maintained to recover a license tax. City of Santa Cruz v. Santa Cruz R. Co., 56 Cal. 143; Monterey Co. v. Abbott, 77 Cal. 541, 18 Pac. 113, and 20 Pac. 73. The tax fixed by this section is a charge imposed upon the sale, and not for carrying on or engaging in the business of selling. It applies to each sale before it is made, and for a single sale makes the person liable for the full amount of the tax. It is not imposed upon the "business" of selling, or limited to those who engage in such "business." The other portions of the ordinance providing a procedure for the collection of this tax cannot be invoked to change the terms of the tax, as the tax itself is only that which is fixed in the twelfth section. The distinction between a single act and the business in which the act is done is very marked, and is well recognized in adjudged cases. Weil v. State, 52 Ala. 19; Merritt v. State, 19 Tex. App. 435; Williams v. State, 26 Tex. App. 131, 9 S. W. 357; Jensen v. State, 60 Wis. 577, 19 N. W. 374. A single act does not constitute a business; and when a sale is but an incident in, or the final act of, another business, it cannot be said to be the business which is carried on and transacted. Manufacturers of wine, beer, brandy, cloth, and iron, who sell the product of their manufacture, do not carry on the business of selling such product. This distinction was evidently in the mind of the district attorney when he commenced the present action, as the complaint herein alleges that the defendants "commenced, carried on, engaged in, and continued in the business of saloon keeping," and during the times they were carrying on said business "did sell, and are now selling, in Merced county in said business, spirituous, malt, and fermented liquors, wines, and ciders." The ordinance, however, does not impose any license tax upon the business of "saloon keeping," and there is no necessary connection between saloon keeping and the selling of spirituous liquors, since a saloon may be kept for many other purposes than the sale of intoxicating drinks. See Kitson v. Ann Arbor, 26 Mich. 325; Mt. Pleasant v. Vansice, 43 Mich. 361, 5 N. W. 378; State v. Barr, 39 Conn. 41; State v. Mansker, 36 Tex. 364. One whose business is the keeping of an eating saloon where wine or beer is furnished with meals cannot be said to be engaged in the "business" of selling this wine or beer, and an ordinance requiring a license tax upon the business of keeping an eating saloon would not justify an additional license tax for selling beer in connection with the meals procured at such saloon. The ordinance in question is not limited to sales as a beverage, or in a dramshop, or by the keepers of tippling saloons, but applies to every person who sells the article within the limits of Merced county. Neither is there any limit prescribed as to the quantity which may be sold, or the purpose for which, or the person to whom, a sale may be made. Its terms are sufficiently comprehensive to embrace any and all sales within the county, whether the articles are sold to be carried out of the county or for purposes other than human consumption; whether the sale is that of the innkeeper to his guest, or the wine grower at the close of the season, or the brewer at his brewery. A sale by a wine grower of the product of his vineyard, or by a distiller of the spirits produced at his distillery, does not constitute a business of selling wine or spirits any more than the sale by the miller of the flour ground at his mill, or by the manufacturer of the cloth woven at his factory, constitutes the business of selling flour or cloth; and the power to impose a license upon a business does not authorize a tax, either by way of license or excise, upon the sale which the wine grower or the distiller may make.

Under the power conferred by the above section of the county government act it would be competent for the county to impose a license tax upon the business of manufacturing cloth or of raising sheep, but it would not be competent for it, under this authority, to require the payment of a license tax from every person who should sell a piece of cloth which he had manufactured, or the wool from the sheep which he had raised. The business of distilling spirits, or brewing beer, or manufacturing wool into cloth, or grain into flour, or grapes or currants into wine, or apples into cider, is a lawful occupation; and while the business, as such, under the authority thus given to the county, may be made subject to a license tax, the county cannot, under this authority, impose a tax upon the individual sales of the product of such business, or upon all of the sales made within each quarter of a year, or within any other limited period of time, for the reason that such a tax is not upon the business, but upon the different acts in the transaction of the business. With the same propriety might a tax be imposed upon the pruning of the vines, the picking of the grapes, the gathering of the apples, the pressing into the vats, the barreling of the juice, or its sale before fermentation into wine or cider. From these views it follows that, as the county had no authority to demand a license tax except from those persons who were engaged in carrying on some business, and as the ordinance in question does not impose a tax upon the business of saloon keeping, and as the complaint does not charge the defendants with having conducted any business upon which the ordinance imposes a license tax, there was no authority to commence or maintain this action. Inasmuch as there was no authority for bringing the action, the court was justified in dissolving the attachment issued thereon. The judgments and orders appealed from are affirmed.

Ex parte MASON. (No. 21,049.)

INTOXICATING LIQUORS — ILLEGAL SALES — CONSTRUCTION OF STATUTES.

Under St. 1891, p. 306, authorizing counties to license all kinds of business, Merced county, by ordinance, § 12, required persons who "sell" intoxicants therein to pay a license tax. Held that, as the ordinance does not purport to impose a license tax on the business of selling intoxicants, a person who carries on the "business" of selling intoxicants is not compelled to take out a license. Beatty, C. J., dissenting.

In bank.

Application by Mason for habeas for his discharge from the custody of the sheriff of Merced county. Petitioner discharged.

James F. Peck, F. H. Gould, J. C. Law, and E. D. McCabe, amici curae, for petitioner. Frank H. Farrar, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. The petitioner is held in the custody of the sheriff of Merced county by virtue of having been arrested upon a warrant issued by a justice of the peace on the complaint of one Turner that the petitioner was guilty of the crime of "carrying on a business for the carrying on of which a license is required by a law of this state, without taking out or procuring the license prescribed by such law; that is to say, said crime was committed as follows, and not otherwise: The said E. C. Mason did, on the 9th day of September, 1883, at and in the county of Merced, state of California, willfully and unlawfully engage in the business of selling whisky, a spirituous liquor, and did then and there sell whisky in said business for purposes other than medicinal, and for the purposes of being drunk by the purchaser as a beverage, and at said time there was in full force and effect an ordinance of the county of Merced" (then setting forth a copy of the entire ordinance).

In Merced Co. v. Helm (this day decided) 36 Pac. 399, the sufficiency of the same ordinance was involved, and we there held that the ordinance is a revenue measure which purports to have been adopted under the authority conferred upon the county in subdivision 27 of section 25 of the county government act (St. 1891, p. 306); that, under the power thus conferred, the right of the county to require the procurement of a license, and the payment of a license tax, is limited to "every kind of business not prohibited by law, and transacted and carried on within the county;" that it does not confer upon the county the right to exact a license tax for the mere act of "selling" any commodity; and that, as the ordinance does not purport to impose a license tax for the "business" of selling spirituous liquors, there can be no liability to the county for the amount of the license tax by reason of having engaged in such business. The ordinance in question does not attempt to prohibit the sale of spirituous liquors, or to impose any penalty for such sale, if made in violation of the terms of the ordinance, or without having first procured a license, so that the right of the county to make such prohibition, or to inflict a punishment for making a sale in violation of a prohibition, is not involved in this proceeding. The charge against the defendant is that of "carrying on a business for the carrying on of which a license is required by the law of this state, without taking out or procuring the license prescribed by such law." Unless, therefore, there is some law of the state which requires such license, there is no authority for the arrest and detention of the petitioner. The ordinance in question does not purport to impose a license tax upon the business of selling whisky; and, as the county was not authorized to require a license tax for the mere act of selling whisky, its provisions to that effect do not authorize his arrest for the failure to take out such license. The averment in the complaint that he sold the whisky for the purpose of being drunk by the purchaser as a beverage is immaterial, as the ordinance makes no distinction between the purposes for which a sale may be made, if they are other than medicinal. The petitioner is discharged.

I dissent: BEATTY, C. J.

ROSS v. WELLMAN. (No. 18,221.)

(Supreme Court of California. March 21, 1894.)

PLEADING—CROSS COMPLAINT—QUIETING TITLE—EVIDENCE—DEFAULT—EXECUTION.

1. The permission to defendant to file a cross complaint after the issues are made up is not reversible error where the result would have been the same without it.

2. On trial of an action to quiet title, where the land in controversy was sold under judgment against plaintiff's husband in favor of defendant, and purchased by defendant at the sale, after transfer by her husband to a third person, who deeded it to her, it is proper to show that, before making the transfer, plaintiff's husband had asked a person if he could deed the land to his wife, saying he would be ruined if compelled to pay defendant's claim, and such person told him that, being in debt, he would have to make the transfer as he subsequently did.

3. A default judgment is not void where it was not entered until the time for answering expired, although the defendant lived out of the township in which the suit was brought, and the default was entered four days after the service.

4. The fact that an execution issued to the constable of a township was served by the sheriff does not render the service void where it might have been issued to either the sheriff or constable.

5. Statements made by a husband after he had conveyed the property to his wife, tending to impeach her title, are inadmissible.

6. Evidence of other indebtedness of plaintiff's husband is admissible, tending to show fraudulent motive for transfer.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Tulare county; W. W. Cross, Judge.

Action by Jessie Ross against W. B. Wellman to quiet title. From a judgment for defendant, and order denying motion for new trial, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Lamberson & Middlecoff, for appellant. W. B. Wallace, J. T. Witt, and Geo. A. Rankin, for respondent.

TEMPLE, C. This action was brought to quiet plaintiff's title to a tract of land. Defendant answered, denying the allegations of the complaint, except that he admitted that he claimed title to the land. The answer then proceeds to aver that plaintiff is, and had for a long time been, the wife of one A. Ross; that on the 27th of June, 1890, A. Ross was the owner of the land in controversy, and was indebted to the defendant; that at the time said A. Ross had no other property subject to execution; that on the day last named said A. Ross made a conveyance of the property to one John Campbell, for the purpose of having said Campbell immediately convey the same to plaintiff, which said Campbell did; that the conveyances were without consideration, and were made and received for the sole purpose of covering up and concealing the property of A. Ross, so that the same could not be taken to satisfy the just claims and demands of the creditors of said A. Ross; that subsequently the defendant obtained a judgment against said A. Ross, and caused an execution to be issued, which was levied upon the land, which was afterwards sold under the execution as the property of A. Ross, and purchased by the defendant, subject to redemption. Subsequent to the filing of the answer, by leave of the court, and against the objection of plaintiff, defendant filed a cross complaint, in which the same affirmative defense set up in the answer is somewhat more elaborately stated, and a prayer added that plaintiff's title be declared fraudulent, and that defendant's claim of lien be held valid, etc. At the trial defendant had judgment, and plaintiff appeals from the judgment, and from an order denying a new trial.

1. The first point urged by the appellant is that the court erred in permitting the defendant to file a cross complaint. The ground of the objection seems to be that leave was not asked until after the issues had been made up. I see no force at all in the objection, but it seems to me the so-called "cross complaint" is not really such. It brings in no new parties, tenders no issue not already made by the complaint and answer, and the relief demanded in it is only what the legal effect of a judgment in favor of the defendant would have been upon the issues tendered by the answer. As, however, no relief was granted to defendant beyond that which would have been attained without the cross complaint, and as there was no default for not answering it, even if it was error to permit it to be filed, it is not such error as will justify a reversal.

2. It is contended that the court erred in refusing to admit the deed from A. Ross to John Campbell. The deed was subsequently offered, and received in evidence.

3. Plaintiff's husband, A. Ross, was a witness for her, and in cross-examination was asked if he had not had a conversation with one W. L. Rose, wherein he asked Rose if he could not make a deed to his wife, saying that he was a surety upon the note to defendant, and that if he had to pay the debt it would ruin him; and if Rose did not tell him that he could not make a valid deed of gift when he was in debt, and if witness did not thereupon reply that he would make a deed to old Campbell, and have him make the deed to witness' wife. The question was objected to as incompetent and immaterial, as not cross-examination, and not binding upon plaintiff. The objection was overruled, and it is now urged that the ruling was erroneous. The intent of A. Ross in making the conveyance was a matter in controversy, and the evidence was admissible for the purpose of showing such intent. It was shown that the time of the alleged conversation was before the conveyance. The issue was divisible. Did Ross make the conveyance with intent to defraud his creditors? If so, did the grantee pay a valuable consideration for the conveyance? For, if the conveyance were voluntary, the question as to its fraudulent character depends upon the intent of the donor alone; the intent of the donee is immaterial. Bump, Fraud. Conv. 279. If there was a valuable consideration for the conveyance, then the knowledge and intent of the grantee becomes also material. But, even in that case, the intent of the debtor and grantor is a material issue in the case, and proof is admissible to show it, although such proof alone will not make a case against the grantee where a valuable consideration is shown. Here defendant takes both positions, as he had a right to do,—that there was a fraudulent conspiracy to hinder, delay, and defraud the creditors of A. Ross, and that both conveyances were without consideration. On either proposition it was competent to show the intent of Ross by proof of his statements made before the conveyance. It is said in Jones v. Simpson, 116 U. S. 610, 6 Sup. Ct. 538, that it is incumbent upon the creditor attacking a sale on the ground that it was made to defraud creditors, first, to show fraudulent intent in the vendor; that the burden is then on the purchaser to show valuable consideration, which shown, the burden again shifts, and the creditor must show knowledge of the fraudulent intent of the vendor on the part of the vendee.

4. It is next claimed that there was error in admitting in evidence the judgment of Wellman v. Redd Bros. et al., being the judgment under which defendant claimed. The objection was that the judgment was by default, and the record showed that the defendant A. Ross lived out of the township in which suit was brought; that the summons required him to answer within 10 days, and his default for not appearing was entered four days after the service. Judgment, however, was not entered until after the expiration of the full period. Such a judgment is not void. At the most, it was only irregular. Freem. Judgm. § 126, and note.

5. It is next objected that the court erred in admitting in evidence the execution under which the sale was made, and the return thereon. The point is that the execution was directed to a constable of Tule River township, and the return shows that it was received and executed by the sheriff of Tulare county. The execution might have been directed to the sheriff or any constable in the county. Each officer was vested with full power to serve the writ, and it was an indifferent matter to whom it was issued. It was at most a mere irregularity, and does not render the service void.

6. There was no error in permitting testimony of other indebtedness on the part of A. Ross. Such evidence was admissible to show motive on the part of Ross. It was error, however, to allow the testimony of the witness James in regard to statements made by A. Ross after he had parted with title to the property. These statements tended to prove that the conveyance was made to hinder, delay, and defraud creditors. The title of his grantee could not be impeached by his statements made at that time. Briswalter v. Palomares, 66 Cal. 259, 5 Pac. 226. For this error the judgment and order must be reversed. It is not, therefore, necessary, and perhaps would not be proper, to discuss the further point as to the sufficiency of the evidence to establish a fraudulent conspiracy. I advise that the judgment and order be reversed, and a new trial had.

We concur: SEARLES, C.; BELCHER, C.

PEOPLE ex rel. WOOD v. SANDS. (No. 15,369.)

JUSTICES OF THE PEACE — APPOINTMENT—REPEAL OF STATUTE.

1. Code Civ. Proc. § 111, providing that, if any vacancy occurs in the office of a justice of the peace, the board of supervisors shall appoint an eligible person for the remainder of the term, applies to all justices, whether in cities or townships; Oakland city charter, which provides that the mayor may appoint suitable persons to fill vacancies in any office, except as in the charter provided, applying only to vacancies in offices created by the charter itself.

2. Act 1891, p. 304, § 25, authorizing the board of supervisors to fill by appointment all vacancies occurring in any office filled by its appointment, and elective county and township offices, does not repeal Code Civ. Proc. § 111, providing that if any vacancy occurs in the office of a justice the board shall appoint an eligible person to hold the office for the remainder of the term.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Alameda county; F. W. Henshaw, Judge.

Quo warranto by the people, at the relation of Fred V. Wood, against John A. Sands, to try title to the office of justice of the peace of the city of Oakland. There was judgment for relator, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Davis & Hill, for appellant. W. H. H. Hart, Atty. Gen., Jas. C. Martin, and A. A. Moore, for respondent.

GAROUTTE, J. The question here involved is the respective rights of the relator and the defendant to hold the office of justice of the peace in the city of Oakland; and these rights depend upon the determination by this court as to where the appointing power to fill a vacancy in that office is lodged, under the constitution and laws of the state. The relator claims the office by virtue of an appointment by the board of supervisors of the county of Alameda, and the defendant claims the office by virtue of an appointment by the mayor of the city. There is but one other source from which, by any possible construction of the constitution and statutes, an appointment can come; and that is the governor, under article 5, § 8, of the constitution, and section 999 of the Political Code. Neither party to this controversy has received the appointment of the governor, nor does either party contend that the governor has the power to fill a vacancy in such office. As indicating that a justice of the peace of the city of Oakland is a county or township officer, it is suggested that his office is one provided for by the general law; that it is filled at a general state election, and at a time when the city holds no election; that the call for the election is published, the officers of the election appointed, the precincts established, the votes canvassed, the result declared, and the amount of the bond fixed, by the board of supervisors; the certificate of election is issued by the county clerk, the bond approved by the judge of the superior court, filed with the county clerk, and recorded with the county recorder. The criminal jurisdiction of this office extends over the entire county, and the process, likewise, is only limited by the boundaries of the county; and the civil jurisdiction extends to the limits of the township in which the court is held, regardless of city lines. As indicating that such office is a city office, and that such justice of the peace is a city officer of the city of Oakland, it is urged that the city is required by law to provide a suitable place for holding his court; that he must report to the city treasurer, monthly, and turn over to said treasurer, all fees collected; that his salary is paid by the city; that he is elected by the electors of the city alone; that such office has a strictly municipal jurisdiction; and that such justice is, ex officio, police judge. For the foregoing reasons, it appears that a "city justice of the peace," as he is named by various provisions of the statute, might well be termed a county or township officer, for the law looks upon him, and deals with him, in the respects we have suggested, as it looks upon and deals with other persons whom we know to be county and township officers. Again, in other respects, such officer bears the indicia of an officer of the municipality. The office thus partakes of the character of both a county and township office, and also a city office, and it certainly would be somewhat of a misnomer to call it either. In order to support appellant's position, he must bring himself within the designation of an officer of the city, for the appointing power of the mayor extends to no other, while the success of respondent's position does not depend upon the technical name of the office, as to whether or not he is either a county or township officer, for the law under which he asserts his claims designates such officers as justices of the peace. This question presenting these difficulties, we pass by the controversy as to the exact classification of the office, and, without naming it, will find the appointing power. For the location of that power is a matter purely with the legislature, regardless of the technical character of the office. Section 203 of the charter of the city of Oakland declares: "If any officer of the city * * * shall resign, * * * his office shall be vacant, and the vacancy filled as herein provided. The mayor shall have power to appoint suitable persons to fill vacancies in any office except as in this charter provided. The appointee shall hold for the unexpired term, and until the election and qualification of his successor." And it is upon this provision that appellant rests his claim. Section 111 of the Code of Civil Procedure declares: "If a vacancy occurs in the office of a justice of the peace, the board of supervisors of the county shall appoint an eligible person to hold the office for the remainder of the unexpired term." And respondent bases his contention upon that declaration of the Code.

When the intention of the legislature is so apparent from the face of a statute that there can be no question as to the meaning, there is no room for construction. Courts are not allowed to interpret where interpretation is not demanded, and section 111 speaks for itself. It is broad in its terms, and, upon its face, applies to all justices of the peace, whether these justices be found in cities or townships. As against such a plain provision of the statute, we will not locate the appointing power elsewhere, unless legal reasons, entirely convincing, are presented for our consideration. When the statute says that justices of the peace shall be appointed by the various boards of supervisors, we assume that all justices of the peace are included within the designation; and we are not justified in giving the provision any other construction, unless the intent of the legislature is unmistakably manifested in that direction by other provisions of the statute, and section 203 of the charter of the city of Oakland does not contain that plain manifestation of a different intent for which we are seeking. We there find no limitation upon the general language of section 111 of the Code of Civil Procedure, but, upon the contrary, it is very apparent, when we consider the charter in its entirety, in connection with section 203 thereof, that the vacancies contemplated by that section are vacancies arising in offices created by the charter itself. This would be the natural construction of the section, read without the light furnished by other provisions; and, read and construed with the aid of that light, whatever uncertainty might have otherwise existed at once disappears. Section 45 of the charter presents a fair illustration of this view. It provides that every officer shall, within a certain time, file his official bond in such sum as the council may direct, which bond is made payable to the city, and is approved by the mayor and city attorney, and is filed and recorded in the city archives; and it is further provided that upon a failure of the officer to file an additional bond, when demanded by the city council, such council must declare the office vacant. These requirements and conditions do not apply to the justices of the peace of the city of Oakland, and appellant concedes that fact, yet there is no question but that the officers referred to in section 45 of the charter are the same officers that come within the purview of section 203 of that instrument. The office of justice of the peace is a creation of the constitution. Such an officer is elected at a general state election, and qualifies under general state law. The charter did not create the office of justice of the peace, and under the authority of Ex parte Ah You, 82 Cal. 339, 22 Pac. 929, and People v. Toal, 85 Cal. 333, 24 Pac. 603, could not have done so if its framers and the legislature had so attempted. For this reason, unless the contrary appears, we must assume the filling of a vacancy of the character here presented was not in the mind of the framers of the charter; and it would be an unnatural construction to give the provision such effect. Section 103 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides for the organization of justices' courts, and the election of justices of the peace for both townships and cities. The immediate subsequent sections relate to their duties and powers. Section 110 provides that the term of office shall be two years from the 1st day of January next succeeding their election. Section 111, as we have seen, refers to the mode of filing vacancies in the office. Section 112, and following, declare the civil and criminal jurisdiction of justices' courts. It is not questioned but that these sections, excepting the single section 111, refer to justices of the peace and justices' courts of both cities and townships; and, that fact being conceded, the conclusion is irresistible that section 111 occupies common ground with all the others, and also includes all justices of the peace.

It is further insisted that section 111 of the Code of Civil Procedure is impliedly repealed by the provisions of the county government act of 1891. We do not perceive how appellant could be materially benefited if such be the case, for, if those conditions are present, then the appointment rests with the governor, and appellant's title to the office comes from an entirely different source. We are not favorably inclined towards repeals by implication. It is only when two provisions of the statute are absolutely repugnant to each other that a repeal of the earlier will be declared, and section 111 of the Code of Civil Procedure is not repealed by the county government act. In defining the duties of the board of supervisors, subdivision 21, § 25, of the act of 1891,[1] reads: "To fill by appointment all vacancies that may occur in any office filled by the appointment of the board of supervisors and elective county or township offices." Conceding, without deciding, that justices of the peace of the city of Oakland are neither county nor township officers, still there is no repugnancy between this provision and section 111 of the Code. There is no such inconsistency in these acts that prevents force and effect from being given to both. All the appointing power of the board of supervisors is not necessarily located in subdivision 21 of section 25. Section 35 of the same act expressly recognizes that fact, and, under the head of "General Permanent Powers of the Board of Supervisors," declares that the board has power "to do and perform all other acts and things required by law, not in this act enumerated, or which may be necessary to the full discharge of the duties of the legislative department of the county government." And section 111 may well be held a law requiring the board to do and perform certain acts and things not enumerated in the county government act.

There are constitutional objections urged to the soundness of appellant's contentions, which we do not find it necessary to discuss. For the foregoing reasons, it is ordered that the judgment be affirmed.

EVANS v. PAIGE. (No. 18,130.)

Review on Appeal—Judgment on Pleadings.

The denial of defendant's motion for judgment on the pleadings, made during the trial, is not reviewable on appeal from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Fresno county; M. K. Harris, Judge.

Action by one Evans against one Paige. There was a judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals from an order denying a motion for new trial. Affirmed.

Pringle, Hayne & Boyd (E. W. McKinstry, of counsel), for appellant. Maxwell & McEnerney, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. This is an appeal by the defendant from an order denying his motion for a new trial. In the brief of counsel for appellant it is said that "the main question involved is the validity of an attachment and sale under execution of an equity of redemption, or other equitable interest, in even-numbered sections of land adjoining each other only at the corners, upon only one of which sections was posted the notice required by the statute to be posted upon the land in the absence of any occupant." It is also argued that the complaint is defective, because it contains no averment of facts excusing the plaintiff for his failure to make application to have the execution sale set aside on motion, within the period of six months from the date of the sale. The questions thus discussed arise upon the face of the complaint, and it is argued that they may be properly considered on this appeal, because the defendant made a motion for judgment upon the pleadings during the progress of the trial, which motion was denied by the court, and excepted to by the defendant. It is claimed that this ruling of the court was an error of law committed during the trial, and properly reviewable upon the motion for a new trial, one of the grounds of the motion being alleged errors of law occurring during the trial; but we do not think so. A motion by a defendant for a judgment upon the pleadings is in fact nothing more than a demurrer to the complaint upon the general ground that it does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, and presents precisely the same question (De Toro v. Robinson, 91 Cal. 373, 27 Pac. 671); and we are of the opinion that such ruling can only be reviewed upon an appeal from the judgment. The general rule is thus stated by the court in Jacks v. Buell, 47 Cal. 162: "Upon a motion for a new trial, questions respecting the sufficiency of the complaint cannot be presented, for they are not comprehended in the statutory grounds of the motion; and where an appeal is taken, as here, from the order refusing a new trial, and not from the judgment, those questions cannot be considered by this court." To the same effect is Brison v. Brison, 90 Cal. 323, 27 Pac. 186. Nor do we think that the case at bar is taken out of this rule because the motion for the judgment was made during the progress of the trial, and the ruling of the court thereon, preserved in the bill of exceptions, and relied upon by the defendant when the motion for a new trial was submitted in the superior court. After all, the question presented only relates to the sufficiency of the complaint, and this objection can be reviewed by us only on an appeal from the judgment. We do not think the court erred in admitting evidence of the value of the land which is the subject of the action, nor can we say that the findings excepted to are not sustained by the evidence. Order affirmed.

STEPHENSON v. SOUTHERN PAC. CO.

(No. 19,186.)

RAILROADS—CROSSINGS—STREET-CAR PASSENGERS.

1. The complaint in an action against a railroad company alleged that the driver of a horse car, in which plaintiff was a passenger, on approaching a crossing of defendant's track, observed an engine standing on the track within 25 feet of the crossing, whereupon he stopped the car; that, after ascertaining that the engine was not in motion, he started to cross the track; that when he was very near it the engineer of defendant's engine negligently commenced to back it towards the car, whereupon the passengers, including plaintiff, observing that a collision was imminent, jumped from the car; and that in so doing plaintiff, though using due care, was injured. Held, that the complaint stated a cause of action. 34 Pac. 618, affirmed.

2. An instruction that if defendant was guilty of negligence, as charged in the complaint, and plaintiff was injured thereby, the verdict must be for plaintiff, is not erroneous in ignoring the question of contributory negligence, when accompanied by several instructions making the right of recovery dependent on plaintiff's exercise of reasonable care. 34 Pac. 618, affirmed.

Action by Sallie D. Stephenson against the Southern Pacific Company for personal injuries. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. Affirmed.

PER CURIAM. Upon a reconsideration of this case, we are satisfied with the opinion therein filed by department 2 of this court on October 10, 1893 (34 Pac. 618), and for the reasons there stated the judgment and order appealed from will be affirmed. Judgment and order affirmed.

In re WILLIAMS' ESTATE. (No. 18,247.)

ADOPTION—APPLICATION—CHILD OF DIVORCED PARENT.

1. Under Civ. Code, § 226, providing that an order of adoption must be made by a judge of the county where the adopting parent resides, where an order fails to recite that fact, extrinsic evidence is admissible to show it.

2. Under Civ. Code, §§ 221, 223, giving any adult person the right to adopt a child, except that neither a husband nor a wife may do so without the other's consent, a husband and wife may join in an application for an order of adoption, and such order may declare that the child be regarded as the child of both.

3. Civ. Code, § 227, providing that the judge shall examine all parties to the proceeding separately, is directory merely, and a failure to do so will not render the proceeding void.

4. Civ. Code, § 224, rendering the consent of a parent who has been divorced for adultery unnecessary to an adoption of his child, is not inapplicable because the divorce was granted before the enactment of such provision, and for an act of adultery committed in another state.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Sacramento county; W. C. Van Fleet, Judge.

In the matter of the estate of Lewellyn Williams, deceased. Appeals from orders making partial distribution. Affirmed.

Johnson, Johnson & Johnson, for appellants. A. C. Freeman, McKune & George, and L. T. Hatfield, for respondents.

DE HAVEN, J. Appeals from two orders of the superior court of Sacramento county, making partial distribution of the estate of Lewellyn Williams, deceased, to Lucy W. Auzerais and Sophia G. Cutter. The orders are based upon separate petitions, but both appeals can be properly disposed of by a consideration of the questions arising upon the appeal from the order made in favor of the respondent, Auzerais. Lewellyn Williams died testate, and Lucy W. Auzerais is named in his will as a residuary legatee. This will was admitted to probate in the superior court of Sacramento county prior to the commencement of this proceeding, and, in her petition asking for a partial distribution of the estate to her, the respondent, Auzerais, alleges, in addition to the foregoing facts, that she is the adopted child of said deceased, and that he never had any other child, and was unmarried at the time of his death. The appellants, claiming to be, respectively, the nephew and niece of the deceased, appeared in opposition to the application for partial distribution, and filed an answer to the petition therein, in which they denied that the respondent, Auzerais, was ever adopted by the deceased as his child, and also denied that the deceased died testate; and in this connection they further alleged the pendency of a proceeding instituted by them to revoke the probate of the alleged will of the deceased. The issues thus made by the petition and answer thereto were tried by the court, and findings of fact filed, to the effect that the petitioner was duly adopted by the deceased as his child on August 17, 1875, and that she was and is his only child; and the court further found the allegation of the answer in reference to the pendency of the proceeding to revoke the probate of the alleged will of the deceased to be true. The appellants insist that the finding in reference to the adoption of the respondent, Auzerais, is not justified by the evidence, and also that the court erred in admitting evidence to prove that fact; and the questions thus presented are the only ones we deem it necessary to consider in this opinion.

The respondent, Auzerais, was the daughter of Eliza J. and George W. Strickland. Her parents were divorced in the state of New York on the ground of the adultery of the father, and by that decree the care and custody of the respondent was awarded to the mother. At the time of the alleged adoption she was of the age of ten years and about eight months, and was then living in Sacramento county with the deceased, who was her uncle, and also her guardian. The mother was dead, and her father was a resident of the state of New York. The adoption papers consist of a petition by the deceased, Lewellyn Williams, and his wife, Lucy C. Williams, which recites that the petitioners are residents of the county of Sacramento, and also contains an averment of the death of the mother of respondent, and of the fact that she had been divorced from the father on the ground of his adultery; second, a joint agreement by the deceased and his wife to adopt the respondent; third, the order of adoption made by the judge, and dated August 17, 1875. This order, after reciting the fact of the presentation of the petition of the deceased and his wife and their agreement to adopt, and that it was proven that the mother of respondent was dead, and had been divorced, as stated in the petition, concludes as follows: "And the said Lewellyn and Lucy C., his wife, and said child, all being present and being fully satisfied that the interests of said child will be promoted by such adoption, it is hereby ordered, adjudged, and decreed that said Lucy W., child aforesaid, shall from now henceforth be regarded and treated in all respects as the child of said Lewellyn Williams and Lucy C. Williams, his wife." The order makes no mention of the fact of the residence of the adopting parents, and fails to state that any of the parties were examined separately or otherwise by the judge making the order; but it was proven by oral evidence, upon the trial of the present proceeding, that the adopting parents were residents of the county in which the order of adoption was made, and that all the parties were examined by the judge at the time, but not separately. This evidence was properly admitted, and the contention of appellants that the order of adoption is void because it does not show upon its face that the deceased and his wife resided in the county of Sacramento at the time of the adoption, and that all the parties to that proceeding were examined by the judge in the manner directed by section 227 of the Civil Code, cannot be sustained. Undoubtedly, under section 226 of that Code, it is a material fact, and necessary to the validity of an order consenting to the act of adoption, that the adopting parent and the judge making the order shall both be residents of the same county (Ex parte Clark, 87 Cal. 638, 25 Pac. 967); but the statute does not require that this fact shall appear upon the face of what may be termed the "adoption papers." The only memorial of the proceeding which is required by the chapter of our Civil Code relating to adoption is the written consent of the parties whose consent is made necessary by the law, and the order of the proper judge, "declaring that the child shall thenceforth be regarded and treated in all respects as the child of the person adopting." Civ. Code, §§ 226, 227. This being so, it is evident that extrinsic evidence should be received for the purpose of proving any other matter, the existence of which is necessary to the validity of the proceeding. It has been held—and we think correctly—that facts necessary to show that a court or board of special or limited power has acted within its jurisdiction may be proven by other competent evidence, in the absence of a statute requiring such facts to appear in the minutes or other record of its proceedings. Jolley v. Foltz, 34 Cal. 321; Reclamation Dist. v. Goldman, 65 Cal. 638, 4 Pac. 676; Van Deusen v. Sweet, 51 N. Y. 378; Williams v. Cammack, 27 Miss. 209; 2 Freem. Judgm. (4th Ed.) § 518. It is true the act of adoption in this state is not a judicial proceeding, and the order, therefore, is in no sense to be considered as the judgment of a court. Estate of Stevens, 83 Cal. 322, 23 Pac. 379; In re Johnson's Estate, 98 Cal. 531, 33 Pac. 460. Still, the rule above stated, affirming the right of a party to show by extrinsic evidence the existence of the jurisdictional facts in support of the judgment or other determination of a court or board of limited jurisdiction, is applicable in principle to the case as presented here, and fully justifies the action of the superior court in admitting the evidence referred to. The case of Ex parte Clark, 87 Cal. 638, 25 Pac. 967, does not sustain the contention of appellants upon this point. The statement in the opinion in that case, to the effect that it is necessary for the record to show that the adopting parent appeared before the proper judge, has reference to the record in the action in which the order of adoption may be offered in evidence, and not to the papers relating to the proceeding for adoption. The question of the admissibility of oral evidence, for the purpose of establishing material facts not shown by such papers, and not required to be recited therein, did not arise in that case, and was not passed upon by the court at that time. But, if the rule were otherwise, and it should be conceded that the court erred in admitting evidence as to the residence of the deceased, the error was harmless, as the petition for adoption states that the deceased and his wife were residents of the county of Sacramento, and having, upon the strength of that representation, obtained the order of the county judge of that county, consenting to the adoption of respondent, the deceased would in his lifetime have been estopped to deny its truth in any controversy as to his parental duty to support and care for the child thus adopted by him, and the appellants, who claim under him, are equally estopped to deny the fact in this proceeding.

The appellants further claim that the order of adoption is void—First, because it was made upon the joint petition of the deceased and his wife, and purports to order and direct that the respondent should thereafter be treated and regarded as the child of both of them; second, because the parties to the contract of adoption were not separately examined; and lastly, because the father of the respondent did not consent to the adoption, and was a nonresident of the state, and without notice of the proceeding. There is no force in the first of the foregoing objections. Section 221 of the Civil Code gives to any adult person the right to adopt the minor child of another in the cases, and under the rules, prescribed by the chapter of which that section forms a part; and the following section (223) provides that neither husband nor wife, unless lawfully separated, shall adopt a child without the consent of the other, if capable of giving such consent. Under these sections the wife has precisely the same right to adopt a child as the husband; and we know of no reason why both may not unite in an application for the adoption of a child as the child of both, or why, in such a case, the order of adoption should not declare that the child shall henceforth be treated and regarded as the child of both spouses. On the contrary, such procedure would seem to be in entire harmony with the object of the law, and an appropriate way by which husband and wife may mutually consent to the adoption of a stranger in blood into the family, and to assume towards such child the duties of the parental relation. The question of the right of husband and wife to jointly adopt a child arose in the state of Indiana under a statute similar to our own, and the supreme court of that state, in Krug v. Davis, 87 Ind. 590, in answer to the objection that the statute did not contemplate or authorize such joint adoption, said: "On the contrary, the better and more reasonable construction appears to us to be that a wife may unite with her husband in such a proceeding, as, from the very nature of things, the interests of the entire family are necessarily involved in the object sought to be accomplished by it. There is not only no inconsistency, but a manifest propriety, in the wife thus uniting with her husband, as by doing so the adopted child is made to assume, in a general sense, the same position in the family which it would occupy if it were the natural child of both, born in lawful wedlock." These views are so manifestly correct, and applicable to the construction of our own law, as to render any further discussion of this point unnecessary.

Nor can the right of the respondent here to succeed to the estate of her parent by adoption be defeated by the fact that the judge signing the order of adoption failed to separately examine the parties to it. It was expressly held by us in Re Johnson's Estate, 98 Cal. 531, 33 Pac. 460, that the examination of a child under the age of 12 years—the age of consent—was entirely discretionary with the judge; and we think the general reasoning of the opinion in that case in regard to the nature of the act of adoption in this state, and its statement of the rule by which to determine whether the provisions of a statute prescribing the mode of proceeding upon the part of a public officer in the discharge of a given duty is mandatory or simply directory, lead to the conclusion that the examination of the other parties to the contract by the judge making the order is not absolutely necessary in order to effect the adoption of a minor; and, if this is so, it would necessarily result that section 227 of the Civil Code must be regarded as directory in so far as it requires that the parties shall be separately examined. In the case just referred to, in speaking of the nature of the act of adoption under our statute, we said: "The essential foundation of the proceeding is the consent of the persons named in the statute; and when this has been given in the presence of the proper judge, and manifested in writing and by the order of such judge, the contract cannot be declared invalid because of some merely technical objection to the manner in which the judge who signed the order of adoption may have discharged his duty in the premises." And it was further said by us at that time that the object of the statute in directing the judge to make a separate examination of the parties was for the protection of a wife, or child over the age of 12 years, whose consent is made essential to the creation of the contract, by guarding them in some degree from the possible coercive influence of the husband or parent, and also to enable the judge to ascertain whether the consent of such persons was entirely free. Undoubtedly, the judge ought, in the orderly and proper discharge of his duty, to conform to this direction of the law; but his omission to do so would not render the contract absolutely void, and subject to attack by one not a party to it. The deceased voluntarily entered into the contract of adoption under consideration here, and received, in his lifetime, the benefits resulting from the relation thus created,—the society, affection, and devotion of an adopted daughter; and no principle of law or equity will permit the appellants, claiming under him, to avail themselves of this technical departure from the direction of the statute, to defeat the rights of respondent growing out of the contract, the validity of which was never disputed by the deceased, and which has been fully performed by all the parties to it.

The remaining question to be considered is whether the validity of the order of adoption is affected by the fact that it was made without the consent of the father of respondent, and without notice to him. As already stated, the father of respondent had been divorced from the mother on the ground of his adultery, and, such being the case, his consent to the order of adoption was rendered unnecessary by the express provisions of section 224 of the Civil Code, then and now in force. The fact that the decree of divorce was made before the enactment of our Civil Code, and for an act of adultery committed in another state, did not make that section inapplicable to the proceeding taken by the deceased for the adoption of respondent; and to so hold is not to give any retroactive or extraterritorial effect to the provisions of that section. The section simply declares under what circumstances the consent of the natural parent shall not be required in a proceeding for the adoption of a child, and it was intended to furnish the rule in regard to that matter in all subsequent applications for adoption under the statute. It is argued, however, by counsel for appellants, that it is not in the power of the state to deprive a parent of the natural right to his child for such a cause, without at least affording him an opportunity to appear and answer the charge in the proceeding which is taken for the purpose of severing his parental relations. Whatever force there might be in this position in a case where the natural father of an adopted child was asserting his right to the custody of such child, or in an action brought by him to recover the value of its services from the adopted parent, is seems to us that the question thus argued by counsel does not arise here. The father of the respondent is dead; but, if he were alive, no rights of his would be impaired by giving force and effect to the contract of adoption, and permitting respondent to succeed to the estate of the deceased as the adopted child of the latter. The question here is simply whether the proceeding for the respondent's adoption entitles her to succeed to the estate of her adopted father, and we have no doubt that it does. The adoption was in accordance with the law of this state, and certainly, so far as relates to the right of inheritance under the laws of this state, it gave to the respondent the status of a child of the deceased. "It is a general principle that the status or condition of a person, the relation in which he stands to another person, and by which he is ordinarily made capable to take certain rights in that other's property, is fixed by the law of the domicile, and that this status and capacity are to be recognized and upheld in every other state, so far as they are not inconsistent with its own laws and policy. Subject to this limitation, upon the death of any man, the status of those who claim succession or inheritance in his estate is to be ascertained by the law under which that status was acquired." Ross v. Ross, 129 Mass. 246.

The conclusion we have reached in regard to the validity of respondent's adoption by deceased also disposes of all questions arising upon the appeal from the order making partial distribution of his estate to Sophia G. Cutter. The distribution was made to her as a legatee under the will of the deceased. The will has been probated, and the respondent, Auzerais, does not question its validity; and the court, having found that she was the adopted and only child of deceased, and therefore the only person having a right to object to distribution under its terms, properly held that the pendency of the proceeding instituted by appellants for the purpose of revoking the probate of such will would not defeat the rights of the legatees named therein. The respondent, Auzerais, being the only heir of the deceased, the appellants have no rights to be affected, no matter what disposition may be made of the estate of deceased. Orders affirmed.

STEWART v. HELVETIA SWISS FIRE INS. CO. (No. 18,134.)

INSURANCE—RENEWAL—PROMISE OF AGENT.

Where a local agent, having no actual or ostensible authority to renew a policy, fails to perform his promise to inform the company of assured's offer to renew, the company is not liable for a loss after expiration of the old policy.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Tulare county; Wheaton A. Gray, Judge.

Action by one Stewart against the Helvetia Swiss Fire Insurance Company on a policy. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. Reversed.

T. C. Van Ness (Bradley & Farnsworth, of counsel), for appellant. Daggett & Adams, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. Byrnes, the local agent of defendant at Visalia, had no actual or ostensible authority to enter into a binding contract upon the part of defendant for the renewal of the policy held by plaintiff; and the proposal of plaintiff, made to such agent, for a renewal of said policy, was, until communicated to and accepted by defendant, nothing more than a mere offer upon the part of plaintiff to renew such policy. The fact that the agent promised to communicate the offer to defendant, and did not do so until after the loss, while it might make the agent liable to plaintiff for the damage sustained by him growing out of such neglect, did not have the effect to create a binding contract for renewal between the plaintiff and defendant. Judgment reversed.

COLGROVE et al. v. SMITH et al. (No. 14,922.)

NEGLIGENCE—LIABILITY FOR NEGLIGENCE OF CONTRACTOR.

A company which obtains leave to dig up streets and lay its pipes along them is liable for personal injuries caused by the defective filling of a trench, even though the work was being done by and under the exclusive control of another, who had contracted to do the work for the company.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; Lucien Shaw, Judge.

Action by Margaret H. Colgrove and another against Fred J. Smith and another. From a judgment for plaintiffs, and an order denying a new trial, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Joy & Sumner, C. E. Sumner, and Edwin E. Meserve, for appellants. A. W. Hutton, P. C. Tonner, and J. W. Swanrick, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. Action for personal injuries. Appeal by defendants from the judgment, and an order denying a new trial. Appellants, as copartners doing business under the name of the Citizens' Water Company of Pomona, obtained from the city of Pomona, by ordinance, a grant or franchise to dig trenches and lay pipes in the streets of the city for the purpose of selling to and supplying its inhabitants with water. Afterwards, on June 1, 1889, appellants contracted with M. O'Neill and Frank Osler to dig and fill the trenches for the pipe at a specified price per 100 feet, a part to be 2 feet wide, and part 20 inches wide, and all 30 inches deep. The contract contained the following clause: "Said ditches to be filled as required by city ordinance. All road crossings to be properly tamped and kept in repair for sixty days after completion of the work. Parties digging ditch to be responsible for all damages resulting by reason of injury to, or breaking of, any pipes owned by other persons." The ordinance required the grantee (appellants) or its assigns, immediately after laying the pipes, to restore the streets to their former condition, and have the same in as good repair as before; the work to be done under the direction, and to the satisfaction, of the superintendent of streets. Plaintiff Margaret A. Colgrove (wife of her coplaintiff), on June 15, 1889, was driving along Garey avenue, where defendants' pipe had been laid, and the trench improperly filled with loose dirt, in which her buggy wheels sank, whereby she was thrown out and injured. There were no guards along the line of the trench, nor any notice of its unsafe condition. Several exceptions were taken to evidence, and to the refusal of the court to give to the jury certain instructions requested by defendants; but all these exceptions present a single question, arising upon the issue raised by defendants' answer, to the effect that O'Neill and Osler were independent contractors, in the exclusive control of the work of filling up the ditch, and for whose negligence defendants claim they are not liable.

It is commonly stated—and, in a large class of cases, correctly—that the principle of respondeat superior does not apply where the negligent or wrongful act is that of an independent contractor, or of his servant or employé, unless the superior has been guilty of negligence in contracting with an unfit person. For a full discussion of the general doctrine above stated, see Boswell v. Laird, 8 Cal. 469. But there are exceptions to the general doctrine, and this case, we think, is one of them. The board of trustees of the city was charged by the law with the care and maintenance of the streets in a safe and proper condition for the use of the public. Appellants could not lawfully dig trenches and lay water pipes without express authority from the city. If they had undertaken to do so, and had contracted with another to do the work, they would not, by such contract, have relieved themselves from liability to the city for the trespass, nor to individuals who might have sustained special injury. Nor does the fact that they obtained from the city a franchise or permission to dig up the street and lay their pipes relieve them from more than the unlawful character of the work. They stand in a contract relation to the public, represented by the city authorities, to do the work in the manner required by the ordinance, and cannot relieve themselves of the duty imposed by that contract by contracting with another to do the work. These trenches could not be dug in the street without danger to the public. If done without authority, a nuisance would necessarily be created; and, if not done in the manner required by the ordinance, the departure creates a nuisance. The judgment and order are affirmed.

FRESNO MILLING CO. v. FRESNO CANAL & IRRIGATION CO. (No. 18,133.)

Contract for Water Power — Construction—Damages for Breach — Res Judicata—Final Judgment.

1. A contract for the use of water as a motive power for a mill gives the mill no right to use such water for any other purpose.

2. Under a contract for the use of water as a motive power the mill owner is not damaged by a failure to deliver the amount of water called for, when an amount equal to the full capacity of plaintiff's mill wheel is delivered. Beatty, C. J., dissenting.

3. A judgment cannot be pleaded in bar during the time for appeal therefrom, and while a motion for a new trial is pending.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Fresno county; M. K. Harris, Judge.

Action by the Fresno Milling Company against the Fresno Canal & Irrigation Company. From a judgment for defendant, and an order denying a motion for a new trial, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

T. P. Ryan, for appellant. Church & Cory and Harry I. Thornton, for respondent.

GAROUTTE, J. This appeal is taken from the judgment and order denying a motion for a new trial. Upon the rendition of the judgment the trial court filed the following opinion regarding the questions involved in the litigation. It is lucid and convincing, and we are satisfied with the views there expressed:

"The pleadings in this case are quite voluminous, but the relief sought and prayed for may be divided into three heads: First. That a certain contract of writing, entered into by M. J. Church, the Fresno Canal and Irrigation Company, and the Fresno Milling Company, dated April 22, 1886, be canceled, and that the defendant, the canal company, be enjoined from using the same or asserting any rights thereunder. Second. That the defendant, the canal company, be required to furnish a deed in fee simple to the plaintiff to 83⅓ cubic feet of water passing a given point per second. Third. That the defendant be required to pay said plaintiff damages for said canal company's failure and neglect to furnish certain water agreed to be furnished to plaintiff, or the value of the rents and profits of certain water alleged to have been used by defendant, which plaintiff alleges rightfully belong to the plaintiff, the milling company. There are other questions, but they are corollaries of the foregoing propositions, and stand or fall with them.

"On the 10th day of September, 1885, a certain contract of writing was entered into between M. J. Church, the Fresno Canal and Irrigation Company, and one Joseph G. Deming. Under this contract said Church agreed to sell said Deming lots 28, 29, 30, 31, and 32, block A, of the town of Fresno, on which were then situated what were commonly known as the 'Champion Mills,' together with said mills and other improvements thereon, and the water power to the amount of 83⅓ cubic feet of water per second for running said mill, with all the privileges and appurtenances thereunto belonging or appertaining, for which said Deming agreed to pay the sum of $20,500,—$10,000 in cash, and $10,500 thereof as soon as the canal used to convey water to said mill for motive power should be so enlarged and improved as to deliver to said mill for such motive power the amount of 83⅓ cubic feet of water per second. The party of the second part, the Fresno Canal and Irrigation Company, agreed to begin at once upon said canal to increase its capacity, as aforesaid, and to enlarge and improve the said canal so that it should deliver at the said mill, for its motive power, not less than 83⅓ cubic feet of water per second; said work to be completed within ninety days. Said Church and the canal company further agreed that when said second installment of the purchase price of said property, to wit, $10,500, should be paid, that they would make, execute, and deliver to said Deming, as the grantee, a good and sufficient deed of grant of said property, which should convey to him a perfect title in fee simple, absolute, free and clear of all incumbrances, of said lots, with said mill and improvements thereon situated, together with all the privileges and appurtenances thereunto belonging, with a water right of 83⅓ cubic feet of water per second for said mill during the existence of said corporation. The canal company further agreed that upon the payment of said sum it would furnish to said Deming, during the period of its existence, for the running of said mill, an amount of water equal to 83⅓ cubic feet per second, providing that it should have the privilege of shutting off the water in said ditch during such times as should be necessary for the repairing of the same, etc., and should not be held responsible for lack of water caused by drought, insufficient water in King's river, hostile diversion, temporary damage by flood, etc., but that it should at all times use due diligence in restoring and maintaining the flow of water in said canal. It was also agreed that said Deming should have the right to turn in enough additional water to make up said amount into the mill canal, at any waste way or bulkhead between the mill and the northwest corner of section 36, township 13 south, range 20 east, in case of any deficiency in said agreed supply, or that he might turn off any excess, if necessary. The canal company further agreed that it would enlarge the capacity of the ditch below the mill, so as to take away the water as fast as it should be necessary to prevent its impeding the running of the mill. This clause is also in said contract: 'It is also understood and agreed by and between the respective parties hereto that the above grant to the party of the third part [being said Deming] of the water right of 83⅓ cubic feet of water per second as a motive power for said mill is intended to vest in said third party [Deming], his heirs and assigns, forever, anything in the above instrument to the contrary notwithstanding.'

"Afterwards, on the 22d day of April, 1886, a contract in writing was entered into between the defendant, the Fresno Canal and Irrigation Company, and the said Joseph G. Deming, in which it was provided that, in consideration of the sum of five dollars and other good and valuable considerations, said canal company agreed to furnish and thereby grant to said Deming all the water that might be required, not exceeding at any time 83⅓ cubic feet per second, to be supplied by and through the canal, known as the 'Mill Ditch,' on Fresno street, in the town of Fresno, county of Fresno, to the use of the said party of the second part, as a motive power to propel the machinery of a flouring mill situated on said lots 28, 29, 30, 31, and 32 in block A of said town, together with the privilege of entering upon said canal and building and maintaining such proper and necessary works and machinery as might be proper in order to utilize said water and water power for the purposes of a flouring mill, provided such use should not interfere with the flow of water in said canal. It is also agreed that the canal should be under the control of the canal company, and that it should have the right to use and enlarge the same, provided such use and enlargement should not interfere with the flow of water to the mill. It is also provided that said Deming should return all said water so used to the mill ditch, and not permit the same to run to waste, and not to use or permit the same other than as a motive power for said mill. It was also understood and agreed that the water to be used and granted was intended to form a part of the appurtenances of said mill and land, and that the right thereto should be transferable, etc. It is further covenanted and agreed, among other things, that the canal company might sell 1,000 water rights of 1 cubic foot of water each, and if at any time the aggregate quantity of water in the canal of said company should fall short of 1,000 cubic feet of water flowing per second, then said 83⅓ cubic feet should represent 83⅓-1000ths of said aggregate quantity, and said Deming should be entitled to receive water in that proportion. It is also covenanted that the agreements and covenants in said contract should run with and bind said land and mill. There are a number of other stipulations in said contract, which, however, are contained in the contract first referred to herein, and are not now necessary to be noticed. Afterwards said Deming conveyed all his right, title, and interest in said property, and his rights under said contracts, to the Fresno Milling Company, the plaintiff herein.

"Plaintiff in this action claims that the assigned contract—the one dated the 22d day of April, 1886—was procured by fraud on the part of the Fresno Canal Company, and is, as to the plaintiff herein, null and void; that under the first contract made, said Deming, or his successors, the plaintiff, was entitled to a deed in fee simple to said 83⅓ cubic feet of water, to be used by said plaintiff in any manner that it should see fit. The contention of the defendant, on the other hand, is that the assigned contract was not obtained by fraud, but was entered into to take the place of the first contract, and for the purpose of more fully and precisely carrying out the views and intentions of the parties thereto; that it was never intended that the plaintiff should have any right to said water, excepting as a motive power to its mill. Without reviewing at length the evidence on this point, I think it clearly appears, not only from the terms of the contracts themselves, but from the other evidence in the case, that the second contract was not procured by fraud; that the parties to it understood fully its terms and effect, and that it fully expresses what the intentions of the parties were from the inception of the transactions complained of down to the time of their completion, and that it was intended by both parties thereto that it should take the place of the first contract; that they both entered into it with a full understanding of its terms and effects of the covenants therein contained. To mention a few of the many reasons for this conclusion, I would say that the amount of water, according to the evidence,—83⅓ cubic feet per second,—was worth for irrigation purposes, at the rates at which water was being sold at that time, over $65,000, whereas the full purchase price agreed to be paid by the plaintiff for the use of said water, together with said four lots with the improvements thereon, was only $20,500. It will also be understood that throughout the first instrument—because, as to the terms of the second instrument, there can be no question —the expression constantly occurs that said water was to be furnished to said Deming for motive power to said mill, for the purpose of running said mill, etc. Further, that for several years after this contract was entered into, and water was being furnished to said mill, the milling company laid no claim to said water after it had passed its mill, and the defendant during all these years constantly and uninterruptedly appropriated said water to its own use, without any objection on the part of said milling company. Besides, the evidence clearly shows that the second contract was entered into deliberately by Deming, without a scintilla of proof tending to show that he was misled or overreached in any manner whatever. If this conclusion is correct, the fact, as contended by counsel for plaintiff, that the first contract operated as a grant from defendant to plaintiff, cannot alter the result, as it was simply a grant of water as a 'motive power for said mill.'

"The remaining question which I shall notice in this decision is whether or not the defendant, the canal company, has furnished to said milling company, at their mill, the quantity of water agreed to be furnished by them, to wit, 83⅓ cubic feet per second. The evidence upon this point, necessarily, from the nature of the case, consists mostly of expert testimony. That offered upon the part of the plaintiff,—Mr. Grunsky,—who seemed to be quite a competent witness upon such matters, tended to prove that the plaintiff failed to deliver the full amount of water agreed by it to be delivered, and that it only delivered some 70.79 feet. The evidence upon the part of the defendant consisted of the testimony of Mr. Manuel and Mr. Eastwood, two scientific men, apparently as competent and disinterested to testify upon this question as Mr. Grunsky, and their evidence tended to prove that the defendant not only delivered as much as 83⅓ cubic feet of water per second, but that the supply furnished by it far exceeded this amount, to wit, about 110 cubic feet per second. It also appeared in evidence, without contradiction, that the water wheel of the plaintiff only had a capacity of some 71.91 feet, and defendant contends that, even if it had failed to deliver the full amount agreed to by it, the plaintiff has not been damaged, for the reason that, if the water had been delivered, it could not have utilized the same. It would be an idle matter for me to review the evidence of these scientific witnesses upon this question by entering upon an extended criticism of their modes of procedure and the mathematical processes upon which their opinions are based. Suffice it to say that the witnesses on both sides, though adopting and using recognized and approved scientific tests, arrived at surprisingly different conclusions; and I am of the opinion, giving it full weight, and after a very thorough consideration of all the evidence offered by them, that the plaintiff has failed to prove by a preponderance of the evidence that the defendant has not delivered the amount of water agreed upon. Upon the contrary, the preponderance of the evidence is with the defendant that something over 110 feet of water has, during the times specified in said complaint, been delivered at the mill of the plaintiff. As I stated before, the evidence is uncontradicted that the plaintiff's water wheel only had a capacity of some 71.90 cubic feet per second, and, this being true, I am unable to see in what manner the plaintiff has been injured by a failure, even if it were true, of the defendant to deliver 83⅓ cubic feet of water per second, when it had no means of utilizing more than 71.90 feet. Upon this point Mr. Grunsky says: 'It would not have been of any advantage to have had a larger quantity of water in the canal or in the mill ditch than there was at the time of my observations, for the reason that the excess could not have been carried away by the tail race.' The canal company agreed to enlarge the canal below the mill so as to properly carry off the water delivered, and this it did. But there was no agreement that it would increase the fall at the mill, which was some 13 feet to 16 feet, which would have entailed an expenditure of over $20,000, in order that the power and capacity of the mill might be increased. There is no evidence that such a thing was ever contemplated by the parties. This being true, of course the court is of the opinion that the plaintiff has not been damaged, and it is idle to consider what its profits would have been had its capacity and motive power been larger."

In addition to an answer upon the merits, defendant pleaded in bar a judgment rendered in an action entitled "City of Fresno v. The Fresno Milling Company and the Fresno Canal & Irrigation Company." When the judgment roll in that case was offered in evidence, objection was made that it was not a final judgment, the time for appeal not having expired, and the motion for a new trial being then pending. We think the action of the court in overruling the objection error. A judgment, in order to be successfully pleaded in bar, must be a final judgment; not alone final as to the court which rendered it, but final as to the subject-matter. We had occasion to discuss this question in Re Blythe's Estate (decision filed Aug. 31, 1893) 34 Pac. 108, and are well satisfied with the rule of law there declared. The soundness of the doctrine finds no better illustration than is presented by the trial of the present case. The judgment which was here successfully pleaded in bar was subsequently reversed by this court. It is thus apparent how unsubstantial a thing it was, and how entirely insufficient to serve as a perpetual bar to further litigation. But the error of the court was harmless, for, as we have already seen, the defendant's cause is a just one upon the merits. The remaining objections to the admissibility of the evidence are not well founded. While the evidence in some respects may conflict, the findings all appear to find support therein. For the foregoing reasons, the judgment and order are affirmed.

We concur: McFARLAND, J.; PATERSON, J.; HARRISON, J.

BEATTY, C. J. I concur in the conclusions of the court, except upon one point. I think it appears from the evidence, without substantial conflict, that the defendant has failed on several occasions, and for considerable periods of time, and without any sufficient excuse, to furnish the amount of water it contracted to furnish; also that it has failed to keep the canal below the plaintiff's mill clear and of sufficient capacity to carry the water away from the wheel, as it contracted to do,—from all of which the plaintiff has suffered damage for which it is entitled to compensation. For these reasons I think the appellant should have been granted a new trial.

BYGUM v. SOUTHERN PAC. CO. (No. 15,222.)

INJURY AT RAILROAD CROSSING.

In an action against a railroad company to recover for the death of a boy between five and six years of age, where the evidence tended to show that he was killed at a public crossing in a town of between 2,000 and 3,000 people, by being run over by defendant's passenger train, which was running from 15 to 40 miles an hour, the questions of the company's negligence, and the contributory negligence of the boy and his parents, are for the jury.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Alameda county; John Ellsworth, Judge.

Action by Carl C. Bygum against the Southern Pacific Company for damages for causing the death of his minor son. From an order granting plaintiff a new trial, after nonsuit, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Jas. C. Martin and A. A. Moore, for appellant. Jennings & Hubbs, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. This is an appeal by the defendant from an order granting the plaintiff a new trial after a judgment of nonsuit had been entered against him. The action was brought to recover damages for the death of plaintiff's son, alleged to have been caused by the negligence of the defendant, its servants, and employés, in operating its railroad. The boy was between five and six years of age, and, when attempting to cross defendant's railroad track, was struck by a moving engine, and instantly killed. The complaint alleged that the accident which resulted in the death of the boy occurred about 1 o'clock in the afternoon, at the crossing of the railroad and University avenue, in the village of West Berkeley, Alameda county. The answer denied that the accident occurred at the crossing named in the complaint, or at any public crossing of the railroad; denied that it occurred by reason of any negligence or fault on the part of the defendant or its servants and employes; and alleged that it occurred solely by and through the negligence of the boy and his father, the plaintiff. The nonsuit was granted upon the theory that the accident did not occur at a street crossing, and that the case came within the rule declared in Toomey v. Railroad Co., 86 Cal. 374, 24 Pac. 1074; but after hearing the motion for new trial the court was of the opinion that the evidence as to where the accident occurred, and as to whether it was caused by the negligence of the defendant, or by the negligence of the boy and his parents, should have been submitted to the jury, and therefore granted the motion.

There was evidence tending to show that West Berkeley was a village situated partly on both sides of the railroad, and having a population numbering from two to three thousand; that University avenue crossed the railroad and was the principal street of the village, and was much used by people passing over it with teams and on foot; that the boy, when struck by the engine, was on that street, and was attempting to cross from the east to the west side of the railroad track; and that the engine which struck him was hauling a belated west-bound passenger train, and was running at the rate of from 15 to 40 miles an hour. The issues in the case were: Was the accident caused by the negligence of the employés of the defendant? and did the negligence of the boy and his parents proximately contribute to it? Upon these issues, we think there was evidence sufficient to entitle the plaintiff to have them submitted to the jury, and that the court properly so held, in granting the motion for new trial. Negligence is generally an inference from facts and circumstances, which it is the province of the jury to find; and, in an action for damages for injury caused by negligence, a nonsuit upon the ground of contributory negligence should only be granted when, giving the plaintiff the benefit of all controverted questions, it is apparent to the court that a verdict in his favor must necessarily be set aside. And the negligence of parents in allowing their child to be alone in the street does not relieve the defendant from liability, if the injury occurred through the gross negligence of its employé. Schierhold v. Railroad Co., 40 Cal. 447. On a trial before a jury in an action for negligence, a nonsuit should not be ordered by the court unless there is no evidence at all, or a mere scintilla of evidence, wholly insufficient for the consideration of the jury. Wilson v. Railroad Co., 62 Cal. 164. And when a nonsuit is improperly ordered, and a motion for new trial is made, it should be granted. Alvarado v. De Celis, 54 Cal. 588. It follows that the order appealed from must be affirmed, and it is so ordered.

CRAMER v. KESTER, Road Overseer. (No. 15,191.)

INJUNCTION—RESTRAINING DESTRUCTION OF FENCE —TITLE OF PLAINTIFF.

In an action to enjoin a road overseer from removing a fence, where defendant does not deny plaintiff's allegation of possession, but relies on an easement in the public as justifying him, plaintiff need not prove title, possession being sufficient upon which to maintain his action.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Monterey county; N. A. Dorn, Judge.

Action by Jos. Cramer against F. U. Kester, road overseer, to enjoin him from removing a fence. From a judgment for plaintiff, and an order denying his motion for new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

B. V. Sargent, Dist. Atty., and S. F. Geil, for appellant. W. A. Kearney, for respondent.

SEARLS, C. This is an action by Joseph Cramer against F. U. Kester, road overseer of Cholame road district, in the county of Monterey, to restrain the latter from destroying and removing a fence surrounding premises of the plaintiff. Plaintiff had judgment, from which, and from an order denying a new trial, defendant appeals.

Plaintiff, in his complaint, avers that he is the owner of, in the possession of, and entitled to the possession of, the W. ½ of the N. W. ¼, section 8, township 24 S., range 13 E., M. D. M., situate in the county of Monterey, state of California; that said land is inclosed by a substantial fence, and is valuable for raising crops of vegetables, cereals, and hay; that on November 2, 1891, the board of supervisors of Monterey county, claiming that there was a highway over said tract of land, passed an order directing the road overseer to open, and to keep open, for public travel, such public highway so claimed; that defendant is road overseer, has threatened, and will, unless restrained, tear down the fence, and open, and keep open, said alleged highway. The complaint then negatives the fact that a highway has ever been laid out or erected as a road or highway by order of the board of supervisors of said county, or that it has ever become such by use or dedication, or otherwise. The answer admits the ownership of plaintiff to all the land described in his complaint, except a strip which is defined by courses and distances, being a strip of about 40 feet wide across said land, as to which defendant, on information and belief, denies plaintiff is the owner, or entitled to the possession of, and, upon like information and belief, avers it to be a public highway, to which the county of Monterey, a municipal corporation, is entitled to the possession and control of as such. The answer further avers, upon information and belief, that plaintiff will not lose any vested right, and that the said public highway was established upon the land, and that plaintiff and his predecessors acquired the same subject to the said easement, and not otherwise. There are other allegations in the complaint and answer, but they are not important to any question made on appeal. At the trial, defendant called the plaintiff as a witness on behalf of the defense, and put to him the following questions: (1) "Does this piece of land described in your complaint belong to you, or your wife?" (2) "Did you ever execute and deliver a deed or other document purporting to convey the land described in your complaint to your wife, after you purchased it from Davis?" Counsel for plaintiff objected to the evidence as incompetent, and not the best evidence. The objections were sustained, exceptions noted, and the rulings are assigned as error. There seem two answers to the contention of appellant:

1. If the proffered evidence was admissible for any purpose, it was to show that title had passed from plaintiff to his wife. This could only be proven by a proper conveyance in writing. "There can be no evidence of the contents of a writing, other than the writing itself," except in certain enumerated cases, of which this is not one. There are a few instances in which the fact that an instrument was executed or existed may be proven by parol, for some incidental purpose, as to fix the date of a transaction, and in which the contents of the instrument itself are not proffered as evidence. These are exceptions, however, to what may be regarded as one of the most clearly settled propositions of the law of evidence. Rice, Ev. p. 145.

2. The ownership, possession, and right to possession of plaintiff to the land described in his complaint are practically admitted by the pleadings. The answer expressly admits his ownership to the land, except as to that covered by the alleged highway, as to which it denies, upon information and belief, that he is the owner, or entitled to the possession, but, on the contrary, avers it is a public highway, and that, as such, the county is entitled to the control and possession of it. As before stated, the answer further avers that the locus in quo is a highway, and that the plaintiff and his predecessors in interest acquired the same subject to the easement. An easement or right of way over land does not constitute a title thereto; and we think it apparent that as the appellant did not deny the possession of plaintiff, which, in itself, is sufficient to maintain an action against a mere trespasser, and did justify the threatened entry only by pleading an easement in the public, of which the defendant was the representative, that the denials of the answer did not call for proof of title in the plaintiff. If defendant had no right to open the premises for highway purposes, possession in plaintiff was a sufficient title upon which to maintain the action. If defendant possessed such right, title in the plaintiff could not defeat it. Counsel have devoted much space in their briefs to a discussion of the testimony, and to quotations therefrom. It requires but a casual review of such testimony to show that it involved a substantial conflict upon all the material points, and, as the findings are full and explicit in favor of the plaintiff, the judgment and order appealed from should be affirmed.

We concur: HAYNES, C.; BELCHER, C.

WENGANT v. BARTLETT. (No. 15,271.)

IMPLIED TRUST—WHAT CONSTITUTES.

Where a purchaser of property has the title made to another as a matter of convenience, —such other conveying it to him on the same day,—such other is not the purchaser's trustee, as to the land, though the latter conveyance is delivered back to him by the purchaser, and destroyed, with the purchaser's consent, since, on the delivery of the deed to the purchaser, the legal title passed, and the subsequent destruction thereof could not affect the title.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; J. C. B. Hebbard, Judge.

Action by Hannah Wengant against Alfred Bartlett to quiet title to land. From a judgment for plaintiff, and from an order denying a new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Fisher Ames, for appellant. T. M. Osmont, for respondent.

GAROUTTE, J. This is an action to quiet title. Defendant admits that he claims an adverse interest in the land, and bases such interest upon a claim for compensation out of said land as plaintiff's trustee thereof. Judgment went for plaintiff, and this appeal is from the order denying a motion for a new trial.

The facts of the case, briefly stated, are as follows: Plaintiff purchased the tract of land, and had the conveyance made to defendant, as a mere matter of convenience. Upon the same day the defendant conveyed the land to plaintiff, and some time thereafter this deed was delivered back to defendant, it never having been recorded. The deed was then destroyed by defendant, probably with the consent of plaintiff. The record title thus appeared in the defendant at the commencement of this action. The defendant claims that under this state of facts he was constituted the trustee of plaintiff, and, as such trustee rendered services to her, in the care and attention of this realty, and that his compensation therefor constitutes a lien thereon. The findings of fact are full and complete against defendant's claims, at all points. Among other things, the court found that the defendant rendered no services of appreciable value to plaintiff, and if any services whatever were rendered, they were intended by defendant to be gratuitous. The evidence is sufficient to support these findings, and they are determinative of the case. Again, the facts we have cited do not constitute the defendant plaintiff's trustee. Upon the delivery by defendant of his deed to plaintiff, the legal title passed from him, and never came back. The subsequent destruction of the deed, even if destroyed with the consent of plaintiff, did not affect the status of the title in the slightest degree. The mere record title stood in the name of defendant, and that was all. That fact comprised his entire connection with the property, and was not sufficient to create a trust. The order denying the motion for a new trial is affirmed.

HUFFMAN v. HALL. (No. 18,029.)

REPEAL OF STATUTE—EFFECT OF AMENDING ACT —HIGHWAYS—TITLE BY USER.

1. Since the re-enactment of a statute for the purpose of amending it, as required by Const. art. 4, § 24, has the effect of repealing the original statute, Act March 30, 1874, amending Pol. Code, § 2619, by striking out the provision that "all roads used as such for a period of five years" shall be highways, repealed such provision as to the whole state, though the amending act in terms applied only to certain counties therein named. Beatty, C. J., dissenting. Gloster v. Wade, 21 Pac. 6, 78 Cal. 407, overruled.

2. The fact that land is inclosed is strong evidence to show that any use of it by the public was only permissive.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Merced county; Joseph H. Budd, Judge.

Action by C. H. Huffman against A. C. Hall to recover damages for the removal of a fence, and to enjoin defendant from further interfering therewith. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Breckinridge & Peck and B. F. Fowler, for appellant. W. A. Nygh, F. H. Gould, T. C. Law, and Baldwin & Campbell, for respondent.

HARRISON, J. The plaintiff is the owner of a tract of land in Merced county, lying to the east of the Snelling road, and bounding upon Bear creek at the south. The defendant was the road overseer of road district No. 1 of Merced county, and on the 17th of January, 1889, destroyed and removed about 60 feet of a fence which extended from Bear creek northerly between the Snelling road and the plaintiff's land, under the claim that it was an obstruction to a public road along the northerly bank of Bear creek. The plaintiff brought this action for damages for the alleged trespass, and to enjoin the defendant from further interfering with the fence. Judgment was rendered in his favor, and the defendant has appealed.

The title of the plaintiff to the land was not questioned at the trial, and the finding of the court that the land had been, for a period of more than 10 years prior to January, 1889, inclosed along the Snelling road with a good and substantial fence, is not excepted to. The defendant, however, sought to show that the public had traveled over this strip of land, and used the same as a public highway, for a continuous period of more than five years since the 10th of January, 1873, and claimed that by reason of such user it had become a public highway. In this connection he stated that he did not expect to prove that the owner had shown any intention to dedicate the land as a public highway, except by showing such use, and it was admitted that no compensation had been paid to the plaintiff. Upon the objection of the plaintiff this evidence was excluded, and this ruling is now assigned as error. The Political Code went into effect January 1, 1873, and section 2619 thereof provided that "roads laid out and recorded as highways by order of the board of supervisors, and all roads used as such for a period of five years are highways." In 1874 this section was amended by striking out the words, "and all roads used as such for a period of five years," and the section, as thus amended, was in force upon that subject until the entire chapter upon this subject was repealed, in 1883, and a new chapter substituted in its place, by which it is declared in section 2618: "In all counties of this state public highways are roads, streets, alleys, lanes, courts, places, trails and bridges laid out or erected as such by the public, or if laid out or erected by others, dedicated or abandoned to the public, or made such in actions for the partition of real property." As there is no claim that the road in question has been laid out as such by the public, it cannot be held to be a public highway by virtue of this section, unless it is shown to have been "dedicated or abandoned to the public" by the owner of the land. The finding that the premises had been inclosed for a period of more than 10 years prior to the alleged trespass is inconsistent with an abandonment of them to the public, and shows that the road had not been laid out or erected over them; and it was stated by the defendant at the trial that he did not expect to prove any intention on the part of the owner to dedicate the land as a public highway, except by proving its use by the public. Unless, therefore, the road in question had become a public highway prior to 1883, the offer of proof on the part of the defendant was insufficient to establish its existence as a highway, and was properly excluded. Dedication must be made by the owner of the land, and exists only when he has manifested some intention to make the dedication. "It is never to be presumed without evidence of an unequivocal intention on the part of the owner." Quinn v. Anderson, 70 Cal. 456, 11 Pac. 746. The fact that the land had been inclosed by a fence would show that any use of it by the public was only permissive, and "has always been considered as strong evidence in support of a mere license to the public to pass over the designated way, and in rebuttal of a dedication to public use." Quinn v. Anderson, supra. Private property cannot be taken for public use without compensation, either by direct proceedings for that purpose or by a mere user on the part of the public, unless the use has been so adverse as to prevent the owner from asserting title thereto, and for this purpose it must be shown that the user was adverse. "Where the dedication as a highway is sought to be established by user, it must appear that such user was with the knowledge of the owner, and with his consent, or without objection on his part." Hope v. Barnett, 78 Cal. 14, 20 Pac. 245.

The provision in section 2619 of the Code, as it was originally enacted, declaring that all roads used as such for a period of five years are highways, having been superseded by the amendment of that section in 1874, cannot be invoked as an authority for the creation of a highway by mere user. By the amendment of the section its provisions, as originally enacted, were obliterated from the statutes of the state, and the amended section was thereafter the only statutory provision upon that subject. The amendment was made by an act passed March 30, 1874 (Amend. Codes 1873-74, p. 116), in which several other sections in relation to highways were amended, of which section 38 provides that "this act shall apply only to the following named counties" (designating them). This limitation of the section to certain enumerated counties did not, however, have the effect of retaining the original section in force upon the statute book. By its amendment it was repealed, and the effect of section 38 was to limit the statutory provisions of the amended sections to the enumerated counties, and leave the remaining counties of the state unaffected by the provisions of the Civil Code upon the subjects embraced in those sections. The constitution (article 4, § 24) declares that "no law shall be revised or amended by reference to its title; but in such case the act revised or section amended shall be re-enacted and published at length as revised or amended." It was held in Billings v. Harvey, 6 Cal. 381, that under this provision of the constitution, "if a statute or section of a statute is re-enacted, it is totally inconsistent with the idea that the old statute or section still remains in force, or has vitality for any purpose whatever. The re-enactment creates anew the rule of action, and, even if there was not the slightest difference in the phraseology of the two, the latter alone can be referred to as the law, and the former stands, to all intents, as if absolutely and expressly repealed." This rule of construction was afterwards reaffirmed by the court in Billings v. Hall, 7 Cal. 3; Morton v. Folger, 15 Cal. 284; Clarke v. Huber, 25 Cal. 594; Bensley v. Ellis, 39 Cal. 313; People v. Tisdale, 57 Cal. 104. When section 2619 was, in 1874, "amended to read as follows," the section, as it had previously stood upon the statute book, ceased to have any statutory force, and was no longer a portion of the laws of the state. The provision of section 38 of the act by which the amendment was made limited the effect of the amended section to certain enumerated counties, but did not have the effect of continuing the original section in force in the other counties. The section, as amended, is to be construed as if the designated counties had been specified in the section itself, and as if it had been amended to read: "In the counties of [designating them], roads laid out and recorded as highways by order of the board of supervisors are highways." If the section had been amended in this form, there would be no room for construction, or, if the amendatory act had provided that the sections as originally enacted should remain in force in the remaining counties of the state, the legislative will would have been manifest and upheld, since the constitution in force at that time did not prohibit local legislation. In the absence of such saving clause, however, the effect of the amendment was to make the section local in its application, and to leave the other counties of the state without any provisions in the Code upon the subject. We are not unmindful of the fact that in Gloster v. Wade, 78 Cal. 407, 21 Pac. 6, it was held that the effect of section 38 in the amendatory act of 1874 was to leave the provisions of section 2619, as originally enacted, in force in all the counties, except those enumerated in said section 38, and to cause the provisions of the amended section to be applicable only to the designated counties, thus, in effect, leaving section 2619, as originally enacted, in force after it had been superseded by its amendment. This construction is, however, at variance with the provisions of the constitution as expounded in the foregoing cases, and we must regard the constitution as of higher authority than the decision in that case, and therefore decline to follow it as an authority.

The suggestion that this construction of the effect of the act of 1874 would destroy the existence of a road law in most of the counties of the state, from 1874 to 1883, and invalidate all action that had been taken in those counties, loses its force upon a consideration of the Civil Code in connection with the law on this subject as it existed prior to 1873. It is well known that, prior to the adoption of the Codes, it was customary for the legislature to enact special road laws for individual counties in the state, adapting the provisions of those laws to the needs of the respective counties. This mode of legislation began as early as 1858, the legislature having in that year enacted road laws for seven different counties in the state, and the general road law which was adopted in 1861 excepted a large number of counties from its operation. In 1872, at the same session of the legislature in which the Codes were adopted, special road laws were enacted for 15 different counties in the state, and acts amending the existing road laws for 13 other counties. When the compilers of the Codes made their report to the legislature, they recognized the existence of these various laws, and proposed two alternative chapters upon the subject of highways,—one substantially in the form as it was enacted, and another declaring that none of the provisions of the Codes should affect any of the provisions of these laws, but that they should be continued in force notwithstanding the provisions of the Political Code. The legislature, however, instead of adopting either of these chapters by itself, combined the two, and added to the chapter on highways section 2757 of the Political Code, as follows: "Nothing in this chapter affects the provisions of any statute in relation to roads and highways now in force, and made applicable to one or more counties by name, but whenever any such statute is repealed, then the provisions of this chapter are applicable to the county named in the statute repealed." When the amendments of 1874 were adopted, this section, with several others of the chapter, were retained, so that the provisions contained in these laws continued in force until 1883, when the entire chapter was revised, and all special laws relating to roads were repealed. At the session in 1874, when these amendments were adopted, the special laws applicable to the greater portion of the counties enumerated in section 38 of the amendatory act were repealed, and at subsequent sessions statutes were enacted providing special road laws for some of the same counties,—Contra Costa, Sacramento, Fresno, Butte, and others. In 1876 a special road law was enacted for Lassen county (St. 1876, p. 539), in which "all the provisions of the Political Code in relation to highways" were made applicable to that county. Similar provisions have been made in road laws enacted for other counties since 1874,—San Bernardino (St. 1876, p. 57), Butte (St. 1856, p. 37), Fresno (St. 1878, p. 859), and others. From these acts it is apparent that it could not have been the understanding of the legislature that those provisions of the Political Code as they were originally adopted, and as found in the sections enumerated in the amendatory act of 1874, were both in force; and, unless it be held that by the amending of the sections the original ones were repealed, there would be in some of these acts contradictory and irreconcilable provisions. Under these provisions of the Code it ought to be assumed that, if any roads were established or improved in any of these counties during this period, the work was done under the provisions of these special acts, rather than under a law which was inapplicable to those counties. The judgment is affirmed.

We concur: DE HAVEN, J.; PATERSON, J.; GAROUTTE, J.; McFARLAND, J.

BEATTY, C. J. (dissenting). There are several grounds elaborately presented in respondent's brief, upon one or more of which the judgment of the superior court might, perhaps, be affirmed; but, these matters havbeen passed over in the opinion of the court, it would be profitless to discuss them in a dissenting opinion, and therefore I shall make no attempt to do so. It would not be proper, however, to say that I dissent from the judgment without meeting and disposing of the questions so presented, and I do not say so. I merely wish to express my dissent from the conclusion and reasoning of the court upon the single point decided in its opinion.

As one of those who participated in the decision of Gloster v. Wade, 78 Cal. 407, 21 Pac. 6 (here overruled), I am perfectly willing to concede that the provisions of the constitution are of higher authority than that decision, or any decision, but I am unable to perceive the application of the doctrine. The provision of the constitution alluded to prescribes the method of amending statutes, and the entire sum and substance of the decisions cited upon its construction is that, when a section of the statute is amended as the constitution directs, the old section ceases to exist at the same time that the new and amended section comes into operation. But none of those cases involved the effect of a saving clause, and, while they are undoubtedly correct as far as they go, the doctrine which they establish is in no wise inconsistent with the proposition conceded in this opinion,—that the legislature, in amending a statute or part of a statute, may by a saving clause continue the old section or statute in force as to classes of persons or parts of the state. This proposition was very recently affirmed here in a case which received more careful, and I may say more anxious, consideration than any case that has been before the court during the time that I have participated in its deliberations. In the Case of McNulty, 93 Cal. 427, 26 Pac. 597, and 29 Pac. 61, it was held that various sections of the Penal Code relating to the mode of executing a sentence of death were kept in force as to all capital offenses committed prior to their amendment, by virtue of a general saving clause contained in section 329 of the Political Code; and there can be no distinction in principle between a saving clause which keeps a road law in force after amendment as to certain counties of the state and one which keeps a penal statute in force after amendment as to a certain class of offenders. The legislature, then, having the undoubted power to preserve the old road law as to a part of the state by a saving clause, the only question in Gloster v. Wade was one of statutory construction; whether, in other words, the legislature had, by section 38 of the act of 1874, manifested its intention so to preserve the old law in all except the enumerated counties. If it had, by language which, however equivocal, fairly expressed such an intention, there could be no question that it must prevail. After due deliberation, the court in banc, without any dissent, adopted the opinion unanimously concurred in by the commissioners,—that section 38 was intended to operate as a saving clause,—and afterwards a petition for a rehearing was denied, again without dissent expressed by any member of the court. This decision was, in my opinion, correct. But, even if it was erroneous in putting a wrong construction upon the statute, I cannot see how it violated the constitution. It certainly did not concede to the legislature any power which it does not possess, but merely affirmed an intention to exercise a power, the existence of which no one denies; and, unless a contrary meaning is so clearly expressed in the statute as to admit of no difference of opinion, it seems to me that a decision made under such circumstances, concurred in apparently by the whole court and all the commissioners, and deliberately reaffirmed on petition for rehearing, ought to be deemed sufficient authority to call for the same decision here.

But Gloster v. Wade is not wholly unsupported. If any law writer is entitled to be deemed authority upon the statute law of California, Mr. Hittell may fairly claim that honor. His compilations of the statutes and codes were for many years, and until superseded in part by later compilations, commonly cited in all the courts of the state, and certainly enjoyed the reputation of being accurate and trustworthy, which they could not have been if prepared by a compiler ignorant of the effect and construction of saving and repealing clauses. Upon these points I should say that he might properly be regarded as an expert. Now, by reference to a note under section 2619 of Hittell's Political Code of 1876, it will be seen that he placed precisely the same construction upon section 38 of the act of 1874 that was subsequently given to it by this court in Gloster v. Wade. And not only did Mr. Hittell give it that construction. It was so construed and acted upon throughout the state, from the date of its passage, for a period of nine years, and until the road law was revised and re-enacted by the statute of 1883. For it is to be observed that not only section 2619 of the Political Code was amended by the act of 1874. More than 30 other sections of the road law, embracing every important provision in it, were either amended or directly repealed by the same act; and upon the doctrine of the present case it follows that there was no road law in most of the counties of the state from 1874 to 1883. There was, during that period, not only no statute defining a road; there was no law for establishing, erecting, improving, or maintaining a road or bridge. No road district could be created, no road overseer appointed, no tax collected. Yet it is notorious that all these things were continually done throughout the state, under the assumed authority of the statute, during the entire period when, as we are now told, there was no statute. This is certainly remarkable.

But aside from the mere authority of our former decision, the opinion of Mr. Hittell, and the practical construction of all public officers charged with the care of public roads and bridges for a period of nine years, I rest confidently on the language of section 38 to justify a construction which carried out what no one can doubt was the actual intention of the legislature. "This act shall apply only to the following counties: Calaveras," etc. By the words "this act" the legislature could have intended no other act than that of which the section was a part, viz. the amendatory act of 1874, and not the Political Code, of which section 38 never became a part. This act, then, amending the Political Code, was to apply only to the enumerated counties. But how could this be so if it repealed the Political Code in all other counties? The amendatory act (the only act to which the words "to act" in section 38 can possibly apply) is entitled "An act to amend the Political Code in relation to highways," and all its operative clauses are in strict conformity to its title, as the following examples will show: "Section 1. Section twenty-six hundred and nineteen of said Code is hereby amended so as to read as follows." "Sec. 4. Sections twenty-six hundred and forty-five and twenty-six hundred and forty-six are hereby repealed." These, I repeat, were the operative clauses of "this act;" and if "this act" applied only to certain enumerated counties, and by necessary consequence had no operation in the nonenumerated counties, then, as to such counties, the designated sections of the Political Code were neither amended nor repealed. This, it appears to me, is the plain and obvious and common-sense construction of section 38 of the act of 1874, and was, beyond a doubt, what the legislature actually intended.

WEBSTER v. HANNA, Justice of the Peace.

(No. 15,579.)

MANDAMUS TO JUSTICE—COSTS ON APPEAL.

Under St. 1877–78, p. 134, requiring that all fees of a justice of the peace must be paid before he can be compelled to forward any papers on appeal, mandamus will not lie to compel a justice to forward papers on appeal in a civil action until his fees incurred by both parties have been paid. Beatty, C. J., dissenting.

In bank.

Application for writ of mandamus compelling W. H. Hanna, justice of the peace, to forward papers on appeal. Denied.

Ford & Burnell, for petitioner. H. W. Hanna, in pro. per.

GAROUTTE, J. This is an original application for a writ of mandate to compel a justice of the peace to send to the superior court the papers on appeal in a civil action which had theretofore been tried before said justice, and judgment rendered. The appellant paid the fees of the justice upon the appeal, and also his own costs incurred at the trial of the action, but refused to pay to the justice the costs of the respondent incurred at the trial, and for that reason the justice declined to forward the papers to the clerk of the superior court. If the justice is entitled to receive from the appellant the costs incurred by the respondent at the trial before it becomes his duty to forward the papers to the appellate court, then this application must be denied. An act of the legislature (St. 1877–78, p. 134) declares what fees justices of the peace are entitled to charge, and following such declaration in the same act this language occurs: "All fees of justices of the peace, including those on trial and those on appeal, must be paid before the justice shall be compelled to forward any papers on appeal." This language is very broad, and covers the entire subject. It certainly refers to all fees to which the justice is entitled under the law, whether those fees be incurred by appellant or respondent. See Bray v. Redman, 6 Cal. 287. As to the policy of the law requiring the appellant to pay to the justice all fees incurred by respondent before he is entitled to have the papers transferred to the superior court, we are not called upon to discuss it. This provision of the statute is not in conflict with any section of the Code of Civil Procedure, and is entirely in line with that portion of section 977 bearing upon the fees of justices of the peace. It not being in conflict with any subsequent provision of the Code or statutes, there can be no repeal by implication. While, to some extent, it may be inconsistent with other provisions of the Code, yet inconsistency in statutes does not make this court a forum for the exercise of legislative functions in amending or repealing plain provisions of the law. The application is denied, and the proceedings dismissed.

We concur: PATERSON, J.; McFARLAND, J.; FITZGERALD, J.

BEATTY, C. J. I dissent. The allegations of the petition confessed by the demurrer are, in effect, that in an action commenced in respondent's court by Charles and Emily Foster, judgment was given in their favor and against the petitioner for the return of certain chattels, and for damages, and for $52.60, costs of suit; that petitioner, being dissatisfied with the judgment, took and regularly perfected an appeal to the superior court, and in due time paid to the respondent all of his fees as justice of the peace, and all other costs incurred by the petitioner on the trial of said cause and for making out and transmitting the appeal papers; that the respondent nevertheless refused for more than five days thereafter petitioner's demand that he should transmit said papers. Section 977 of the Code of Civil Procedure reads as follows: "Upon receiving the notice of appeal, and on payment of the fees of the justice or judge, and filing an undertaking as required in the next section, and after settlement or adoption of statement, if any, the justice or judge must, within five days, transmit to the clerk of the superior court, if the appeal be on questions of law alone, a certified copy of his docket, the statement as admitted or as settled, the notice of appeal, and the undertaking filed; or, if the appeal be on questions of fact, or both law and fact, a certified copy of his docket, the pleadings, all notices, motions, and other papers filed in the cause, the notice of appeal, and the undertaking filed; and the justice or judge may be compelled by the superior court, by an order entered upon motion, to transmit such papers, and may be fined for neglect or refusal to transmit the same. A certified copy of such order may be served on the justice or judge by the party or his attorney. In the superior court either party may have the benefit of all legal objections made in the justice's court." If, within the meaning of this section, the fees of the respondent had been paid at the time transmission of said papers was demanded, there can be no doubt that it was his duty, specially enjoined by law, to transmit them to the county clerk within five days thereafter, and no question is made that mandamus will lie to compel him. But the contention, and the whole contention, of respondent is that his fees had not been paid according to the requirements of the section quoted, because, although the petitioner had paid all his own costs and all fees of the justice chargeable to him, he had not paid the costs incurred by, and the fees chargeable to, the Fosters,—the plaintiffs in the action,—and he justifies his refusal upon the ground that the law has annexed to the right of appeal from the judgment of a justice of the peace the condition that the party appealing shall not only pay his own costs, but the costs of his adversary also. This is by no means an obvious construction of section 977, standing alone, and it is in direct conflict with other provisions of the Code in pari materia; at least it is a construction which renders such provisions meaningless and absurd. For instance, by section 896 the costs of the prevailing party must be taxed and included in the judgment, and by section 978 the party appealing, in order to get a stay of proceedings, must file an undertaking with sureties in twice the amount of the judgment, including costs, conditioned for the payment of such, etc. By section 974, 30 days are allowed within which to take an appeal, and by sections 891, 892, the judgment is required to be entered at once upon the rendition of a verdict in case of a jury trial; and when the trial is by the court it must be entered at the close of the trial. These provisions all imply that the prevailing party has paid his costs, and got a judgment for them before the appeal is taken, and, necessarily, before the party appealing is called upon to pay the fees and costs, payment of which is made a condition precedent to the right to demand a transmission of the papers. Taking these several provisions of the statute together, their obvious construction imposes upon the party appealing the payment of no costs but his own. And this construction is also in favor of justice, as the opposite construction is productive of the rankest injustice; for, why should the losing party be compelled to pay the costs of the prevailing party as a condition of exercising his right of appeal, and, especially, when the prevailing party has a judgment for such costs, secured by an ample undertaking, and the losing party has no security for their repayment in case he is finally successful in the litigation? As a question of justice between the parties, the matter is too plain for discussion.

But we are cited to two cases decided in this court, one in 1855 and the other in 1856, which, it is contended, give to a corresponding section of the old practice act (section 627) the construction claimed by respondent for section 977 of the Code of Civil Procedure. In the first of these cases (McDermott v. Douglass, 5 Cal. 89) it clearly appears from the report that the appealing party had failed to pay or tender any fees for filing the appeal bond, or any fees whatever, and, of course, the mandamus was properly refused on that ground. The whole opinion of the court is embraced in two lines, and consists of a misquotation of the statute; that is to say, it quotes the language of section 627 as amended in 1853. St. 1853, p. 280. But this had been changed by the amendment of 1854. St. 1854, p. 70. The case before the court was, however, correctly decided under the statute as amended, and as it has been incorporated into section 977 of the Code, for, as above stated, the appealing party had failed to pay his own costs, including the fee for filing the undertaking on appeal. In the second case (Bray v. Redman, 6 Cal. 287), the point under consideration was not involved, but the court incidentally refers to and approves the decision in McDermott v. Douglass, the correctness of which is not questioned. No case, however, is cited in which this court has held or intimated that the legislature of California has ever deliberately sanctioned such practices as the statute, construed as respondent construes it, would warrant. If the law really meant that a justice of the peace, who has chosen to give credit for his fees to one of the parties to an action before him, may, by deciding the cause in his favor, compel the other party to pay a debt not his own as a condition of exercising his right of appeal, it is easy to see what scandalous abuses might result; for under such a law the justices of the peace would have a pecuniary interest, to be affected favorably or unfavorably by their own decisions, and, whether they were or were not in fact biased, they could never escape the suspicion of bias when their decisions happened to coincide with their interest. This would be an evil of sufficient magnitude if this were all. But if a justice of the peace, whose fees are his only compensation, could increase his official emoluments by encouraging the prosecution of baseless and vexatious suits against responsible defendants by giving credit to impecunious plaintiffs, the bias which would always be suspected in such cases would sometimes exist, and the defendant would be compelled, as the price of an appeal to an impartial tribunal, to pay, not only his own costs, but the costs and charges incurred by the plaintiff in vexatiously pursuing him, and that without any security for their repayment upon a final decision in his favor. This view might be further pressed, and even more strongly illustrated, but enough has been said to show how reluctant any court should be to sustain a construction of the statutes so widely at variance with justice and propriety; and, even if the previous decisions of the court had been in favor of such construction, we should feel no hesitation in overruling them if the terms of the statute would justify us in so doing. But, as we have shown, the cases cited only involved the question whether the appealing party was required to pay his own costs, and, consequently, it could not have been decided that he was required to pay costs of his adversary.

Coming, then, to the statutes themselves, and construing them, as we may, without reference to decisions which do not touch the point in controversy here, we think it has been made sufficiently clear that the provisions of the Code of Civil Procedure not only do not require the construction claimed by respondent, but are plainly inconsistent with it. There is, however, another statute, approved March 1, 1878, relating to the fees of justices, which contains the provision: "All fees of justices of the peace, including those on trial and those on appeal, must be paid before the justice shall be compelled to forward any papers on appeal." In order to determine the proper effect of this provision of the fee bill, it may be necessary to take into consideration the date of its enactment, as compared to the existing provisions of the Code of Civil Procedure relating to the same matter; for, if they are inconsistent, the later statute will prevail, operating a repeal by implication of the earlier. We are not prepared to say when the clause above quoted first found its way into the fee bill, but it dates at least as far back as the act of April 4, 1870, which was amended in other particulars by the act of March 1, 1878. Afterwards—in 1873—the Code of Civil Procedure was adopted. Then, in 1878, as we have seen, this provision of the act of 1870 was re-enacted in amending the section in which it occurs in some other particulars. Then, on March 26, 1880 (St. p. 16), sections 977 et seq., Code Civ. Proc., were re-enacted; so that, on the theory that the two statutes are so inconsistent that the later will repeal the earlier by implication, the provisions of the Code must prevail. On the other hand, if the two statutes are to be construed as statutes in pari materia ought to be construed, so as to harmonize all their provisions as far as can be done, the same result will follow. For the two laws can be harmonized, and they can be harmonized only by limiting the application of the clause quoted from the fee bill to fees and costs incurred by the appealing party; fees, in other words, which he owes, to the exclusion of fees and costs which in legal contemplation have been paid by the other party, and included in his judgment. If it be said that this construction disregards the letter of the law, it may be truly answered that any other construction disregards its substance, and, what is worse, disregards the plainest dictates of justice and propriety. For these reasons, I think a peremptory writ of mandate should issue as prayed.

GRAND LODGE OF I. O. G. T. OF STATE OF CALIFORNIA v. MARKHAM et al. (No. 15,493.)

ORPHAN ASYLUM—SUPPORT BY STATE.

Under St. 1880 (Bancroft's Ed.) p. 48, which provides that institutions conducted for the support of minor orphans, half orphans, and abandoned children shall receive from the state $100 per year for each minor orphan, and $75 for each half orphan and abandoned child, supported by it, for whose specific support therein it does not receive $10 or more per month, the state cannot deduct from the allowance due an institution money otherwise received by it for the specific support of a minor orphan, half orphan, or abandoned child, amounting to less than $10 per month.

In bank.

Petition by the Grand Lodge of the I. O. G. T. of the state of California for a writ of mandamus compelling the state board of examiners to allow it the sum of $866.17 for the support of minor orphans in its orphan asylum. Petition granted.

R. Thompson and J. M. Walling, for petitioner. Oregon Saunders, Dep. Atty. Gen., for respondent.

PER CURIAM. This is an original proceeding in which the petitioner asks this court to issue its writ of mandate, directed to the state board of examiners of the state of California, requiring said board to allow the petitioner the sum of $866.17, which sum petitioner claims is justly due it from the state of California for the support of minor orphans maintained in its orphan asylum in the county of Solano for the maintenance and education of orphans, half orphans, and abandoned children, who are minors. The facts are undisputed, and the decision to be made by us depends entirely upon the construction of sections 1 and 7 of an act of the legislature of this state approved March 25, 1880, entitled "An act to appropriate money for the support of orphans, half orphans and abandoned children." St. 1880 (Bancroft's Ed.) p. 48. "Section 1. There is hereby appropriated out of any money in the state treasury not otherwise appropriated, to each and every institution in this state conducted for the support and maintenance of minor orphans, half orphans or abandoned children * * * aid as follows: For each whole orphan supported and maintained in any such institution the sum of one hundred dollars per annum; for each half orphan supported and maintained in any such institution the sum of seventy-five dollars per annum; for each abandoned child supported and maintained in any such institution, the sum of seventy-five dollars per annum; provided, such abandoned child shall have been an inmate thereof for one year prior to receiving any support as provided in this act." "Sec. 7. In order that the provisions of this act shall not be abused, it is hereby declared: (1) * * * (2) * * * (3) That no child for whose specific support there is paid to any such institution the sum of ten dollars or more per month shall be deemed a minor orphan, half orphan, or abandoned child within the intent and meaning of this act." The only question involved in this proceeding is whether, in the case of a minor orphan supported by the petitioner in its orphan asylum, and for whose support during the period covered by its setlement with the state there has been paid by others a sum less than $10 per month, the state board of examiners is authorized to deduct the sum so paid to the petitioner from the $100 per annum appropriated by the state for the support of minor orphans by the terms of the first section of the act above quoted, and allow to the petitioner only the balance after making such deduction. The statute is so plain that there is no room for construction, and the question presented must be answered in the negative. When less than $10 per month is received by the petitioner from other sources for the specific support of a minor orphan during the period covered by its semiannual settlement, the petitioner is entitled to receive from the state the semiannual installment of the full sum named in section 1 of the act under consideration. Ordered that a peremptory writ of mandate issue in accordance with the prayer of the petitioner.

LIVERMORE v. WAITE, Secretary of State.

(No. 18,270.)

STATE CAPITAL—CHANGE—CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENT.

Const. art. 20, § 1, declares Sacramento the capital until changed by law approved by a majority of the electors at a general election, under such regulations as the legislature by a two-thirds vote of each house may provide, submitting the question of change to the people. A proposition for an amendment of this section declared San Jose the capital until changed in the manner before prescribed, provided that the state should receive a donation of a 10-acre site and $1,000,000 "before such removal shall be had;" the governor, secretary of state, and attorney general to approve the site, and, after the approval and payment of the money, the legislature to provide for building, and for the removal of the seat of government. Held, that these provisos vitiated the proposition, since the vote of the people would not have the effect to change the seat, but merely to do away with the present one, leaving the matter still undetermined. Paterson and McFarland, JJ., say, further, that the seat of government cannot be changed by an amendment of Const. art. 20, § 1, but only by proceedings under that article.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Sacramento county; W. H. Grant, Judge.

Suit by one Livermore, as a taxpayer and citizen of the state, against E. G. Waite, secretary of state, for an injunction. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Atty. Gen. Hart, W. H. Layson, Dep. Atty. Gen., D. M. Delmas, and Morehouse & Tuttle, for appellant. L. T. Hatfield and Grove L. Johnson, for respondent.

HARRISON, J. At the last session of the legislature a proposition for an amendment to section 1 of article 20 of the constitution was adopted by the vote of two-thirds of the members of each house, in the following terms: "Senate Constitutional Amendment No. 23. Submitting to the people of the state of California an amendment to the constitution, amending section one of article twenty of the constitution of the state of California, relative to changing the seat of government from the city of Sacramento to the city of San Jose. The legislature of the state of California, at its thirtieth session, commencing on the second day of January, A. D. one thousand eight hundred and ninety-three, two-thirds of all the members elected to each house of said legislature voting in favor thereof, hereby proposes that section one of article twenty (miscellaneous subjects) of the constitution of the state of California be amended so as to read as follows: Section 1. The city of San Jose is hereby declared to be the seat of government of this state, and shall so remain until changed by law; but no law changing the seat of government shall be valid or binding unless the same be approved and ratified by a majority of the qualified electors of the state voting therefor at a general state election, under such regulations and provisions as the legislature, by a two-thirds vote of each house, may provide, submitting the question of change to the people; provided, that the state shall receive a donation of a site of not less than ten acres and one million dollars before such removal shall be had. The governor, the secretary of state, and the attorney-general are hereby authorized to approve said site, and upon the approval thereof, and the payment of one million dollars into the state treasury, the legislature shall provide for the erection of the necessary building and the removal of the seat of government." The present action was brought by the respondent as a taxpayer and citizen of the state, to restrain the defendant, as secretary of state, from certifying the said amendment to the clerks of the respective counties of the state, and from doing any other act with intent to have the said amendment submitted to the electors of the state, and from incurring any expenses in connection with said amendment, or with any attempt to secure a vote thereon by the people, upon the grounds, as contended by him, that, by reason of the failure to comply with certain constitutional requirements, the amendment was never legally adopted, and, also, that, by the terms of the proposition itself, it is inefficient as an amendment to the constitution, and would be inoperative if approved by the people; and that, as a taxpayer and citizen, he is entitled to this relief against the improper expenditure of public moneys. Judgment was rendered by the court below in favor of the plaintiff, and the defendant has appealed.

The court made findings of fact in reference to the adoption of the amendment substantially as follows: On the 11th of March, 1893, while the legislature was in evening session, and after the hour of 10 o'clock in the afternoon of that day, the proposed amendment was introduced and read in the senate; and, after the roll had been called upon a motion for its adoption, the secretary of the senate announced that 28 senators, including Senators Hart and Voorhies, had voted for the amendment, and 7 had voted against it. Immediately upon the announcement of the vote, what purported to be a true copy of the proposed amendment was transmitted to the assembly, with the announcement that it had been duly adopted by the senate; and at the hour of 10 o'clock and 15 minutes p. m. the senate adjourned. On the same evening, between the hour of 10 o'clock and 15 minutes and 11 o'clock p. m., the rules of the assembly were suspended, and the amendment was voted upon in that house, and received the votes of 57 members in its favor, and 7 against it. Immediately thereon one of the assemblymen who had voted in favor of its adoption gave notice of his intention to move for a reconsideration of the vote, and at 11 o'clock p. m. the assembly adjourned. On the 13th of March (the intervening day being Sunday) another assemblyman who had voted for its adoption moved the reconsideration of such vote, and immediately thereafter, upon his motion, the motion to reconsider was laid upon the table, and during the afternoon session of that day the copy of the amendment, as sent to the assembly, was returned to the senate, with the announcement that it had been duly adopted by the assembly, and the legislature adjourned sine die, without any action by the assembly upon the motion for a reconsideration of the vote by which the amendment had been adopted. When the senate convened on the 13th of March, the journal was corrected so as to show that Senator Voorhies had voted "No" upon the adoption of the amendment, instead of "Aye," as it had been recorded. Thereupon Senator Hart, who had been opposed to the measure, stated that he had voted "No," but had changed to "Aye," because he had ascertained before the announcement of the vote that 27 votes had been cast in favor of the amendment, and that he had changed his vote for the purpose of giving notice of a motion to reconsider, and that, when the vote was announced, he attempted to make such motion, but an adjournment was had before he could present the motion. He therefore asked to have his vote recorded against the amendment. The matter was referred to the committee on judiciary, which reported that he had earnestly endeavored to defeat the measure when before the senate, and recommended that his personal statement be entered upon the journal. The motion of Senator Hart to have the journal corrected was denied, and the journal was approved, showing 27 votes, including that of Senator Hart, in favor of the proposed amendment, and 8 votes against it. The copy voted on in the assembly differed from that voted on in the senate by the omission of the words "of this state," in section 1, immediately after the words "seat of government," and in having the word "laws" instead of "law" in the first sentence. Upon these facts, the respondent, in his argument, has presented various reasons for the affirmance of the judgment, but the conclusion that we have reached concerning the character and effect of the proposed amendment renders it unnecessary to consider the other propositions presented by him.

Article 18 of the constitution provides two methods by which changes may be effected in that instrument,—one by a convention of delegates chosen by the people for the express purpose of revising the entire instrument, and the other through the adoption by the people of propositions for specific amendments that have been previously submitted to it by two-thirds of the members of each branch of the legislature. It can be neither revised nor amended, except in the manner prescribed by itself, and the power which it has conferred upon the legis lature in reference to proposing amendments, as well as to calling a convention, must be strictly pursued. Under the first of these methods the entire sovereignty of the people is represented in the convention. The character and extent of a constitution that may be framed by that body is freed from any limitations other than those contained in the constitution of the United States. If, upon its submission to the people, it is adopted, it becomes the measure of authority for all the departments of government,—the organic law of the state,—to which every citizen must yield an acquiescent obedience. The power of the legislature to initiate any change in the existing organic law is, however, of greatly less extent, and, being a delegated power, is to be strictly construed, under the limitations by which it has been conferred. In submitting propositions for the amendment of the constitution, the legislature is not in the exercise of its legislative power, or of any sovereignty of the people that has been intrusted to it, but is merely acting under a limited power, conferred upon it by the people, and which might with equal propriety have been conferred upon either house, or upon the governor, or upon a special commission, or any other body or tribunal. The extent of this power is limited to the object for which it is given, and is measured by the terms in which it has been conferred, and cannot be extended by the legislature to any other object, or enlarged beyond these terms. The legislature is not authorized to assume the function of a constitutional convention, and propose for adoption by the people a revision of the entire constitution under the form of an amendment, nor can it submit to their votes a proposition which, if adopted, would, by the very terms in which it is framed, be inoperative. The constitution itself has been framed by delegates chosen by the people for that express purpose, and has been afterwards ratified by a vote of the people, at a special election held for that purpose; and the provision in article 18 that it can be revised only in the same manner, and after the people have had an opportunity to express their will in reference thereto, precludes the idea that it was the intention of the people, by the provision for amendments authorized in the first section of this article, to afford the means of effecting the same result which in the next section has been guarded with so much care and precision. The very term "constitution" implies an instrument of a permanent and abiding nature, and the provisions contained therein for its revision indicate the will of the people that the underlying principles upon which it rests, as well as the substantial entirety of the instrument, shall be of a like permanent and abiding nature. On the other hand, the significance of the term "amendment" implies such an addition or change within the lines of the original instrument as will effect an improvement, or better carry out the purpose for which it was framed. Experience may disclose defects in some of its details, or in the practical application of some of the principles or limitations which it contains. The changed condition of affairs in different parts of the state, or the changes of society or time, may demand an enlargement of some of these limitations, or an extended application of its principles. So, too, some popular wave of sociological reform, like the abolition of the death penalty for crime, or a prohibition against the manufacture or sale of intoxicating liquors, may induce a legislature to submit for enactment, in the permanent form of a constitutional prohibition, a rule which it has the power itself to enact as a law, but which might be of only temporary effect.

Section 1 of article 20 of the constitution is as follows: "The city of Sacramento is hereby declared to be the seat of government of this state, and shall so remain until changed by law; but no law changing the seat of government shall be valid or binding unless the same be approved and ratified by a majority of the qualified electors of the state, voting therefor at a general state election, under such regulations and provisions as the legislature, by a two-thirds vote of each house, may provide, submitting the question of change to the people." The designation of the seat of government of a state may not properly fall within the definition of a constitution, but as it is a matter which is of public interest, and concerns the entire state, it is frequently made a part of that instrument, with the qualification that it shall so remain until changed by law. This declaration that the city of Sacramento is the seat of government of this state is a part of the constitution, and may be amended in the same manner as any other portion of that instrument. The provision that it shall so remain the seat of government until changed by law, whether such law is to be passed like any other law, or with the limitations prescribed in this section, is immaterial. The section of the constitution in which this provision is contained is not thereby withdrawn from the possibility of amendment. By this section the constitution provides that the seat of government may be changed in the manner therein prescribed, but the mode of effecting such change is not limited to the one thus provided. The legislature might have provided for changing the seat of government to San Jose by passing a law under the provisions of this section, but, instead of attempting this course, it has seen fit to seek to accomplish the same result through an amendment to the constitution. Either of these courses was open to its choice, and, if the amendment proposed by it were such as is within its power to submit for the approval of the people, the course adopted by it is without objection, for it must be left to the discretion of the legislature to determine which of two methods open to its selection it will adopt. The proposed amendment is, however, ineffective in accomplishing the object expressed in the title of the proposition. Article 18 of section 1 of the constitution provides that, if a proposed amendment is ratified and approved by the people, it "shall become a part of this constitution." By the terms of the proposed amendment, however, its operative effect is limited upon the donation to the state of not less than 10 acres in land and $1,000,000 in money, and the approval by the governor, the secretary of state, and the attorney general of the site so donated. The section of the constitution which is to be superseded by the proposed amendment fixes the seat of government at Sacramento, and, so long as that section remains a part of the constitution, the seat of government will remain at Sacramento until changed by law. But, if the proposed amendment should be adopted by the people, it would obliterate this section from the constitution without leaving any constitutional declaration by which the seat of government would be located in any part of the state. Although the first section of the amendment is in terms the declaration of an existing fact, the concluding portion shows that the amendment, as a whole, has reference to a future state of facts which may never come into existence. The proviso in the amendment is a limitation upon the declaration that the seat of government is at San Jose, and postpones the effect of that declaration until the conditions in the proviso have been complied with. Under established rules of construction applicable to constitutions, as well as to statutes, the effect of a proviso to an act is to render the proviso a limitation upon the body of the act, and to deprive the substantive part of the act of all effect inconsistent with the terms of the proviso. The effect of the amendment, if approved by the people, would be that the seat of government will at some future time be at San Jose, provided a donation of $1,000,000 in money and 10 acres of land shall be made. Until the donation of money and land shall have been made, and the site donated approved by the designated officers, the removal of the seat of government cannot take place; and the declaration in the first sentence that "the city of San Jose is hereby declared to be the seat of government of this state" would be ineffectual, for the reason that the amendment would fail to become an operative part of the constitution. The "removal" for which the legislature is directed to provide in the last clause of the proposed amendment is the removal from Sacramento to San Jose, and not a subsequent removal from San Jose, as is suggested in one of the briefs filed herein. By the existing constitution the seat of government is fixed at Sacramento, and is to remain there until changed; and by the terms of the proposed amendment there can be no removal except in accordance with the terms of the proviso upon which it is conditioned, and which limits the removal from Sacramento to San Jose to those terms. This removal is conditioned upon the approval of the site that must be donated before the declarative portion of the section can have any operation, and is the removal which is referred to in the proviso which declares that the donation shall be made "before such removal shall be had." If any additional argument is needed, it is found in the current history of the adoption of the amendment, and also in the entitling of the proposition for the amendment, which declares it to be "relative to changing the seat of government from the city of Sacramento to the city of San Jose." The provision in the proposed amendment for a law providing for its subsequent change from San Jose would not, upon its approval by the people, become an operative provision of the constitution, for the reason that that city will not, upon the mere approval of the amendment by the people, become the seat of government, so that the proposition of the legislature, instead of amending the constitution, either by changing any of its terms, or adding thereto some other limitation, would take away the provision which now exists, and place in its stead a provision which is incompatible with the requirement that it shall become a part of the instrument. The legislature was not authorized by the framers of the constitution, nor do the terms of that instrument permit it, to propose any amendment that will not, upon its adoption by the people, become an effective part of the constitution; nor is it authorized to propose an amendment which, if ratified, will take effect only at the will of other persons, or upon the approval by such persons of some specific act or condition. The amendment proposed is neither a declaration by the people of a principle or of a fact, nor is it a limitation or a rule prescribed for the guidance of either of the departments to which the sovereignty of the people has been intrusted. If adopted, it would have merely the effect to present the option to any one so disposed of making a donation of land and money for the purpose of having the seat of government at San Jose. Such a proposition is legislative in character, rather than constitutional, and, being conditional in its terms, would be ineffective in accomplishing a change of the seat of government from that already fixed by the constitution. Even if it should be conceded that its approval by the people would incorporate its terms into the constitution, it would take from that instrument the existing declaration fixing the place for the seat of government, and leave the state without any constitutional seat of government until the conditions upon which the declaration rests have been performed. As there is no limitation of the time within which these conditions are to be performed, and no obligation for their performance, it follows that the seat of government would have no established location. But the donation of the money and land does not bring the provision into operation, for, until after the site that may be offered has received the approval of the designated officers, there can be no act of the legislature tending to the removal. Instead, therefore, of there being any declaration by the people of a place for the seat of government, a commission is substituted whose judgment is to be taken instead of the judgment of the people, and to which is assigned a discretion which should be exercised by the people themselves. We do not mean to say that a legislative provision in a constitution that has been ratified by the people would be nugatory. If placed there, it must be observed by courts and citizens; but, for the purpose of determining the extent of the power conferred upon the legislature to propose amendments to the constitution, we must assume that it is only such amendments as may naturally and reasonably belong to the elements of a constitution. The amendment proposed substitutes for, or rather superadds to, the will of the people another will or judgment, without which its own will can have no effect, and which is therefore made the controlling judgment before the amendment can have any operative existence. As the proposed amendment is therefore only a proposition for the people to submit to some other individuals or body to determine whether there shall be a change of the seat of government, we hold that it is not such an amendment as the legislature has been authorized to submit to their votes. If the people shall at any time desire a removal of the seat of government from Sacramento, this result can be readily effected, either by a law passed in accordance with the existing provisions of the constitution, or by a proposal on the part of the legislature for such an amendment to the constitution as will afford them an opportunity to give immediate effect to their desire by a direct vote upon the question. The judgment and order of the court below are affirmed.

We concur: BEATTY, C. J.; FITZGERALD, J.; DE HAVEN, J.; GAROUTTE, J.

PATERSON, J. (concurring). At the argument it was contended by respondent that the judgment should be affirmed because the proposed amendment was never finally disposed of by the assembly, the whole matter having been laid on the table; that it was not passed in the senate by a two-thirds vote of all the members thereof, the record showing that Senator Hart's vote ought to have been recorded in the negative; that the house did not act upon the measure that was passed by the senate; that the proposed amendment is on its face void, because in contravention of public morals, being an offer on the part of the state to abandon its property at Sacramento, and change its seat of government to San Jose, for a bribe or consideration of $1,000,000 and 10 acres of land; and that, in any event, it is void for uncertainty, there being nothing to show who is to pay the money or donate the land, or how long the people will have to wait for a tender of the property,—how many propositions may be made and rejected before it can be known where the seat of government is to be permanently located; and that no one can know where the seat of government would be in the event of a failure of the governor, attorney general, and secretary of state, or a majority of them, to act upon any proposition for a site that might be offered. It must be admitted that there are serious questions involved in some of these contentions. We agree with the majority in holding that the proposed amendment is ineffective on account of the conditions contained therein, but there is another ground upon which we also desire to place our conclusion.

The language of section 1 of article 20 of the constitution is plain. No law changing the seat of government shall be valid or binding until said law has been ratified by a majority of the qualified electors of the state, voting therefor at a general election; and that law must first receive the sanction of two-thirds of the members of each house, and have been approved by the governor. No law has ever been passed by the legislature proposing to change the seat of government from Sacramento to San Jose, or providing under what regulations or provisions the question of a change of the seat of government should be voted upon. The proposed amendment was not put in the form of a bill. It was neither printed nor read on three several days, nor was the measure declared to constitute a case of urgency. It was not considered by the governor. Therefore it is not a law. It is true the legislature has by a general act provided how proposed amendments to the constitution may be submitted when no other mode is provided by law for their submission (St. 1883, p. 53; St. 1891, p. 165), and such provisions may be, and doubtless are, sufficient for the submission of proposed amendments generally; but the seat of government cannot be changed by any law, whether it be an ordinary act, or in the form of a proposed amendment to the constitution, unless it has been regularly introduced, taken the regular course, received the approval of two-thirds of the members of each house, and been approved by the governor. Appellant claims that section 1 of article 20 of the constitution can be amended by proceedings under section 1 of article 18 of the constitution, and for that purpose the acts of 1883 and 1891, supra, are sufficient legislation to submit the proposed constitutional amendment to the people; that sections 1 and 2 of article 18 are the only sections relating to amendments, and that they contain no limitation as to amendments; that section 1 of article 20 provides for the removal of the state capitol by a law under the constitution as it now exists, while section 1 of article 18 provides for amending any section of the constitution, including section 1 of article 20. It is claimed that the court below and counsel for respondent confounded the question of removal of the state capitol with the question of amending the constitution. A glance at the proposed amendment, however, is sufficient to show that its sole object is a removal of the seat of government from Sacramento to San Jose. With the word "Sacramento" substituted for the word "San Jose," the proposed section is identical with the provision of the constitution, down to the condition of removal. If the framers of the constitution intended to permit the seat of government to be removed by the proposal and submission of a constitutional amendment under section 1 of article 18, it is difficult to see why they inserted the provision in section 1 of article 20, requiring the proposal to change the seat of government to be submitted to the people at a general election, under such regulations as two-thirds of all the members of each house should provide, by an act regularly introduced, passed, and approved, as other acts of the legislature are introduced, passed, and approved by the governor. If section 1 of article 20 can be amended in the manner proposed, then the seat of government may be removed by a simple resolution, indorsed by two-thirds of the members elected to each house, and the regulations under which the question of removal is to be voted upon may be adopted by a bare majority of each house, and submitted to the people at a special election, held at any time. But such was clearly the thing which the framers of the constitution did not intend to allow to take place, when it provided that the question must be voted upon at a general election, and that no law changing the seat of government should be valid until it had received the sanction of two-thirds of the members of each house of the legislature proposing the amendment, and the regulations upon which the question should be submitted were provided by the same number of members, and had been approved by the executive. It is intended that a bare majority of the members of the legislature should not have the power to call for an election upon so important a question. The time for voting upon the question was fixed at a general election, for the purpose of giving the people ample opportunity to fully deliberate upon the question of public policy and public economy necessarily involved in the issue, and when the greatest number of electors would probably assemble at the polls. That it was the purpose of the framers of the constitution to make the subject of the removal of the seat of government an exception to the general rule, and to place a check upon hasty action thereon by requiring the greatest deliberation on the part of those who proposed the amendment, as well as those who should vote upon it, is manifest, not only in the language of the section itself, but in the history of the seat of government in this state, and the debates upon the subject in the constitutional convention. The constitution of 1849 provided that the Pueblo de San Jose should be "the permanent seat of government until removed by law; provided, however, that two-thirds of all the members elected to each house of the legislature shall concur in the passage of such law." Soon after the adoption of that constitution (November 13, 1849) a proposition was made to the legislature offering a large donation to the state if the seat of government should be located permanently at Vallejo, and an act was passed "to take the sense of the people of California upon the subject to the permanent location of the seat of government." St. 1849–50, p. 412. On February 4, 1851, an act was passed providing for "the permanent location of the seat of government" at Vallejo, provided M. G. Vallejo should submit a satisfactory bond for the performance of his proposition, and furnish a state-house for three years. St. 1851, p. 430. On February 4, 1853, a resolution was passed by the legislature calling upon Vallejo for payment of his proposed donation of $370,000, and to state his intentions and wishes respecting the location of the seat of government. St. 1852–53, p. 309. Vallejo, having asked to be released from his obligation on account of his inability to comply with the condition, an act was passed providing that the seat of government on and after February 5, 1853, should be at Benicia, provided Vallejo should release the state from all claims for damages (St. 1853, p. 24); and on May 18, 1853, such release having been given, it was provided by "An act for the permanent location of the seat of government" that the "city of Benicia, situated on the straits of Carquines, shall be and remain the permanent seat of government, in accordance with the constitution." St. 1853, p. 217. On February 25, 1854, the legislature passed an act repealing the former act, and providing that the permanent seat of government should be and remain at the city of Sacramento. Thus the matter rested until the subject again came up in the constitutional convention of 1879. Meantime, however, the state had spent $2,500,000 in state capitol buildings and grounds at Sacramento. In the convention Mr. Edgerton introduced a proposition providing that the seat of government should remain at Sacramento until changed by law, but that no law proposing a change should be effectual until submitted to the electors of the state at a general election, and approved by a majority of two-thirds of all the votes cast. But the section (section 1, art. 20), as proposed by the committee and finally passed, reads as above quoted. During the argument one member of the convention moved to strike out all of the section after the word "remain;" also to strike out the words "by a two-thirds vote of each house." To show the temper of the convention in regard to the matter, we quote briefly from some of the speeches made during the debate on these proposed amendments: "Mr. Wicks: It should not be left to the caprice of demagogues and politicians. We were cursed by such fickleness in the earlier history of our state. The state, too, has spent a great deal of money here in Sacramento, and has acquired a valuable property. Mr. Barbour: Suppose Sacramento washes away. Mr. Wicks: There is no danger of Sacramento washing away. This building never will be washed away. Mr. Ayers: I do not see any necessity for the amendment. I think that the section as it is now is conservative enough. It requires a two-thirds vote of the legislature to submit the question. I think that is strong enough to prevent anything like rash action with reference to the removal of the capitol. Mr. Brown: Now, I do not see there is any antagonistic feeling against Sacramento as to state capitol, but to attempt to bind the future entirely to this place I think would be wrong, and when the matter is provided for here that, by a certain action of the legislature, the matter shall be submitted to a vote of the people, it seems to me that that should be sufficient. Mr. Schell: I believe this section is right. I believe that, whenever we seek to tear up the foundations of the state capitol, it should be at the instance of two-thirds of the legislature. At least two-thirds of the legislature ought to vote in favor of submitting it to the people first, and then the people may by a majority vote remove it. It is not an ordinary question that ought to be submitted to merely a majority of the legislature. Mr. White: I desire to say that I am going to vote for the amendment of the gentleman from Santa Clara, and that I have no feeling of malice; and if there is any feeling, except by the gentleman himself, I do not know it. We desire merely to give the power to the people to move the capitol at any time they wish. We do not intend to tie down the legislature to a two-thirds vote if we can help it. Mr. Tinnin: The capitol has been located here at immense expense. It is true, I think, that it was a great mistake in placing it here, but it is here; and it has cost the people of the state a great deal of money, and it should not be removed unless some great calamity or misfortune befalls this city which necessitates that removal. Mr. Tully: There has been a good deal said here in reference to lobbying, and I don't know any section that has been adopted or anything that this convention could do to encourage lobbying more than to adopt this amendment. There would be a fight every time the legislature met for a majority to move this capitol, perhaps down to Los Angeles or some other prominent place." 3 Const. Conv. pp. 1388, 1389.

It is a rule of construction applicable to constitutions as well as to statutes that general words are qualified by particular clauses, and that effect must be given to all the provisions of the constitution, if possible, that no word or clause may become redundant; and, as said before, if it had been the intention to permit the removal by resort to the remedy provided in section 1 of article 18, there would have been no necessity for the other and more difficult remedy provided by section 1 of article 20. The only alteration attempted by the proposed amendment is of that portion of the section which fixes the seat of government. No principle of the organic law was in any manner affected, and it would be a clear violation, not only of the spirit, but the letter, of the provision that the seat of government shall not be removed except in a particular way, to hold that the purpose may be accomplished in another and easier way. That which cannot be done by direction cannot be done by indirection. Two rules of procedure have been prescribed by the constitution,—one for amendments of the organic law, and the other for a change of the seat of government. The contention of respondent, if sustained, would result in the nullification of one provision of the constitution by another. While one section of the constitution would provide for removal only in a particular way, another section of the same instrument, relating to general subjects, would authorize the removal in an entirely different manner, and the last clause of the section would accomplish no purpose whatever. It is conceded, of course, that the people may adopt any amendment of the constitution which is proposed in the manner prescribed by the instrument itself, but neither the legislature nor the people can disregard the provisions which limit and prescribe their power. It would be competent, of course, for the legislature to propose, and the people to approve, an amendment of section 1 of article 20 to provide a different method from that which now exists of changing the seat of government. That power might be delegated to the legislature alone by a majority vote, but, until some other method has been adopted by amendment to the constitution, the seat of government must remain at Sacramento until it has been changed by a law passed, approved, and ratified in the manner now prescribed by the constitution. If the members of the convention had been told at the conclusion of their debate that, notwithstanding all the care they had taken to secure the deliberate judgment of two-thirds of both houses, and the approval of the governor, or his reasons for disapproval, before the question of removal could be again submitted for decision, even at a general election, the time would come when the legislature would claim the right to precipitate the question at any time it saw fit, by resolution introduced and passed within an hour, and under resolutions prescribed by a general act, and passed by a bare majority, can any one doubt, in view of the importance they attached to the matter, that they would have declared in express and unmistakable words that the rule prescribed by section 1 of article 18 should not apply to the subject of removal of the seat of government? What could the members of the convention have expected to accomplish by the precautions provided for in section 1 of article 20? They certainly did not expect those desiring to procure an amendment effecting a change of the seat of government to follow the difficult procedure therein prescribed, when there was an easier way by following section 1 of article 18.

MODOC LAND & LIVE-STOCK CO. et al. v. BOOTH et al. (No. 18,127.)

IRRIGATION — DIVERSION OF WATER BY NONRIPARIAN OWNER—INJUNCTION.

A riparian owner is not entitled to an injunction to restrain the diversion of water above him by a nonriparian owner, where the amount diverted would not be used by the former, nor cause any loss or injury to him or his land, present or prospective, and would greatly benefit the party diverting it. McFarland, J., dissenting.

Commissioners' decision. In bank. Appeal from superior court, Modoc county; G. G. Clough, Judge.

Action by Modoc Land & Live-Stock Company and others against Stephen Booth and others to enjoin the diversion of the waters of a stream by defendants. The action was dismissed as to several defendants, and others filed a disclaimer. From a judgment that plaintiffs take nothing as against defendant H. G. Payne, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

D. W. Jenks, for appellants. J. D. Goodwin and J. H. Stewart, for respondents.

BELCHER, C. The plaintiffs brought this action to obtain a perpetual injunction, restraining the defendants—14 in number—from diverting any of the waters of the south fork of Pit river, or its tributaries. The case was submitted for decision in the court below upon an agreed statement of the facts, which are, in substance, as follows: The plaintiffs own, in severalty, tracts of land in Modoc county aggregating 14,382 acres. The tracts are contiguous, and extend along and on both sides of the south fork of Pit river a distance of about 12 miles, with a width of from 1 to 3 miles. About 10,000 acres of the land are of the class known as "swamp and overflowed land," and the title thereto was acquired under the state laws providing for the sale of such lands. The balance is high land, and the title to about one-half of it was acquired from the United States under the desert land act, and to the other half under the homestead and pre-emption laws. The south fork of Pit river heads in the mountains, about 20 miles east of the plaintiffs' lands, and is fed by several tributary creeks, which unite with it before it reaches their lands. The channel of the river across the plaintiffs' lands has an average width of 30 feet, a depth of 5 feet, and a grade of 3½ feet to the mile; but from where it leaves their lands, for a distance of about 4 miles, its grade is not more than 3 feet to the mile. Where the stream enters the plaintiffs' lands, it carries, in ordinary seasons, on the 1st of July, not less than 2,000 inches of water measured under a 4-inch pressure; and further down on their lands another tributary creek joins it which carries in ordinary seasons, on the 1st of July, 300 inches of water, measured as aforesaid. When the plaintiffs and their grantors located their swamp and overflowed lands, the waters of the river periodically overflowed its banks during the spring and early summer, up to the middle of June of each year, and covered said swamp-land tracts from one inch to two feet in depth; and portions of the same then were, and from time immemorial had been, a tule swamp, and wholly unfit for cultivation, or the growth of valuable grasses. To reclaim the said swamp lands, and make them productive grass lands, plaintiffs and their grantors had spent large sums of money in controlling the waters of the stream upon them, and in draining them; and in order to utilize the lands, and make them produce grasses, or any crop of value, and to harvest the same, it is necessary for the plaintiffs to control the flow of said waters so as to prevent them from overflowing said lands during the haying season, which usually occupies the months of July and August of each year, and to that end to maintain extensive diverting and draining works on and around said swamp lands, to keep the water from so naturally overflowing the same. The lands described in the complaint, which were acquired from the government as "desert lands," were reclaimed from their desert character by the plaintiffs, or their grantors, by diverting upon the same, from points above said lands, portions of the waters of said river; and the amounts at different times so diverted for such purposes aggregate 1,400 inches, measured under a 4-inch pressure. By the means used, plaintiffs have reclaimed most of their swamp lands, and those lands now require more irrigation than other lands in that vicinity. In the year 1889 at least one-fourth of the lands of the corporation plaintiff were too dry to produce a crop. Plaintiffs own about 7,000 head of cattle and other live stock, and they use their lands for raising hay to feed their animals during the winter season, and for pasturage during the late summer, fall, and winter months; and their animals are dependent upon the grass and herbage which grow upon said lands for food and maintenance, and upon the said stream for water to drink, while depasturing upon said lands. In June, 1886, the defendants H. G. Payne and Carlos Payne owned certain tracts of land which were not watered by any natural stream, and were not riparian to Pit river. In order to procure water for the irrigation of their land, and for their stock and domestic purposes thereon, they, in the month named, entered upon Mill creek, one of the tributaries of the said river, and about 15½ miles above the uppermost part of the plaintiffs' land, and posted a notice, in the form and manner required by law, claiming 200 inches of the waters of the creek, to be conveyed thence by ditch to their said lands for irrigation, and other uses thereon. The notice was duly recorded, and thereafter they constructed the ditch, and in 1887 diverted the waters of the creek through the same, to the extent claimed, and used them during June, July, August, and September; and the use of 200 inches of water on their lands was necessary. In making the diversion, it was understood and agreed between them that H. G. Payne should own and use three-fourths of the said water, and Carlos Payne one-fourth. In 1887 one of the plaintiffs, Flournoy, on behalf of his brother, who is not made a party to the action, posted a notice on Mill creek, a few rods below the head of the Payne ditch, claiming, in due form, 600 inches of the waters of the creek, to be conveyed away from the creek to lands belonging to his brother, and which were not riparian; and thereafter he, as the agent of his brother, constructed a ditch from the point on the creek where this notice was posted, and since then, as such agent, has diverted and used, at times, during 1888, 1889, and 1890, a large amount of the waters of said stream. At divers times within five years before the commencement of this action, the defendants, other than the Paynes, entered upon the natural channels of said river and its tributaries, and, at sundry points above plaintiffs' lands, placed dams therein, and dug and constructed ditches connected with said dams, and leading out from said natural channels, and away from the same, and, by means of said dams and ditches, have diverted from the streams large quantities of water, which, but for such diversions, would have flowed to, upon, and across plaintiffs' lands. After this action was commenced, the defendant Carlos Payne, by an instrument in writing, remised, released, and quitclaimed to the plaintiffs all his right, title, interest, and claim in and to the flow and use of, and right to divert, any portion of the waters of said river, particularly Mill creek, saving and excepting Fitzhugh creek; and thereupon plaintiffs dismissed the action as to him. The defendants McGahey and Fitzgerald, also by an instrument in writing, remised, released, and quitclaimed to the plaintiffs all their right to the use of any water that might be diverted from East creek at the point described in the complaint as their point of diversion, save and except 25 inches; and thereupon plaintiffs dismissed the action as to them. The defendant Booth, also by an instrument in writing, remised, released, and quitclaimed to the plaintiffs all his right to use water from the said river, save and except 20 inches measured under a 4-inch pressure; and thereupon plaintiffs dismissed the action as to him. Plaintiffs stipulated with the defendants Duke, Williams, Gaustad, and Harvey that judgment should be entered to the effect that they should not divert any water from the south fork of Pit river at any time when the stream is at its usual and ordinary flow within its banks, provided such water is demanded by plaintiffs for the necessary use of any of them. Plaintiffs also stipulated with defendant Todd that the decree should allow him the use at all times of 25 inches of water, measured under a 4-inch pressure, upon his land, and also the right to make a reasonable use upon his land of all overflow, flood, and surplus waters flowing in said river. The defendants Cantrall disclaimed any interest in the waters of the said river or its tributaries, save and except the surplus above the natural and ordinary flow of the stream, and certain storage water mentioned in their disclaimer. Upon these facts the court gave judgment that the plaintiffs take nothing as against the defendant H. G. Payne, and from that judgment they have appealed upon the judgment roll. The only point made for a reversal is that the court erred in not granting an injunction against the respondent, because appellants were riparian owners, and, as such, "entitled to have the stream flow in its natural channel, undiminished and unobstructed."

In a state like this, where irrigation is greatly needed, and where large areas of land are comparatively worthless unless artificially irrigated, it is difficult to lay down a rule as to riparian rights which will be applicable to, and cover, all cases. It seems clear, however, that in no case should a riparian owner be permitted to demand, as of right, the intervention of a court of equity to restrain all persons who are not riparian owners from diverting any water from the stream at points above him, simply because he wishes to see the stream flow by or through his land undiminished and unobstructed. In other words, a riparian owner ought not to be permitted to invoke the power of a court of equity to restrain the diversion of water above him by a nonriparian owner, when the amount diverted would not be used by him, and would cause no loss or injury to him or his land, present or prospective, but would greatly benefit the party diverting it. If this be not so, it would follow, for example, that an owner of land bordering on the Sacramento river, in Yolo county, could demand an injunction restraining the diversion of any water from that river for use in irrigating nonriparian lands in Glenn or Colusa county; and yet no one, probably, would expect such an injunction, if asked for, to be granted, or, if granted, to be sustained. In Edgar v. Stevenson, 70 Cal. 286, 11 Pac. 704, it was held that a riparian proprietor, who has appropriated and uses all the water of a stream crossing his land, as it ordinarily flows, cannot restrain the diversion, during times of extraordinary high water, of the surplus not used or appropriated by him; and this case was referred to approvingly in Heilbron v. Water Co., 80 Cal. 189, 22 Pac. 62. In Black's Pomeroy on Water Rights (section 75) it is said: "Unless the flow of a stream to the land of a riparian proprietor has been appreciably or perceptibly diminished, he is not entitled to an injunction against another for wrongfully diverting water from the stream." And in Lux v. Haggin, 69 Cal. 284, 10 Pac. 674, it is said: "Under our Codes, the riparian proprietor is not required to establish his right at law by recovering a judgment in damages before applying for an injunction. The decisions (in cases of alleged nuisances) based on the failure of the complainant to have had his right established at law have no appositeness here. Here the plaintiff must, indeed, make out his right in equity, and show that money damages will not give him adequate compensation. If he fail to do this, relief in equity will be denied." Under the law, as thus declared, were the appellants entitled to an injunction against the respondents? We do not think they were. During the months of June, July, August, and September, when respondent used the small quantity of water appropriated by him, the full flow would have worked an injury, rather than a benefit, to appellants, and they sought to avoid the injury by maintaining extensive diverting and draining works on and around their swamp lands, so as to keep them from being overflowed, and by turning the water off upon their high lands, and permitting others to turn it off upon their lands. It is true that it is stated that in the year 1889 at least one-fourth of the lands of the corporation plaintiff were too dry to produce a crop, but what particular lands were referred to, and why they were too dry, does not appear. They may have been, so far as shown by the record, chiefly its high lands, and the necessary steps to irrigate them during that year may not have been taken. Looking at the whole record, we conclude, therefore, that there was no error in the action of the court, and that the judgment appealed from should be affirmed.

GROSSE-BECKER v. BECKER et al. (No. 15,347.)

REVIEW ON APPEAL — CONFLICTING EVIDENCE — ESTOPPEL—WHEN ARISES.

1. A verdict will not be disturbed where the evidence is conflicting.

2. In an action for services under a contract of employment against a partnership composed of one B. (with whom plaintiff lived under the assumed relation of wife) and others, it was shown that, at the inception of the partnership, B. represented that plaintiff was his wife. The other partners testified that he agreed to furnish her services gratuitously, but B. denied it. Held, that plaintiff was not estopped, as against B.'s partners, from showing that she was not B.'s wife; it not appearing that she had any knowledge of B.'s representations in that regard, or that B.'s partners relied on such representations, or that such representations operated to their damage.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; Charles W. Slack, Judge.

Action by Franziska Grosse-Becker against Arthur Becker and others. There was judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Lindley & Eickhoff, for appellants. Edmond Tausky, for respondent.

GAROUTTE, J. This action was instituted by plaintiff against defendants, as partners, for services rendered by her as an actress. She recovered judgment, and this appeal is prosecuted from the judgment and order denying a motion for a new trial.

It is insisted by defendants that plaintiff's services were to be furnished without a definite salary, and that her compensation was to consist of a certain part of the profits of the venture, and, there being no profits, her services were necessarily gratuitous. Plaintiff relies upon an express contract of employment at the fixed sum of $150 per month. Plaintiff and defendant Becker testified positively that such was the contract, and the verdict of the jury necessarily indicates that this evidence was given credit by them. Defendant Becker went to Europe in behalf of, and at the request of, the partnership, for the purpose of securing theatrical talent in furtherance of the partnership venture. Without considering Becker's powers as a full partner in the firm, it appears that under his authorization he made a contract of employment with the plaintiff at a monthly salary; and the extent of his powers as the agent of the partnership in making such a contract was a matter of fact to be passed upon by the jury in arriving at the verdict. The evidence was contradictory in this regard, and, under proper instructions of the court as to the law bearing upon the question, the matter was submitted to the jury, and their judgment will not be disturbed. At the inception of the partnership between these parties, it is claimed by defendants Hirsch and Kahn that defendant Becker represented that the plaintiff was his wife, and that he would furnish her services gratuitously for the benefit of the partnership. Becker concedes the representations as to the plaintiff being his wife, but denies that her services were to be a gratuity. During the progress of the trial it was developed that plaintiff was not the wife of Becker, but had been living with him under such assumed relations for several years. In view of these peculiar conditions, the defendants asked certain instructions to be given to the jury, but the request was denied by the court. These instructions are based upon the theory that the plaintiff was estopped from showing that she was not the wife of defendant Becker. It does not appear that plaintiff ever had any knowledge of the representations made by Becker to his codefendants, at the time the contract was entered into, as to their status as husband and wife, and, consequently, it cannot be said that she is bound by such representations. Again, it does not appear that Hirsch and Kahn, to any extent or in any degree, relied upon such representations as a moving cause for the formation of the partnership. As far as is developed by the record, the mere fact of the existence or nonexistence of the marriage relation between these parties was wholly immaterial in the minds of Hirsch and Kahn. Neither does it appear that these false representations of Becker as to his marriage, conceding Hirsch and Kahn to have relied upon them, operated in any way to their injury and damage. Plaintiff was probably as good an actress unmarried as married, and the unsuccessful ending of the theatrical venture is not claimed to have resulted, to any extent, by reason of the false relations under which these two parties were living. Indeed, they were thought by these two defendants, and by the world at large, to be husband and wife, up to the very hour of the trial. The circumstances here suggested are necessarily fatal to the successful plea of an estoppel as against the plaintiff, and for these reasons we think the instructions were properly refused. But even conceding that the representations of Becker, taken in connection with the subsequent acts of plaintiff, were such as to forbid her denying that she was his wife, still it does not follow that she has no standing before the court. And, bearing generally upon the rights of the wife acting in her own behalf, see Schwarze v. Mahoney, 97 Cal. 131, 31 Pac. 908, and Wren v. Wren (Cal.) 34 Pac. 775. For the foregoing reasons, it is ordered that the judgment and order be affirmed.

THOMPSON v. GORNER. (No. 15,262.)

Interest—Rate after Maturity—Acceptance.

When interest on a note is payable at a certain rate monthly in advance, "and, if said principal or interest is not paid as it becomes due, it shall thereafter bear interest at" a higher rate, acceptance of interest from time to time, for two years after maturity, at the former rate, waives the latter, though this be in no wise a penalty.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Alameda county; W. E. Greene, Judge.

Action by Mary Thompson against Christ Gorner on a promissory note. Judgment for plaintiff, with costs for defendant. Plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Edgar B. Haymond, for appellant. John Yule and Edward H. Stearns, for respondent.

SEARLS, C. This is an appeal by plaintiff from a judgment in her favor for $1,283.85, without costs, and for costs in favor of defendant. The whole contention arises upon the rate of interest due upon a promissory note of which the following is a copy: "$1,400. Oakland, Cal., March 20, 1888. On or before two years after date, for value received, I promise to pay Clarence J. Wetmore, or order, the sum of one thousand four hundred dollars in gold coin of the United States of America of the present standard, with interest thereon, in like gold coin, from the date hereof until paid, at the rate of eight per cent. per annum, payable monthly in advance, and, if said principal or interest is not paid as it becomes due, it shall thereafter bear interest at the rate of 1 per cent. per month; and in case said monthly interest, or any part thereof, is not paid within one month after the same becomes due and payable, then the whole of said principal sum and interest due thereon shall forthwith become due and payable at the option of the holder hereof. This note is secured by a mortgage bearing even date herewith. Christ Gorner." Plaintiff succeeded to the note, and a mortgage given to secure the payment thereof, by assignment before maturity. The interest on the note was paid when due, and was paid to plaintiff at the rate of 8 per cent. per annum, and accepted by her in full, until the 20th day of February, 1892, when, upon the tender to her of one month's interest at said rate, she refused to receive the same in full, and claimed interest at 1 per cent. per month, and demanded an additional 4 per cent. per month on the principal from the maturity of the note, compounded, so as to make up, with that paid, 1 per cent. per month. On the 18th day of March, 1892, and before the commencement of this action, defendant tendered to plaintiff $1,283.85, which is conceded to be all that was due upon the note unless plaintiff was entitled to interest at 1 per cent. per month, and upon the commencement of the suit defendant paid said sum into court for plaintiff. The facts are agreed upon.

The court below found, as conclusions of law: (1) That the promissory note provides for the payment of interest at 8 per cent. per annum, and no more, and that the clause therein that, "if said principal or interest is not paid as it becomes due, it shall thereafter bear interest at the rate of one per cent. per month," is in the nature of a penalty, and may be waived, and that, defendant having failed to pay the principal sum when it became due, he is liable in damages at the rate of 8 per cent. per annum upon the principal sum remaining unpaid, and no more; (2) that plaintiff, having accepted the interest at 8 per cent. after the note fell due, in full payment, thereby waived her right to any or greater sum,—and rendered judgment accordingly.

I cannot agree with the conclusion of the court below that the clause in the promissory note that, "if said principal or interest is not paid as it becomes due, it shall thereafter bear interest at the rate of one per cent. per month," is to be treated as a penalty, but am inclined to regard it as a contract to pay 1 per cent. per month upon a contingency which is shown to have occurred. It related, or might relate, to the interest to become due and payable under the contract; that is to say, before the maturity of the note as well as afterwards. It may be said that all contracts for the payment of interest at a given rate are, in contemplation of law, confined to the life of the contract, and that after its violation a recovery is had not of interest as such, but damages for the violation of the contract, which are measured by the agreement of the parties as contained in their contract, or, in the absence of such agreement, by the law. Where there is no statute to prevent, parties may contract for such rate of interest as they choose, not only before the maturity of the contract, but after its breach, and until paid. By our Civil Code (section 1918), "parties may agree in writing for the payment of any rate of interest, and it shall be allowed, according to the terms of the agreement, until the entry of judgment." Again: "Interest is the compensation allowed by law, or fixed by the parties for the use, or forbearance, or detention of money." Civ. Code, § 1915. Under this section, parties in this state can as well agree upon the compensation to be fixed for forbearance to enforce the payment of money due after a breach of contract as for its use before such breach, and, when agreed upon in writing, it is equally binding in the one case with the other. Hubbard v. Callahan, 42 Conn. 524; Wilkerson v. Daniels, 1 G. Greene, 179; Wernwag v. Mothershead, 3 Blackf. 401. In the case last cited, the makers of the note agreed, if not paid at maturity, "to pay five dollars interest per week until paid;" and the court held it drew interest at the agreed rate until paid. A vast number of cases might be cited, all to the effect that similar provisions in promissory notes are to be enforced as per contract, and not treated as penalties. It follows from this view that upon the maturity and nonpayment of the note the contingency occurred upon which she was entitled to interest thereon at 1 per cent. per month.

But upon the facts of the case, as they appear of record, it does not follow that she can recover such interest in this action. For two years next after the maturity of the note, plaintiff continued to receive the interest monthly in advance at the rate of 8 per cent. per annum, which was "accepted in full payment of interest due on said note from the date of such payment to the 20th day of each month next succeeding such payment." This was clearly a waiver of her right to the larger interest. "A waiver takes place where a man dispenses with the performance of something which he has a right to exact. A man may do that not only by saying that he dispenses with it,—that he excuses the performance,—or he may do it as effectually by conduct which naturally and justly leads the other party to believe that he dispenses with it. There can be no waiver unless so intended by one party, and so understood by the other, or one party has so acted as to mislead the other." 2 Herm. Estop. § 825. The same author, at section 1020 of volume 2, says: "No one who waives or dispenses with the performance of a contract can rely upon the failure to perform it, either as a defense or cause of action, for no one can complain of a default which he has caused or sanctioned." In Bradford v. Hoiles, 66 Ill. 517, a note was given for $1,000, payable 90 days after date, with the following clause: "And, if the sum is not paid when due, to pay thereon five per cent. per month as damages thereon from the time the same is due until paid." The maker paid interest on the note from July, 1869, to September 8, 1870, which, from the indorsements, was shown to be at 10 per cent. per annum, and to have been in full. The maker then died, and two years later, in an action on the note, the court held that the holder, when the first interest was due, might have demanded the stipulated damages at 5 per cent. per month, but that having then, and from time to time thereafter while the maker lived, received 10 per cent. per annum interest, this was inconsistent with a claim of 5 per cent. per month for damages, and was evidence of an agreement to accept 10 per cent. per annum instead of 5 per cent. per month, and was a waiver of the penalty. It is true that the court there regarded the 5 per cent. per month as a penalty. It is also true that courts more readily lean to a waiver, in cases of penalty, than in those of the ordinary provisions of contracts. Still in the present case I am of opinion the conceded facts are strong enough to raise the legal presumption, not only that plaintiff had waived the right to the higher interest, so far as she accepted the lower rate specified in the note, but that the waiver evinced by a uniform course of conduct for two years extended to and estopped her from the very right to demand the higher rate of 1 per cent. per month for the month commencing February 20, 1892. The interest was payable monthly in advance. When, on the 20th day of February, 1892, defendant tendered the interest ($8.70) which, by uniform usage, had come to be the conceded amount due, it operated as a payment as effectively as though received, subject to the duty devolving upon defendant of keeping the tender good. This he did by paying the amount into court for plaintiff. The judgment appealed from should be affirmed.

We concur: HAYNES, C.; BELCHER, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment appealed from is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. PATTERSON. (No. 21,056.)

Incest—Prosecution of One Party—Evidence—Instructions.

1. Though the consent of both parties to the sexual intercourse is necessary to constitute incest, one of them may be indicted alone, and convicted of the offense.

2. Where incest is charged, prior acts of sexual intercourse between the same parties may be proved.

3. On a trial for incest, an instruction that "there is much greater danger that injustice may be done to the defendant in cases of this kind than there is in prosecutions of any other character," states no proposition of law, and is properly refused.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Yolo county; W. H. Grant, Judge.

H. L. Patterson was convicted of incest, and appeals. Affirmed.

Byron Ball and R. L. Simpson, for appellant. Atty. Gen. Hart and C. M. Head, Dist. Atty., for the People.

BELCHER, C. The defendant was convicted of the crime of incest, and has appealed from the judgment and an order denying his motion for a new trial. The information charged that on the 7th day of March, 1893, at the county of Yolo, in this state, the defendant, H. L. Patterson, did willfully, unlawfully, and feloniously, "upon the person of one Annie L. Patterson, the daughter of said H. L. Patterson, commit fornication, and have sexual intercourse with and carnally know the said Annie L. Patterson." The defendant demurred to the information upon the ground that it did not conform to the requirements of sections 950–952 of the Penal Code, and that the facts stated did not constitute a public offense. The demurrer was overruled, and thereafter a plea of not guilty was duly entered.

1. The first point made for a reversal is that the crime of incest is a joint offense, which can be committed only with the concurrent assent of two persons, and of which both persons must be guilty, or neither is; and that the information was insufficient, and should have been set aside, because it "charges the defendant with an offense not known to the law, in this: that it charges him alone with the commission of an offense which one person cannot commit." Section 285 of the Penal Code defines the crime of incest, and declares it punishable as follows: "Persons being within the degree of consanguinity within which marriages are declared by law to be incestuous and void, who intermarry with each other, or who commit fornication or adultery with each other, are punishable by imprisonment in the state prison not exceeding ten years." And the same Code contains the following provisions as to indictments and informations: "Sec. 950. The indictment or information must contain: 1. * * * 2. A statement of the acts constituting the offense in ordinary and concise language, and in such a manner as to enable a person of common understanding to know what is intended." "Sec. 960. No indictment or information is insufficient, nor can the trial, judgment or other proceeding thereon be affected, by reason of any defect or imperfection in matter of form which does not tend to the prejudice of a substantial right of the defendant upon its merits." "Sec. 1404. Neither a departure from the form or mode prescribed by this Code in respect to any pleading or proceeding, nor an error or mistake therein, renders it invalid, unless it has actually prejudiced the defendant, or tended to his prejudice, in respect to a substantial right." Now, conceding that the consent of both parties to the sexual intercourse is necessary to constitute the crime of incest, still it does not follow that one of them alone may not be indicted or informed against, and tried and convicted for the offense. Nor does it follow that one cannot be guilty unless the other is. For instance, it might happen, when the intercourse was with the mutual consent of both parties, that one party had knowledge of the relationship and the other was entirely ignorant of it; and in such a case it is clear that the former would be guilty, and the latter not. In this state an indictment or information is sufficient if the language of the statute is substantially followed. Here, we think, the information sufficiently conforms to the general rule, and states the facts "in such a manner as to enable a person of common understanding to know what is intended."

2. The next point is that the court erreneously denied a challenge for actual bias which was interposed by the defendant to one of the persons called and examined as to his fitness to serve as a juror in the case. This point does not require special notice. It appears that the defendant peremptorily challenged the juror, and that, after exercising that right, he had eight challenges left. Besides, the court allowed two additional peremptory challenges, which had not been used when the jury was completed. Conceding, therefore, that the ruling complained of was erroneous, still it is apparent that the defendant was in no way prejudiced by it.

3. At the trial Annie L. Patterson was called and examined as a witness for the prosecution. It appeared from her testimony that she was 19 years old, was the daughter of the defendant, and was living with him in Yolo county until some time in March, 1893, when she left his house, and went to the house of a neighbor, where she resided up to the time of the trial. Her testimony on direct and cross-examination is quite lengthy, and it is unnecessary to rehearse the criminating facts stated by her in detail. It is enough to say of them that, if true, they very clearly show that the defendant was guilty of the crime charged. Among other things, however, she stated that her father had many times before, and during a period of several years, been doing the same "meanness" with her. The defendant objected to all the evidence as to acts other than that charged in the information, and his objection was overruled; and he also moved the court to strike out all such evidence, and his motion was denied. It is earnestly contended that these rulings were erroneous, and the rule is invoked that testimony is inadmissible which tends to prove a distinct and different offense from that for which the defendant is on trial. But while the general rule is as stated, there are well-recognized exceptions to it (People v. Cunningham, 66 Cal. 668, 4 Pac. 1144, and 6 Pac. 700, 846), and it seems to be well settled that cases where incest or adultery is charged are among the exceptions. In such cases it has been held that prior acts of sexual intercourse between the parties may be proved. People v. Jenness, 5 Mich. 305; State v. Markins, 95 Ind. 464; Lefforge v. State, 129 Ind. 551, 29 N. E. 34; State v. Bridgman, 49 Vt. 202; State v. Pippin, 88 N. C. 646. It must be held, therefore, here, that there was no error in the rulings complained of under this head.

4. It is further contended that the testimony of the prosecutrix, when looked at as a whole, was so contradictory and improbable as to be wholly unworthy of belief, and insufficient to justify a verdict of guilty; and that, if believed, it showed that defendant was guilty of rape, and not of incest, of which offense he could not be convicted under the charge of incest; and also, that if the testimony tended to show that defendant was guilty of incest, the prosecutrix was an accomplice, and her testimony was not sufficiently corroborated to justify a conviction. That the testimony of the prosecutrix tended to show guilt on the part of the defendant is beyond dispute, but whether it was true or false was a question for the jury. The jurors saw the witness and heard her tell her story, and were in a better position than we are to determine whether she was worthy of belief or not. We do not think the evidence shows that the offense committed was rape, and, if the defendant had been charged with and convicted of that offense, the verdict would have been clearly wrong. It is not necessary, therefore, to express any opinion as to whether one charged with incest can be convicted, when the evidence shows that the offense committed was really rape. Upon this question we know of no decisions in this state, but in other states the decisions are conflicting. See State v. Ellis, 74 Mo. 385; State v. Jarvis, 20 Or. 437, 26 Pac. 302; and, contra, 10 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 341, and cases cited. The testimony of the prosecutrix was, in our opinion, sufficiently corroborated to meet all the requirements of the statute. The boy, Henry Bell, was a nephew of defendant, and living with him. He testified that during the year before he saw the defendant, in the nighttime, get into bed with the prosecutrix a good many times. And the witness Moore testified to remarks made by defendant at the time and shortly after his arrest which seem unaccountable if no illicit relations had existed between him and his daughter.

5. It is urged that the court erred in amending certain instructions asked by defendant, and in refusing to give certain others asked by him. We see no error in the action of the court complained of. Instruction No. 6, as asked, was substantially in the language of section 1111 of the Penal Code, and the part added as an amendment was simply a statement as to the amount and kind of corroboration required. The language used in the amendment was approved in People v. Thompson, 50 Cal. 480. The part stricken from instruction No. 8 stated that "there is much greater danger that injustice may be done to the defendant in cases of this kind than there is in prosecutions of any other character." This is not a proposition of law. Instruction No. 10 was amended by simply writing the word "reasonable" before the word "doubt," making it read, "If you have any reasonable doubt," etc. Instruction No. 12 was ambiguous and misleading, and was properly refused. There is but one presumption until the verdict is rendered, and that is one of innocence. To say, therefore, that a presumption of guilt is met by a stronger presumption of innocence, and must give way to it, is confusing, and not sound law. There are some other minor points made, but they do not require especial notice. We find no prejudicial error in the record, and advise that the judgment and order appealed from be affirmed.

We concur: SEARLS, C.; HAYNES, C.

PEOPLE v. TOMLINSON. (No. 21,039.)

LARCENY—WHAT CONSTITUTES—EVIDENCE—INSTRUCTIONS.

1. Where one induces another, by promise of employment, to deposit with him a sum of money as security for funds to be handled by the employe, intending at the time to convert the money to his own use, which he subsequently does, he is guilty of larceny.

2. The fact that, unsolicited, he gave such prospective employe his promissory note for the amount of the deposit, does not affect the character of the crime.

3. Defendant advertised for help, and the prosecuting witness responded to the advertisement, and deposited, with defendant, money, as security, which defendant converted to his own use. Soon after his employment, on January 12th, defendant laid him off, alleging lack of business. Held, that a letter written by defendant January 20th, to one who had responded to the same advertisement, stating that he wanted a clerk, and reciting the same conditions as those on which the prosecuting witness was employed, was admissible on defendant's trial for larceny.

4. An instruction that when, by fraud or artifice, the possession of property is obtained, with "the intention of stealing it," the crime is larceny, is not erroneous because the word "feloniously" was not used before the word "stealing."

5. It is within the discretion of the court to allow the jurors to remain in the court room during the argument of a motion for a nonsuit.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; J. M. Seawell, Judge.

J. H. Tomlinson was convicted of larceny, and appeals. Affirmed.

A. E. Mack and A. D. Lemon, for appellant. Atty. Gen. Hart and Wm. S. Barnes, Dist. Atty., for the People.

PATERSON, J. The defendant was convicted of the crime of grand larceny, and sentenced to serve a term of four years in the state prison at San Quentin. His counsel claim on this appeal that, if any offense is shown by the evidence, it is embezzlement, and not larceny. The information is in the language of the statute defining "larceny," charging that he did "feloniously steal, take, and carry away $150, of the lawful money of the United States."

The testimony of the prosecuting witnesses, Claxton and wife, shows that on December 21, 1892, they found an advertisement in a San Francisco newspaper, which read as follows: "Steady men wanted to collect, and wait on customers, in pleasant, cash business. Short hours and light work. No experience necessary. Must have $150 cash, and be satisfied with $70 per month. Apply No. 7 Grant Ave., Room 2." Following the direction of the advertisement, Claxton went to No. 7 Grant avenue, and there met a man who took him to the defendant's office, No. 777 Market street. The defendant stated to him that he wanted a man to look after the office, and wait on customers, and that he would have steady work. The advertisement was referred to in the conversation. The defendant told him he could have the position at $70 per month, but he would be required to give him $150 as security, as there was a great deal of money to be handled in the business. Thereupon Claxton gave the defendant the $150, who wrote and delivered to the former a receipt in the following words: "Received from William Claxton $150, as security deposit on situation. Salary $70 per month. J. H. Tomlinson." At the same time the defendant, without request therefor, gave Claxton a promissory note for the sum of $150, payable 60 days after date. The reason given by the defendant for requiring $150 security was that a previous employe, who had given no security, had embezzled and run away with $700, which he had collected. The defendant stated to the prosecuting witness that he was obliged to have a man, as he had more business than he could attend to himself, and, for anybody who could put up the security, it would be a good job; that it would be outside work for a week or so, until he got the run of the business, and then it would be inside work. Claxton testified that he did not know the party who went with him to the defendant's office from No. 7 Grant avenue, but had seen him repeatedly, since, in Tomlinson's office, "sitting at the desk, or sitting with Tomlinson, or around there. On or about January 12th, defendant informed Claxton that business was very dull, and that he would have to "lay him off" until the 1st of the month. All the defendant paid Claxton on account of wages was $11, and, of the $150, all that has been returned to him is the sum of $20, paid after his discharge. Mrs. Claxton testified that the defendant said, if her husband did not like the position, or should be discharged, the $150 would be returned to him. There are other circumstances, which need not be related, tending to show that the defendant was not acting in good faith. One act, in particular, which goes to show that he did not discharge Claxton because he had no work for him, was a communication written by him to one Switzer, replying to a letter dated January 20, 1892, inquiring about a position mentioned in an advertisement inserted in one of the San Francisco newspapers by the defendant, saying that he wanted a clerk at $70 a month, with $150 cash deposit, the applicant to apply at 777 Market street. Enough of the evidence has been stated, we think, to show that the prosecutor was induced to place his money in the hands of the defendant upon the assurance that he would have permanent employment, and that the defendant and his confederate conspired, feloniously, to procure the money of Claxton, and convert it to their own use. The only question is whether, upon the facts proved, a case of larceny has been established.

It is said that the verdict cannot stand because Claxton voluntarily parted with his money, and took a promissory note in lieu thereof, but the jury were justified in believing that defendant's voluntary presentation of the note was a mere trick to get possession of the money. The circumstances all show that Claxton did not intend to part with the ownership of the money. It was put in the hands of the defendant as security for the faithful performance of the services to be rendered. When Claxton was discharged, it was the duty of the defendant to return the money to him. The giving of a worthless note was doubtless a mere cover —a device or contrivance—to hide the real design. As Claxton did not intend to part with the money absolutely, but turned it over to the defendant for temporary use and a specific object, the taking of the money, with the intent to steal it at the time it was taken, was larceny. On the facts there must often be a very narrow margin between cases of larceny, obtaining money by false pretenses, and embezzlement, because the character of the crime depends upon the secret intention of the parties, which is often difficult to ascertain; but, so far as the law is concerned, the principles upon which the question of guilt or innocence is to be determined are plain, and too well settled to justify a review of the authorities. Where one honestly receives the possession of goods upon a trust, and, after receiving them, fraudulently converts them to his own use, it is a case of embezzlement. If the possession has been obtained by fraud, trick, or device, and the owner of it intends to part with his title when he gives up possession, the offense, if any, is obtaining money by false pretenses. But where the possession has been obtained through a trick or device, with the intent, at the time the party receives it, to convert the same to his own use, and the owner of the property parts merely with the possession, and not with the title, the offense is larceny. It was a question for the jury to decide, in this case, whether the defendant feloniously took the money, and whether Claxton intended to part with the ownership of the same. People v. Raschke, 73 Cal. 378, 15 Pac. 13; People v. Johnson, 91 Cal. 265, 27 Pac. 663; People v. Laurence, 137 N. Y. 517, 33 N. E. 547; Com. v. Lannan, 153 Mass. 287, 26 N. E. 858.

The court did not err in admitting in evidence the advertisement referred to. The wages paid, and the security required, by the defendant, were the same as those mentioned in the card; and the party who was named in the advertisement as the one to apply to took the applicant to the defendant, and appears to have been thereafter closely associated with him. Under these circumstances the jurors were justified in believing that the act of one was the act of both.

It is claimed that the verdict ought to have been set aside because of a variance between the allegations of the information and the proof as to the ownership of the property taken. It was alleged in the information that the property belonged to William Claxton. The evidence shows that the money came to Mrs. Claxton as her separate estate, but that she gave it to her husband to enable him to provide the security required by the defendant. Irrespective of this, however, the contention cannot be sustained. People v. Nelson, 6 Pac. Coast Law J. 453; State v. Pettis, 63 Me. 124; Dignowitty v. State, 17 Tex. 521.

The court did not err in permitting the prosecution to introduce the letter written to Switzer. It tended, directly, to impeach defendant's claim of good faith in discharging the prosecuting witness, and the fact that it may have tended to show the commission of another offense by the defendant is immaterial. People v. Lane (No. 21,050; filed March 3, 1894) 36 Pac. 16.

Objection is made to that portion of the charge to the jury wherein the court said: "Now, the law is that when, by means of fraud or artifice, or any other kind of contrivance, the possession of property is fraudulently obtained * * * from another, and the party obtaining this possession acquires it by means of this fraud and artifice, with the intention of stealing it when he gets possession of it, then the crime is larceny, provided the owner of the property, who has thus deposited and loses its possession, still remains the owner of the property, and has not parted with his title." It is said the court erred in not using the word "felonious" before the word "stealing." The word "steal," in common as well as in legal parlance, imports a larceny, and, when used in connection with property which is the subject of larceny, means the felonious taking. State v. Chambers, 2 G. Greene, 311; People v. Robertson, 3 Wheeler, Cr. Cas. 181. People v. Raschke, supra, cited by the appellant, does not support his contention. The instruction therein criticised, and held erroneous, did not make use of the word "steal," but, in lieu thereof, the words "intended to convert them to his own use, and did so convert them." Mr. Justice McFarland particularly pointed out that "nowhere in the instructions on that point were the jury told that the appellant, at the time possession of the goods was obtained, must have had a 'felonious intent,' nor was any language used which was the equivalent of 'felonious intent,' or which conveyed the idea of stealing." In People v. Urquidas, 96 Cal. 241, 31 Pac. 52,—a case of burglary,—it was claimed that the words "stole" and "stealing" are not equivalent to the word "larceny;" but it was held that, if the defendan entered a barn "with the intention of stealing hay therein," he entered "with intent to commit grand or petit larceny." In People v. Mitchell, 92 Cal. 592, 28 Pac. 597,—a case of forgery,—it was claimed that the indictment was defective because the word "falsely"—a word used in the statute defining the crime of forgery—was not used before the word "forge." But Mr. Justice Garoutte, in the main opinion, said: "The words 'forge,' 'forger,' and 'forgery,' when used in law, have no honest meaning, but imply fraudulent deceit." The instructions complained of are not, in our opinion, fairly obnoxious to the criticisms put upon them by counsel for the defendant. We do not think that the jury could have construed the language of the court as an intimation on its part that the defendant was guilty of fraud, or that, in its opinion, the publication referred to was made for the purpose of fraudulently obtaining the money of others.

There is no merit in the claim that the court erred in not excluding the jurors from the court room during the argument on motion for a nonsuit. The court does not, in overruling such motions, intimate to the jury any opinion of the guilt or innocence of the defendant, and there is no provision of the law requiring the exclusion of the jury on such occasions. It is for the court, always, in its discretion, to say whether the interests of the parties demand that the jury should not hear the argument on a motion for a nonsuit. The judgment and orders appealed from are affirmed.

We concur: GAROUTTE, J.; HARRISON, J.

Dissenting opinion. For majority opinion, see 36 Pac. 98.

BEATTY, C. J. (dissenting). The modification made in the judgment of the department in this case does not, in my opinion, rectify all the errors of which appellant has a right to complain, and is not, therefore, a sufficient ground for denying him a rehearing. Even allowing that he is justly chargeable with interest compounded annually at the rate of 10 per cent. on the funds in his hands, he is still entitled to be credited with the payments made by him at the dates when they were made. By the method of computation followed in arriving at the amount of the judgment now given, interest is calculated on the whole of each annual balance for a whole year, and from the amount of principal and interest all the payments made during the year are aggregated, and deducted as if they had all been made on the last day, instead of having been made, as the record shows they were, from time to time during the year. This error is partially compensated, it is true, by treating his receipts in the same way; but, since his payments were largely in excess of his receipts, the erroneous method of computation necessarily works to his disadvantage. This, however, is a trifling matter compared to the error—as I deem it to be—of allowing interest at the rate of 10 per cent., instead of the legal rate of 7 per cent. I know of no authority for allowing interest, as such, at any greater than the legal rate. It is of course, permissible in a proper case under pleadings properly framed to allow actual profits realized by a trustee upon trust funds, and there is, perhaps, no objection to computing or measuring such profits by compounding interest at any given rate. But this is no such case; certainly not on the pleadings; and, in my opinion, not even on the findings. The form of proceeding by petition to the probate court was, confessedly, a mistake; but, by what I cannot help regarding as too great a concession on the part of this court, the petition so filed, and the exceptions to the account filed by appellant, are treated as the equivalent of a bill in equity by a cestui que trust against a delinquent trustee, and it is assumed that they, together with the account filed by appellant, made issues, and, among others, an issue as to actual profits derived by the appellant from the trust fund. In my opinion, no such issue was made on the most liberal construction that can be given to the petition and exceptions, and therefore the superior court had no right to try it, or to decree actual profits. It is also a serious objection to the judgment that the proper parties to a suit in equity were not before the court, and on the evidence it does not seem to me that the appellant has been guilty of such misconduct as to call for the infliction of a penalty, or to entitle the petitioners to recover anything more than the fund received by the appellant, with legal interest, compounded. For these reasons I dissent from the order denying a rehearing.

BEHLOW et al. v. FISCHER et al. (No. 18,144.)

EQUITY—MISJOINDER OF PARTIES—CORPORATIONS—MULTIFARIOUSNESS OF BILL.

1. A copartnership composed of A., B., C., and D. formed a corporation to carry on its business. Forty thousand shares were issued to the partners in proportion to their respective interests, and 20,000 shares were held by the firm. Subsequently these shares were sold by the firm to B., who afterwards sold all his interest in the partnership and 22,500 shares in the corporation to D. A. also sold his shares to D. Thereafter A., B., and C. joined in a bill against D. and others, alleging that such sales had been induced by fraud, and praying that they be rescinded, that an accounting be had, and that the partnership be dissolved. Held, that the bill was bad for misjoinder of parties plaintiff and defendant, as plaintiffs were not jointly interested in the property sold, and the rescission of one sale would in no respect affect the other, or any of the defendants other than D. Paterson and Fitzgerald, JJ., dissenting.

2. A corporation has no interest in the individual ownership of its shares, and is not a proper party to a controversy between the claimants to a portion of its capital stock.

3. Where partners form a corporation to carry on the business of the firm, and a portion of the shares are issued to the partners individually, though by agreement between themselves they are interested therein as partners, and the remainder to the firm, a purchaser of shares in such corporation from the firm, or from any of the partners, without notice, is not bound by such agreement.

4. A bill for a rescission of a sale of one partner's interest to another, and for a dissolution of the firm, is multifarious.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Tuolumne county; G. W. Nicol, Judge.

Bill by Charles J. Behlow and others against Jacob A. Fischer and others to rescind certain sales, and for a dissolution of partnership. From a judgment for plaintiffs, defendants appeal. Reversed.

Scrivner & Schell and Wheaton, Kalloch & Kierce, for appellants. J. L. Crittenden, J. C. Campbell, and F. W. Street (Henry S. Foote, of counsel), for respondents.

HARRISON, J. In April, 1889, William G. Long, Jacob A. Fischer, Edward C. Loftus, and Charles J. Behlow formed a copartnership for the purpose of purchasing and working certain mining claims in Tuolumne county upon certain terms agreed upon between them, and thereafter acquired the mining properties contemplated by their agreement. September 1, 1889, these four partners agreed among themselves to form a corporation under the laws of this state, with a capital stock of 60,000 shares, for the purpose of carrying on the business of the partnership under a corporate name, and agreed that upon the organization of the corporation they would divide 40,000 shares of the capital stock between themselves according to their respective interests in the partnership, and that the remaining 20,000 shares should be disposed of as the partnership should determine. In pursuance of this agreement, a corporation was organized under the corporate name of the Consolidated Golden Gate & Sulphuret Mining & Development Company, and on the 4th of September of that year the copartners conveyed to it the aforesaid mining property; and of the 40,000 shares that the partners had agreed to divide among themselves, 15,000 were issued to Behlow, 15,000 to Fischer, 5,000 to Long, and 5,000 to Loftus. September 12, 1889, 19,200 of the remaining shares were issued to Behlow in consideration of his paying therefor the sum of $3.50 per share. November 27, 1889, Long sold and transferred to Fischer the 5,000 shares of the capital stock issued to him for the sum of $2,000; and September 12, 1890, Behlow sold and transferred to Fischer all his interest in said copartnership, and 22,500 shares of said capital stock, for the sum of $35,160. It is alleged in the complaint that these sales and transfers were made in consequence of fraudulent acts, concealments, and representations on the part of Fischer, and that but for such fraud they would not have been made; that these frauds were not discovered until November 20, 1891; that on the 4th day of January, 1892, Behlow and Long severally "gave notice of rescission, and rescinded the said sale and transfer to Jacob A. Fischer * * * on the ground of fraud, and tendered and offered to return and repay to said Jacob A. Fischer the consideration received as aforesaid for said sale and transfer, * * * and then and there demanded of said Fischer the return and transfer of their interest in the copartnership, and the return and transfer of said shares of stock." The complaint further alleges that Fischer had sold and transferred to defendant John Loftus 10,000 shares of the capital stock, and had transferred other portions thereof to other persons. The complaint also alleges that, although by the agreement for the division of the 40,000 shares of the capital stock of the corporation Behlow was to receive 20,000 and Fischer only 10,000 shares, yet Fischer, "with the intent to defraud said copartnership and his said copartners," caused 15,000 shares to be issued to himself, although he well knew that 5,000 of said shares belonged to and should have been issued to Behlow. The present case was commenced January 11, 1892, by Behlow, Long, Loftus, and Mariam V. Loftus; and in their complaint they ask for a judgment vacating and annulling the aforesaid purchases by Fischer from Behlow and Long of their interests in the copartnership and in the shares of corporate stock transferred by them to him; that it be adjudged that Fischer received and held in trust for Behlow the 5,000 shares of the capital stock of the corporation wrongfully issued to himself, and that he assign and transfer the same to Behlow; that Fischer account and pay over to Behlow and Long all the moneys which he may have received as dividends on said stock; that an accounting of the business and affairs of said corporation be had, and that said copartnership be dissolved; and that the property standing in the name of the defendant corporation be adjudged to be the property of said copartnership. To this complaint the defendants severally demurred, upon the grounds, among others, that there was therein a misjoinder of causes of action, a misjoinder of parties plaintiff, a misjoinder of parties defendant, and that it did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. Their demurrers were overruled, and, after answering the complaint, a trial was had, and judgment rendered in favor of the plaintiffs. From this judgment the defendants have appealed, bringing up the judgment roll alone.

The demurrer to the complaint should have been sustained. The cause of action in favor of Behlow for a rescission of the sale by him to Fischer was a matter entirely separate and distinct from the cause of action in favor of Long for similar relief. Behlow and Long were not jointly interested in the property sold, nor were the sales made by the same transaction, or for a single consideration, or to be established by the same evidence. Their ownership of an interest in the partnership, as well as of the shares of the capital stock held by them, was the individual property of each, and was capable of being disposed of at the will of each. If the sale by either of them should be rescinded, such rescission would in no respect affect either of the other parties, or either of the defendants other than Fischer. The corporation defendant has no interest in the individual ownership of its shares, and is not a proper party in a controversy between two claimants to a portion of its capital stock. Under the allegations in the complaint the 20,000 shares of the capital stock of the corporation which the parties agreed should remain unissued were a part of the partnership assets. Whenever these shares were disposed of, they ceased to be partnership assets, and became the individual assets of the purchaser. Hence, when Behlow purchased the 19,200 shares, they became his individual property, and were removed from all control by or in the interest of the copartnership. The 5,000 shares which he alleges were wrongfully issued by Fischer to himself out of the 20,000 to which he was entitled was a wrong in which only Fischer and himself were interested, and neither of the other parties to this action are interested in their controversy over this wrong.

Assuming that the corporation was but an agent of the copartnership, and that, so long as the original parties to its organization were the only ones interested in its affairs, it is to be managed in accordance with their agreement for its organization, yet the shares of its capital stock which were issued to these partners became their individual property. These shares of stock represented the assets of the corporation, and the owner of any portion of these shares became thereby the equitable owner of that proportion of those assets. It does not follow that, because the original owners of this stock were, as between themselves, and by virtue of their agreement, interested as partners in the assets of the corporation, every transferee of the stock was also a partner with the others. Partnership, whether mining or commercial, depends upon the intention with which the association is formed. A purchaser of the capital stock of a mining corporation does not, by the mere act of purchase, become a partner with the other stockholders; and, if it be conceded that the original partners hereto formed a corporation for carrying out the object of their partnership, and that others who succeeded to their interests are bound by an agreement of that character which they subscribed to, or of which they had notice, there is no averment in the complaint which sustains this theory. The only averment by which the defendants Martha F. Blake and Rosalia Fischer are connected with the other parties to this action is that certain shares of the capital stock of the corporation had been transferred to them by Fischer. In the absence of any averment that there was such an agreement as we have above referred to, they must be regarded merely as stockholders in the corporation, who have purchased their stock upon the faith that the assets of the corporation were its property, and that the stock held by them was capable of transfer and purchase like the stock of any other corporation. For the 19,200 shares of stock purchased from the corporation by Behlow there can be no claim that it was partnership assets, or that the transferees of Fischer to whom he sold it were in any respect interested in his dealings with Behlow, or in any other stock which he or the other members of the partnership might hold.

The averments relative to copartnership, and the prayer for an accounting and dissolution of such copartnership, did not authorize the joinder of these causes of action in favor of Behlow and Long against Fischer with the action for a dissolution of the partnership. The court could take jurisdiction of an action for the dissolution of the partnership only at the instance of a partner, and the joinder with Loftus of others as plaintiffs, who by their own averments had parted with all their interest in the partnership, did not give to the court jurisdiction to determine in the same action a controversy between them and their vendee respecting the validity of their sales. Until they had established their right to interfere in the management of the partnership affairs, the other partners were not liable to any action at their instance. If, as averred in the complaint, the corporation was only an agent of the partnership, it is only the partnership, or some one in its interest, who would have the right to ask for an account of its agency, or for a surrender of its assets. The rule that when a court of equity has jurisdiction of a matter it will determine in that action all questions that may arise, and will not remit the party to another tribunal, has no application. This rule applies only when the party seeking the relief shows by his bill that he has such a standing in a court of equity as entitles him to invoke the aid of the court. But when, by the averments of his complaint, it appears that he has no such standing, his bill will be dismissed for want of equity, and if it appears from his bill that the relief sought is twofold, and that the averments and proofs necessary to authorize the one are separate and distinct from those necessary to authorize the other, his bill will be dismissed for multifariousness. In the present case the relief sought by Behlow from a rescission of the sale by him to Fischer is utterly disconnected with the relief sought under the prayer for a dissolution of the partnership. Each of these species of relief is the matter of separate and distinct averment, and dependent upon different proofs. Behlow was not authorized to join the two causes of action in the same complaint, nor had the other plaintiffs any interest in the relief which he seeks against Fischer solely. The same remarks are applicable to the joinder of the two causes of action in favor of Long. This conclusion renders it unnecessary to determine whether the averments in the complaint are sufficient to uphold the judgment against the corporation defendant. The judgment is reversed.

We concur: BEATTY, C. J.; McFARLAND, J.; DE HAVEN, J.

PATERSON and FITZGERALD, JJ. We dissent. The complaint is sufficient, and the demurrer was properly overruled. The case presented is stronger than the one shown in Shorb v. Beaudry, 56 Cal. 446. The action is one in equity for the dissolution of a copartnership and an accounting between the copartners. All the parties are interested either in the copartnership or its assets. There is, therefore, no misjoinder of parties, either plaintiffs or defendants. Pom. Eq. Jur. §§ 113, 114. The fact that there are several separate and independent acts of fraud charged does not militate against the right of the parties to an adjustment of the affairs of the copartnership in which they are all interested. As the legal title to the partnership property was in the corporation, the latter was a proper and a necessary party. Reynolds v. Lincoln, 71 Cal. 183, 9 Pac. 176, and 12 Pac. 449. We think it was proper, too, to include all the transactions under which the rights of the respective parties have accrued to one or all of the plaintiffs, as against a part or all of the defendants, and growing out of partnership transactions, in order that, in closing up the copartnership affairs, the court might do full and complete justice to each and all of the parties interested. Equity, in such cases, does not adjudicate piecemeal. The several charges of misconduct all grew out of the conduct of the partnership affairs, and there is, therefore, in our opinion, no misjoinder of causes of action in uniting them in an equitable action in the same complaint.

PEOPLE v. MONAGHAN. (No. 21,042.)

CRIMINAL LAW—PLEA AFTER DEMURRER OVERRULED.

Defendant withdrew his plea of not guilty, and demurred to the indictment. His demurrer being overruled, time was given him to plead, but no further plea was made, and trial and conviction followed. Held no trial. The plea withdrawn was not reinstated by the overruling of the demurrer; nor could issue be had on the theory of a refusal to plead, without a formal entry by the court; nor could defendant's going to trial waive the need of a plea.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; J. M. Seawell, Judge.

Joseph P. Monaghan, convicted of obtaining money on false pretenses, appeals. Reversed.

Kip & Massey, for appellant. Atty. Gen. Hart, W. S. Barnes, Dist. Atty., and Dunn & McPike, for the People.

TEMPLE, C. Appellant was indicted by the grand jury of the city and county of San Francisco for the crime of obtaining money by false pretenses. The record shows that defendant was duly arraigned July 23, 1892, and pleaded not guilty, and was allowed until July 30th to withdraw the plea. July 30th of the same year the plea was withdrawn, and a demurrer to the indictment entered, and time allowed to file briefs. The record shows that the demurrers were finally submitted, and December 28, 1892, it was ordered that the demurrer be overruled, and the cause continued to December 31, 1892, for defendant to plea. The record does not show that anything was done in the case on December 31st, but April 8th the cause was continued by consent to April 15th. No appearance is noted for April 15th, but on May 23d there is an entry in the clerk's minutes (after title of court and cause) in these words: "May 23d for trial." May 23d the defendant and his counsel were in court, and the trial commenced. A jury was impaneled, the indictment read to the jury, and a statement made to the jury by the clerk that a plea of not guilty had been entered. The trial then proceeded in due order—no objection being made on the ground that defendant had not pleaded to the indictment, but the defendant was tried in all respects as though the plea of not guilty had been entered. Evidence upon such supposed issue was put in both by the people and by the defendant. Whether the defendant asked for instructions does not appear, but his counsel made an argument in his behalf to the jury. The jury returned the verdict: "We, the jury, find the defendant guilty as charged in the indictment, and fix the value of the property obtained by the defendant to be one thousand ($1,000) dollars." When the time arrived for passing judgment, defendant's counsel objected because defendant had not been legally convicted, and the court could not make to the defendant the statements required by section 1200, Pen. Code, to wit, his plea. The defendant then made a motion in arrest of judgment, which was overruled, and a motion for new trial, which was denied.

The sole question raised on this appeal relates to the legality of the trial and conviction of the defendant without a plea. The people do not controvert the main proposition,—that a plea is necessary before there can be a trial. Until there is an issue, there is nothing to try. Blackstone tells us (4 Bl. Comm. 325) the great pains which were taken to compel a defendant to plead, and the terrible consequences which sometimes resulted from his standing mute. Wherever the common law prevails, criminal procedures have carefully provided for the arraignment of accused persons,—that they shall be fully informed of the charge against them, and of their right to plead. Some formalities are enjoined upon criminal courts, partly to have record evidence that there has been a fair trial, and partly to make it sure that an accused person has not been deprived of a substantial right through caprice or negligence of the judge or prosecuting officer. See Pen. Code, §§ 987 et seq., 1066, 1200. The action of the trial court is defended here on three grounds:

(1) It is said that, as the plea of not guilty was withdrawn to enable the defendant to demur to the indictment, it was naturally understood that when the defendant had had the benefit of his demurrer, and that had proven unavailing, the plea of not guilty would then stand as defendant's plea. People v. Bradner, 107 N. Y. 1, 13 N. E. 87, is cited as authority for this proposition. It is not claimed that any such understanding was expressed at the time by any one, but it is claimed that such understanding naturally results from the situation. But, unfortunately for this argument, the record conclusively rebuts such presumption, if it could otherwise have been indulged, for it shows that, upon the overruling of the demurrer, time was given to defendant to plead. Presumptively, this was upon the application of the defendant, and it shows that no one could have understood that there was already a plea of not guilty in the record, and I think it raises a presumption that defendant was not then prepared to plead not guilty. There were at least three other defensive pleas open to him.

(2) It is said that, upon the overruling of the demurrer, the defendant might elect to plead, or might decline to plead. If he declined to plead, judgment would go against him without further trial. Pen. Code, § 1011. If the fact be conceded, as assumed in this position, that after the demurrer the defendant declined to plead, such fact would not tend to prove the legality of the trial and judgment entered upon the verdict. An issue could not be made upon a refusal to plead, unless the court formally entered a plea for the defendant on the ground of his refusal to plead. But how can it be said that defendant declined to plead? Apparently, he asked time to do so, and a time was appointed for that purpose. The record does not show that he was then or at any other time allowed the opportunity. Certainly judgment could not be pronounced upon him under section 1011, Pen. Code, unless he had in fact declined to plead after his demurrer was overruled.

(3) The argument is, although such point is not expressly made, that by going to trial without objection, by putting in evidence and arguing the case to the jury, the defendant has had the benefit of a plea of not guilty, has waived its formal entry, has shown his intention to rest upon such an issue, and having had the benefit of it is not prejudiced by the fact that it was not formally entered. As is sometimes held in civil cases, when all parties have gone to trial without objection, as though a certain issue were made in pleadings, and had every advantage at the trial which they could have had if the issue had been made by proper pleadings, they cannot afterwards claim that there was error in that no such issue was made by the pleadings. This position is inconsistent with the admission that a plea is necessary, for the argument would be just as persuasive had the defendant never been arraigned at all. It has been decided by this court. People v. Corbett, 28 Cal. 328; People v. Gaines, 52 Cal. 479. It has been decided over and over again in numerous cases, all holding against a respondent. Bish. Cr. Proc. § 733, and cases. In Missouri the question seems to have been often considered, and it is held that defendant cannot waive the plea, and going to trial on the merits without objection is not equivalent to a plea. In State v. Saunders, 53 Mo. 234, the plea was entered after trial, nunc pro tunc. It was held that this could not be done. The plea must precede the trial. In State v. Webber, 22 Mo. 321, after the jury had been sworn, it was discovered that no plea had been entered. The defendant was then arraigned and pleaded, and the jury was resworn. This proceeding was sustained on the ground that the trial was after the plea. See, also, State v. Montgomery, 63 Mo. 296; State v. West, 84 Mo. 440. In State v. Hunter, 43 La. Ann. 157, 8 South. 624, it is said: "The absolute requirement of the law, that the accused must plead personally to the indictment on arraignment, cannot be cured by the fact that he was brought into court and tried without objection." No authority has been cited to the contrary, and I think none can be found. That the defendant has been afforded an opportunity to plead is one of the facts in the process of the conviction of a criminal which our law, in its regard for life and liberty, requires to be expressly shown, and I believe that is one reason why it is made a fact which the judge must state to the convict before pronouncing judgment. The judge would not state it as a fact unless it were so, and he must so state to make it certain that it is a fact. I advise that the judgment and order be reversed and a new trial had.

We concur: BELCHER, C.; SEARLS, C.

BARTLETT et al. v. O'CONNOR et al. (No. 15,399.)

WATER COURSE—RISING IN BOG—DRAINING.

Where one, in draining a marsh from which a stream runs onto another's agricultural land, in connection wherewith it has been used for irrigating and domestic purposes from time immemorial, diverts the water intentionally and without benefit to himself, he will be enjoined.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Mendocino county; R. McGarvey, Judge.

Suit by James Bartlett and others against Cornelius O'Connor and others for damages and an injunction. Judgment for plaintiffs. Defendants appeal. Affirmed.

J. M. Mannon, for appellants. J. A. Cooper, J. Q. White, and W. P. Thomas, for respondents.

VANCLIEF, C. Action to recover damages for diversion of water from an alleged spring and natural stream, and to enjoin the defendants perpetually from such diversion. Judgment passed for plaintiffs, enjoining the defendants as prayed for, and for costs, but without damages. The defendants appeal from the judgment, and from an order denying their motion for a new trial.

The material facts are as follows: In February, 1891, the plaintiffs, being the owners of a large tract of land in Mendocino county, sold and conveyed a parcel thereof (130 acres) to the state of California, to be occupied and used as the site for the Mendocino State Asylum for the Insane. Upon the parcel thus sold to the state is a marsh or bog of about three acres, out of which arises a considerable quantity of water, which runs off from the west side of the bog, through a natural channel, across plaintiffs' adjoining land. The channel is hardly perceptible within the marshy land, but becomes distinct at the western edge thereof, and thence so continues through plaintiffs' land. The court found that at the head of the natural channel is "a living spring of water, * * * and that at the place, and in the vicinity of said spring, a large quantity of water rises and forms the source of a living stream of water; that the said water from said spring flows off in a natural, well-defined channel, through and over the lands of plaintiffs, and has been so wont to flow onto and over the lands of the plaintiffs in a natural and well-defined channel from time immemorial;" and that plaintiffs' lands are agricultural lands; and that the said water flowing through said natural channel has been used by plaintiffs for domestic purposes and for irrigation continuously for more than 20 years, until diverted by defendants in 1891. The court further found that in 1891 "the defendants willfully, and for the express purpose of drawing off the water that formed the spring, being the source of said natural stream, and for the purpose of drawing off said water and diverting it from said natural stream, cut an artificial ditch in and near said spring, and at a point before said water reaches the lands of the plaintiffs, and turned said water into said ditch, and diverted it from its channel and said ditch, and away from the stream in which it formerly flowed, so as to greatly diminish the quantity of water so flowing from said natural stream through and over the lands of the plaintiffs; and the defendants threaten to continue, and will, unless restrained by this court, continue, to divert said water from said natural stream and from the spring, the source of said natural stream, so as to diminish the natural flow of water from said stream, to the great and irreparable injury of plaintiffs." It is further found that the ditch dug by defendants is on the land purchased by the state from the plaintiffs, and the defendants were directors of said state asylum at the time they dug said ditch. The defendants testified that the water diverted through the ditch was not used or intended to be used for any purpose, and that the sole object of the diversion was to drain and reclaim the land for the purpose of cultivating the same. In answer to this the plaintiffs proved, and the court found, that, if the object was merely to drain the marsh, it could have been accomplished at much less expense by deepening the natural channel and outlet, in which there is a fall of 18 inches in the first 60 feet from the head, in the first 130 feet a fall of 3 feet, in the first 300 feet a fall of 4½ feet, and in the first 500 feet a fall of 6 feet and 5 inches; whereas, in the first 400 feet on the line of the ditch dug by defendants there is no fall. The head of the ditch dug by defendants is between 25 and 30 feet distant from the head of the natural channel, at which point it is 3 feet deep; and at a distance of 400 feet from that point it is from 5 to 6 feet deep. Then, connecting with the head of the ditch, at right angles therewith, is a ditch about 34 feet long, and another of the same length, and parallel therewith, about 14 feet therefrom, the natural effect of which is to divert water from the natural channel. These measurements were made and testified to by a surveyor, and were not disputed; so that the finding of the court that the object—at least one object—of the defendants was to divert the water from the natural channel and away from the plaintiffs' land by considerable unnecessary labor and expense if their only object was to drain the land, is amply justified by the evidence. And although the court, in its findings, did not use the word "malice," yet it substantially found that the defendants intentionally, unnecessarily, and without benefit to themselves or others, diverted the water to the injury of the plaintiffs. This the law characterizes as a malicious injury. Conceding that defendants were entitled to drain the land for the purpose of cultivating it, yet if, without inconvenience or extra expense, they could have adopted a mode or means of drainage not injurious to others, they had no right to adopt a mode which was not only injurious to plaintiffs, but intentionally so, as found by the court. In view of this conclusion it becomes unnecessary to consider the question principally argued by counsel, namely, whether the defendants diverted only such water as percolated through their own land or that of their principal, the state. I think the judgment and order should be affirmed.

We concur: TEMPLE, C.; HAYNES, C.

SHEEHY v. CHALMERS. (No. 15,324.)

ACTION ON NOTE—EVIDENCE—JUDGMENT.

1. Under Code Civ. Proc. § 667, providing that judgments in suits on contracts or obligations in writing for the direct payment of money may be made payable in the kind of money specified therein, a judgment payable in "U. S. gold coin" is not erroneous, when the note on which it is rendered is payable in "U. S. gold coin."

2. Where the answer to a complaint on a promissory note expressly admits its execution, it is unnecessary to introduce it in evidence.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Santa Cruz county; J. F. McCann, J.

Action by James Sheehy against W. P. Chalmers on a promissory note. From a judgment for plaintiff, and an order dismissing his motion for new trial, for want of prosecution, defendant appeals. Judgment and order affirmed.

Eugene N. Deuprey, for appellant. Julius Lee, for respondent.

BELCHER, C. On January 5, 1891, the defendant executed to the plaintiff his promissory note, whereby he promised to pay plaintiff, one day after date, $1,050 "in U. S. gold coin," with interest, etc. On December 1, 1891, the plaintiff commenced this action to recover the amount due on the note, and prayed judgment for the amount "in the gold coin of the United States." The complaint was verified, and a complete copy of the note was set out therein. The answer of the defendant "admits the making of the promissory note alleged and set forth in said complaint," and the only defense interposed is an allegation "that it was understood and agreed that the sum sued for in this action was not to become due or payable until after the defendant herein had received sixty days' previous notice, which notice should be given by plaintiff to defendant before the same should become due or payable;" and a further allegation "that the plaintiff failed and neglected to give sixty days' notice, and that the said sum sued for in this action, and that said promissory note, is not due or payable, and that the action herein is premature." At the trial the plaintiff testified that he was the owner and holder of the note sued upon, and that no part of it had been paid, and then rested his case. The defendant thereupon moved for a nonsuit, upon the ground "that there had not been any alleged promissory note, or aught pertaining thereto, introduced in evidence." The court denied the motion, and evidence relating to the affirmative defense set up in the answer was then introduced by both sides. The court found, among other things, "that there was not at any time any understanding or agreement whatever between the parties hereto respecting said note sued on, or the time of the payment thereof, other than or different from, that expressed in said note," and gave judgment for the plaintiff according to the prayer of his complaint. The defendant moved for a new trial, which was dismissed for want of prosecution, and has appealed from the judgment and order dismissing his motion. Two points only are made for a reversal. They are (1) that the judgment was erroneous in so far as it made the amount adjudged to be due payable "in the gold coin of the United States;" and (2) that the court should have granted the defendant's motion for a nonsuit because, "at the trial, no note was offered in evidence, and there was no attempt to account for its absence."

1. The Code provides that: "In an action on a contract or obligation in writing for the direct payment of money, made payable in a specified kind of money or currency, judgment for the plaintiff, whether it be by default or after verdict, may follow the contract or obligation, and be made payable in the kind of money or currency specified therein." Code Civ. Proc. § 667. This action was on a contract in writing for the direct payment of money, made payable in "U. S. gold coin." There was no error, therefore, in making the judgment payable in the kind of money specified in the contract. Carpentier v. Atherton, 25 Cal. 564.

2. It was not necessary to introduce the note in evidence, or to exhibit it at the trial. Its execution was expressly admitted by the answer, and the rule is elementary that no proof is required as to matters not in issue. It is said that "the plaintiff totally ignored the law as to the distinction between primary and secondary evidence," but no question as to primary and secondary evidence arose in the case. No good purpose would have been subserved by producing the note, and the court, therefore, did not err in denying the motion for nonsuit. We see no merit in the appeal, and advise that the judgment and order be affirmed.

We concur: VANCLIEF, C.; HAYNES, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment and order appealed from are affirmed, and the respondent is allowed $50 damages as a part of his costs on the appeal herein.

(Supreme Court of California. April 19, 1894.)

SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE—CONDITIONS PRECEDENT—REVIEW ON APPEAL.

1. A covenant in a contract to convey land to a county for a highway and bridge, binding the county to furnish a cattle-way to the river, need not be performed in advance as a condition to a conveyance.

2. Findings of fact by the trial court will not be reviewed on appeal.

3. The discretion of the trial court in granting the reformation of a deed will not be reviewed, except in a very plain case.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Monterey county; John K. Alexander, Judge.

Action by Monterey county against John and Henry Seegleken to reform a deed. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

W. A. Kearney, for appellants. B. V. Sargent, S. F. Geil, and J. J. Wyatt, for respondent.

TEMPLE, C. This action was brought to reform a deed. Plaintiff avers that it purchased from the defendants a tract of land, which the complaint specifically describes, for the consideration of $1,000, which was then paid to the defendants; that on the day on which it paid said money to defendants they executed a deed to it, intending thereby to convey the tract of land above alluded to, but, through the mistake of the scrivener in writing the deed, they in fact conveyed to plaintiff, contrary to the agreement and understanding of the grantors and grantee, another tract, which is also specifically described in the complaint; that the mistake was not discovered by plaintiff for several months after the execution of the deed; that defendants refused to rectify the mistake by executing a deed for the tract of land which plaintiff purchased; wherefore plaintiff demands a decree that the deed be reformed, and for such relief as may be just and equitable. The answer is a general denial. The court found for plaintiff all the facts averred in the complaint, but it also found that, as part of the consideration for the deed, plaintiff agreed to give to defendants a sufficient cattle-way from their lands to the Salinas river, between the bridge across Salinas river and the lands of F. S. Spring; and that plaintiff had not complied with that part of its agreement, and had not left a sufficient cattle-way for defendants to the river. Thereupon an interlocutory order was made, requiring plaintiff to provide a cattle-way according to the agreement and to the approval of the court, which, when done, would entitle plaintiff to the decree as prayed for. Subsequently a final decree was entered, in which, among other things, it is recited that a cattle-way has been provided for defendants. The decree then proceeds to award the relief prayed for. Defendants moved for a new trial, and now appeal from the order denying their motion. Three points only are made on this appeal: (1) The alleged contract was not proven, and the contract which was proven had not been performed by plaintiff; (2) the contract proven is so uncertain and indefinite that a court of equity will not enforce it; and (3) the misunderstanding, if there was any, was not mutual.

The county of Monterey, the plaintiff, purchased the land for a highway. It is a strip 60 feet wide along the river, at the westerly termination of which, it appears, a bridge was to be built across Salinas river. The plaintiff contends that the strip purchased extended to Spring's land, which is some 100 feet further down the river than the strip described in the deed extends. The bridge was built by the county below the land decribed in the deed, and within about 30 feet of Spring's boundary.

1. The charge that the contract alleged was not proven, and that the contract proven had not been performed by plaintiff, has reference to the finding that one consideration for the deed was a covenant to furnish a cattle-way to Salinas river. There is a slight misapprehension here, I think, on the part of appellant. The consideration was not the cattle-way, but the agreement to furnish one. The way was to be upon the very land conveyed, and was an agreement to allow the defendants the use of so much of it as would afford a cattle-way. In the nature of things, the contract could not be performed until after the conveyance was made; therefore it was not a covenant which it was incumbent upon the plaintiff to perform before it became entitled to a conveyance. Since, however, the plaintiff had taken possession and had constructed its bridge, and not left a convenient cattle-way, it was proper for a court of equity to require it to do so before reforming the deed. Considering the proceeding, however, as a suit for specific performance, and the act one which plaintiff was required to perform before being entitled to his deed, the result would be the same. According to some of plaintiff's witnesses, the bridge was located without objection on the part of defendants. The county had performed the most important part of its contract, had expended considerable money on the land, and the act for which plaintiff was in default could still be performed. It does not appear that inconvenience or loss has resulted from the delay. The plaintiff had already provided a cattle-way which it claimed was sufficient, but the court, holding otherwise, granted the relief conditionally. Defendants are not injured. Hoppough v. Struble, 60 N. Y. 430.

2. I presume that appellant, by his second point, really means that the proof that a mistake was made is insufficient; that the proof was so balanced that the court could not say with sufficient certainty that a mistake had been made. This was a question almost entirely for the court below. Unless the evidence be clear and convincing, the trial court should decline to grant the relief. But, in the nature of things, it must be a very plain case to justify the interference of this court with that discretion. Ward v. Waterman, 85 Cal. 504, 24 Pac. 930.

3. The point that the mistake was not mutual is perhaps the same point in a different form. The evidence of the members of the board of supervisors is quite clear as to their understanding. Looking only to the testimony on the part of the plaintiff, it is equally clear as to the understanding of John Seegleken. As I understand the evidence, the controversy concerns him, and not the other defendant. Field and Sheehy, who were members of the board of supervisors of Monterey county when the land was purchased, testified for plaintiff very clearly and positively as to the understanding of John Seegleken. Certain witnesses for the defendants contradicted this testimony, but that only made a case of conflict, and this court will not interfere. I advise that the order be affirmed.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the order appealed from is affirmed.

DONOVAN v. OAKLAND & BERKELEY RAPID-TRANSIT CO. (No. 15,373.)

INDEPENDENT CONTRACTORS—GUARDING COMPLETED WORK.

Defendant, which had a franchise to erect poles on a street, bargained with a contractor for the digging of holes of a specified size, as directed by defendant's superintendent, and in places named by him. Into one of the holes, dug several days before, and left unguarded, plaintiff fell, on a dark night. The superintendent, who had been by every day, did not recollect that any objection had been made to that hole. Held, that a nonsuit was error, since, even if the contractor was independent, if his work on that hole had been done and accepted at the time of the accident, defendant would be liable.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Alameda county; F. W. Henshaw, Judge.

Action by Patrick Donovan against the Oakland & Berkeley Rapid-Transit Company for damages for personal injuries. Nonsuit granted. Plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Edward C. Robinson and Edward A. Holman, for appellant. J. E. McElrath, for respondent.

VANCLIEF, C. Action to recover damages for a personal injury alleged to have been suffered by plaintiff through the negligence of the defendant,—a private corporation. The cause coming on to be tried by a jury, at the conclusion of plaintiff's evidence in chief the defendant moved for judgment of nonsuit, which was granted; and plaintiff appeals from the judgment, and from an order denying him a new trial.

That the evidence was sufficient to prove that defendant fell into an open hole in Grove street, in Oakland township, in the nighttime, and thereby suffered the injury complained of (fracture of the pelvis or hip bone), and that Grove street is a public street, there is no question. Nor is there any question that defendant caused the hole to be dug, and that it was unguarded by any light, or otherwise, to warn travelers of the danger of falling into it, during the night of the accident. It appears, however, that the hole into which plaintiff fell was one of 500 post holes dug by Spence & Bryant under a contract with defendant, in which holes defendant intended to set poles for the support of electric wires for its electric railroad along and upon Grove and other streets, for which road a franchise had been granted to defendant by the county of Alameda. The record shows that the motion for nonsuit was made on the following ground, only: "That it appears by the testimony that the holes were dug by an independent lot of contractors, and that the relation of master and servant did not exist between Spence & Bryant and the company. Unless it did,—unless there was that relationship of agent and principal, or superior and subordinate,—defendant cannot be held liable."

The following is a copy of the written contract under which the hole was dug by Spence & Bryant for the defendant:

"Oakland, November 16, 1890. Oakland and Berkeley Rapid Transit Co.—Gentlemen: We will dig 500 post holes, more or less, for your company, along the route of your road on Shattuck avenue, and also on Grove street. Said holes to be from 5 to 6 feet deep, according to instructions of your superintendent, and placed where he may designate. The holes are to be 14 inches square, and of sufficient size to admit of poles 11x11 being placed in them, and room to tamp well. The whole work to be subject to the approval of your superintendent. Consideration to be one dollar for each hole dug and accepted by your superintendent; 75 per cent. of the work performed to be paid each Monday; and 12 holes to be dug each day; the work to commence at once. Yours, W. G. Spence. Joseph Bryant.

"Accepted. Oakland and Berkeley Rapid Transit. Supt. H. L. Coleman."

The evidence tends to prove that the particular hole into which the plaintiff fell was dug and finished according to the contract, several days before the accident. Henry L. Coleman, the superintendent of the work for defendant, testified: "I marked out the place where this hole should be dug. I did it as superintendent. Spence & Bryant dug the hole under a contract entered into with the company. It was done under my direction, as superintendent of the company. * * * I did not employ any laborers. Spence & Bryant had to dig the holes. * * * I did not control in any way the digging of the holes, excepting to see that they were dug according to the specifications in the contract. Beyond that, I exercised no control over it whatever. * * * I had nothing to do with the man who dug the holes. I had dealings with Spence & Bryant as principals under the contract. They were hired by the company at so much a hole. I probably saw the hole on Monday preceding the accident. I drove past there very often,—two or three times a day. Neither I nor the company attempted in any way to place a guard or light, or anything, to warn pedestrians of there being a hole, and to prevent accidents at this place. * * * If the holes were not up to that contract, they had to fix them according to the contract. I think the hole was up to the contract. I don't think they had to do any more work on it. I never knew the company to raise any objection to this particular hole. * * * I suppose we placed the hole there under and by virtue of the franchise. We built the whole road under the franchise granted by the board of supervisors." I think the granting of the nonsuit was an error. It will not be denied that it was the legal duty of the defendant to guard the hole in such a manner as to notify and warn travelers by night of the danger of approaching it, unless that duty had been transferred or shifted from defendant to Spence & Bryant by the contract above set out. But conceding, without deciding, that such duty might have been so shifted by contract, still the contract in this case did not have that effect, even while the contractors were digging the particular hole into which plaintiff fell; much less, after they completed all they had contracted to do on that hole. The contract obligated Spence & Bryant to dig each hole 14 inches square, at a place to be designated by defendant's superintendent, and to a depth of 5 to 6 feet, according to instructions of said superintendent, and nothing more. Nothing as to the place, size, or other quality of the hole was intrusted to the judgment or discretion of the contractors. All these were dictated by the defendant. And the evidence strongly tends to prove that the hole into which plaintiff fell had been completed according to the contract, two or three days before the accident. The contract did not require the contractors to guard the hole for the protection of travelers on the street, nor for any other purpose, in any manner, at any time,—certainly not after it was finished; and, since the negligence which caused the injury was that of failing to guard the hole after it was finished by the contractors, it must be imputed to the defendant. Darmstaetter v. Moynahan, 27 Mich. 188; Whart. Neg. §§ 179–187, and cases there cited.

I find nothing opposed to this view in the California cases cited by respondent. In Du Pratt v. Lick, 38 Cal. 691, the contractor was repairing defendant's sidewalk at the time of the accident, and was in no wise subject to the orders, or under the control, of the defendant. Besides, the terms of the contract do not appear. It does not appear that the hole in the sidewalk into which plaintiff fell was contemplated by the defendant, or provided for in the contract. The case was decided upon the authority of Boswell v. Laird, 8 Cal. 469, which is perfectly consistent with the views above expressed. In O'Hale v. Sacramento, 48 Cal. 212, cited by respondent, the defendant had let a contract to construct a sewer; and the contractor (Fuller) made an excavation partly across K street, into which plaintiff fell, and was injured. The plaintiff was nonsuited on the ground that the statute required the sewer to be constructed under a contract to be let as therein provided, and, inasmuch as the contract had been so let to Fuller by the defendant city, it was held not liable for the negligence of the contractor. But the terms of the contract do not appear. Undoubtedly, the contractor had the entire control of the excavation, and consequently the duty of properly guarding it while the sewer was being constructed devolved upon him. However this may be, it is quite clear that it is not a precedent applicable to the facts of this case. There was no statute requiring or regulating the letting of the contract in this case, nor had the contractors in this case control of the manner in which the work should be done, even while they were doing it, and surely not after it was completed. The case of Andrews v. Runyon, 65 Cal. 630, seems directly in point as to the effect of the contract upon the liability of the defendant. In that case the defendant had let a contract to repair a levee. The contractor dug earth from a public road with which to repair the levee, and thereby made an excavation in the road, into which plaintiff drove his team and buggy, and was seriously injured. The court said: "If it was a part of the contract that the road was to be dug up to build the levee, Runyon [who let the contract] would certainly be bound." See, also, Williams v. Irrigation Co., 96 Cal. 14, 30 Pac. 961; Colgrove v. Smith, 36 Pac. 411. Assuming that the digging of the hole was expressly or impliedly authorized by the franchise, it was not necessarily a nuisance, and could only become such by improper use, or by being negligently left in a condition dangerous to travelers, without being properly guarded; and in these respects, only, is negligence charged in this action. I think the judgment should be reversed, and a new trial granted.

We concur: BELCHER, C.; HAYNES, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment appealed from is reversed, and a new trial granted.

PEOPLE v. WAITE. (No. 21,015.)

ELECTIONS—APPOINTMENT OF DEPUTY REGISTRAR.

Under Pol. Code, § 4112, authorizing county officers to appoint deputies, if necessary for the discharge of the duties of their office, a registrar may appoint a deputy with power to administer oaths.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; W. R. Daingerfield, Judge.

G. W. Waite was convicted of perjury, and appeals. Affirmed.

Wm. S. Barnes and Atty. Gen. Hart, for appellant. Aug. Tilden, for respondent.

McFARLAND, J. Appellant was charged in the information with, and convicted of, the crime of perjury, committed by swearing falsely in an affidavit made by him for the purpose of being registered as a legal voter; and he appeals from the judgment, relying on the judgment roll to show reversible error. The charge is that he swore falsely before a deputy registrar in the city and county of San Francisco; and the only point made is that the registrar had no power to appoint a deputy who could administer oaths, because such appointment was not "necessary for the faithful and prompt discharge of the duties of his office," as provided by section 4112 of the Political Code. The contention is that an applicant for registration can make the requisite affidavit before any other officer qualified to administer oaths; that the duty of administering oaths is not specially enjoined on the registrar; and that, therefore, it is not "necessary" for him to perform that duty, or to have a deputy to do it. We see no real merit in this contention. It would apply to nearly all other county officers; for, generally, the law merely confers upon such officers the power to administer oaths. Administering the necessary oaths to those coming to the registrar to be registered is as much the duty of the registrar as of any other officer; it naturally belongs to his office, and it was evidently contemplated by the act creating such office. The number of his deputies was limited only by his discretion. Pol. Code, § 877. The judgment and order denying motion in arrest of judgment are affirmed.

CHUNG KEE et al. v. DAVIDSON et al.

(No. 18,228.)

MINING PARTNERSHIP—WHAT CONSTITUTES—CONSTRUCTION OF CONTRACT.

1. An agreement under which one who has mortgaged mining property to secure a debt is to remain in possession and turn over the result of each "clean-up" to the mortgagee, the latter to apply it to the mining expenses and to the payment of the mortgage debt, does not constitute them mining partners, nor render the mortgagee unconditionally liable for the expenses of working the mine.

2. Under such agreement the proceeds of the "clean-up" must first be applied to the mining expenses, and the balance applied on the mortgage debt.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Calaveras county; C. V. Gottschalk, Judge.

Action by Chung Kee and Mook Sow against L. Davidson, S. C. Peek, and others on a claim assigned for work and labor and on an account stated. From a judgment for defendants, and an order denying a new trial, plaintiffs appeal. Reversed.

Loutitt, Woods & Levinsky, for appellants. Reddick & Solinsky, for respondents.

HAYNES, C. This is a second appeal. The opinion of the court upon the first appeal is reported in 73 Cal. at page 522, 15 Pac. 100. The complaint contained a cause of action upon each of three claims assigned to plaintiffs, and three counts upon each cause of action. The first trial was confined to the first count upon each cause of action, and involved the liability of the defendants to them upon the contract hereinafter referred to. Upon the second trial no evidence was given by the plaintiffs under the first count, but they based their right to recover upon the second and third counts of each cause of action. The second count, after alleging the indebtedness of the Cooks to plaintiffs' assignors upon an account stated, alleged, in substance, that the Cooks delivered to defendants L. Davidson and S. C. Peek gold dust to the value of $5,500, "it being at the time of said delivery of said gold dust to said defendants understood and agreed by and between said defendants A. Cook and W. Cook on the one side and the defendants L. Davidson and S. C. Peek on the other that out of said $5,500 in gold dust the said Davidson and Peek should pay and discharge the claim and demand of plaintiffs' assignors." The third count was based upon the theory that the defendants and the Cooks were mining partners, and, as such, were liable for the labor in the mines for which the indebtedness sued for accrued. The answer of defendants raised certain issues upon the several counts of the complaint, and these issues were tried by the court without a jury. Findings and judgment went for defendants, and plaintiffs appeal from the judgment and order denying their motion for a new trial. The Cooks were made defendants, and, upon their default, judgment was entered against them.

The third count may be disposed of in a few words. There was no partnership between the respondents and the Cooks. It is true that, if any profit resulted from the mining operations conducted by the Cooks, it was to be received and retained by the respondents, as they were to receive all the gold produced; but such profits were not to be received as profits, but to be applied as payment pro tanto of the prior indebtedness of the Cooks to them. No single feature of a partnership existed. Respondents were not co-owners, but incumbrancers, of the mines, and were not in possession, and were interested in the work done only as creditors, for advancements made and to be made; and, if any profits resulted, the Cooks received the whole benefit by its application to the payment of their pre-existing debt. Of the proceeds which were not profits, but which represented the cost of production, we shall speak in another connection.

The second count proceeded upon the theory that respondents received from W. Cook and A. Cook $5,500 of gold dust, and that respondents agreed with the Cooks to apply it to the payment of the claims of plaintiffs' assignors. If this state of facts is sustained by the evidence, the plaintiffs should have had judgment. Whether the findings of fact show such a case, or whether, if the findings do not show such a case, they are justified by the evidence, must therefore be considered. The findings, so far as they are not excepted to, show the following facts: (1) That in December, 1881, the defendants W. and A. Cook were the owners and in possession of certain hydraulic mines, reservoirs, water ditches, tools, etc., and were then indebted to L. Davidson and S. C. Peek and to the firm of Davidson & Peek, and for the purpose of securing said indebtedness executed a deed of all said property to L. Davidson and S. C. Peek, said deed being intended to operate as a mortgage. (2) That the Cooks continued at all the times mentioned in the case in possession of the property, and Davidson and Peek continued to hold the said deed. (3) That respondents were not at any time interested in working the mines, nor owned any property therein, and were not partners therein or in the working thereof. (4) That on August 3, 1882, L. Davidson and S. C. Peek entered into the written contract with W. and A. Cook which is set out in plaintiffs' complaint, and that said contract was continued in force and effect at all times mentioned in the complaint. (5, 6, 7) That W. and A. Cook continued to work said mines on their own account, and in doing so contracted with plaintiffs' assignors to furnish men to work upon the mines, and became indebted therefor to plaintiffs' assignors in the several sums alleged in the complaint, and that these claims were assigned to plaintiffs. (8) That said contracts for labor were not made with the knowledge or consent of respondents, and that respondents were not interested in the employment of the men. (9) That on August 7, 1884, the Cooks, pursuant to said written agreement, "cleaned up" from said mines the sum of $5,500 in gold dust, and delivered the same to L. Davidson and S. C. Peek pursuant to said agreement. The remainder of this finding is excepted to, viz. that it was never understood or agreed by Davidson and Peek, or either of them, at the time of the delivery of the gold dust, or at any other time, that the claims of plaintiffs' assignors, or any of said claims, should be paid out of said sum of $5,500, or out of said gold dust, "before the payment of any indebtedness owing to" respondents. (10) Finds the claims were duly assigned to plaintiffs. (11) That said labor and services were rendered at the special instance and request of the Cooks, and for their use and benefit; and that said W. and A. Cook are solely indebted therefor. (The italicized portion of this finding is specified as not supported by the evidence.) (12) This finding is to the effect that at the time of the delivery of the gold dust the Cooks were indebted to the respondents in a sum exceeding the value of it. (13) "That the said defendants L. Davidson and S. C. Peek, pursuant to said written agreement, applied the whole of the proceeds of said gold dust so received to the payment of said indebtedness due and owing to the said defendants L. Davidson and S. C. Peek, and defendant L. Davidson, and the firm of Davidson & Peek, as far as the same would go."

The agreement set out in the complaint, and made part of the fourth finding, provides that the grantees in said deed will reconvey upon payment of all promissory notes, obligations, and accounts of indebtedness which may be owing to respondents; and further provides that the second parties, W. and A. Cook, shall have the possession and management of the mines, water ditches, etc.; that the second parties agree to clean up the flumes and undercurrents in the mines once a month, and turn over to the first parties "the entire result of each clean-up" as soon as made, in default of which they shall surrender possession to the first parties; and that "the result of each clean-up shall apply to the defraying of the expense of running and working said mines, and the payment of said promissory notes, obligations, and accounts of indebtedness due said parties of the first part and the firm of Davidson & Peek. This agreement did not bind the first parties thereto absolutely or unconditionally to pay the expenses incurred by W. and A. Cook in operating the mines, but did bind them to do so to the extent of the proceeds of the same turned over to them. The mere fact that the Cooks employed labor and incurred debts therefor did not give the plaintiffs the right to sue upon the contract as an agreement made expressly for their benefit, as was correctly held upon the former appeal; but the delivery to respondents of the entire proceeds of the labor of plaintiffs' assignors, pursuant to the agreement, did give a right of action. If the operations of the mine had been wholly fruitless, no obligation could have arisen on the part of respondents to pay any part of plaintiffs' claim; but to the extent to which such proceeds came to their hands they became, under said agreement, trustees for all who furnished the labor by which it was produced. The liability of respondents does not rest solely upon the written agreement with W. and A. Cook. It did not create a liability against respondents to pay a pre-existing debt of the Cooks to the plaintiffs. If it had done so, an action in favor of plaintiffs would have lain immediately upon the agreement. There was nothing in the hands of respondents, at the date of the agreement, belonging to the Cooks, which in equity they were bound to pay or deliver to the plaintiffs, nor was there then existing any claim in favor of plaintiffs against the Cooks to which such promise to pay could relate. What, then, was that agreement, as read and construed in the light of the surrounding circumstances? The Cooks were the owners of the mines, and were largely indebted to respondents. They had conveyed to Davidson & Peek all their mining property, tools, etc., as security for that indebtedness. They were still in possession and desirous of operating their mines, but were without means to do so. Respondents agreed that the mines should be worked, but required that the entire proceeds of the work should be delivered to them, in order to secure the appropriation of whatever profits might result to the payment of the then existing indebtedness. But, if the Cooks should turn over to them all the gold produced, to be applied on the prior indebtedness, they would be without the means or ability to prosecute the work or pay the labor necessary to obtain the gold. Hence it was agreed that "the result of each clean-up stipulated shall apply to the defraying of the expenses of running and working said mines, and the payment of said promissory notes, obligations, and accounts of indebtedness due said parties of the first part and the firm of Davidson & Peek." It is contended that this agreement does not require that the proceeds of the work shall be "first applied" to the expenses, and that, therefore, respondents had the right to apply the proceeds to the payment of the prior indebtedness. But such construction casts a serious reflection upon both parties to the agreement. Upon the part of the Cooks, it is equivalent to saying that they were willing to employ laborers to work the mines, and produce gold, and apply the proceeds to the payment of their prior debts to respondents which were already secured by mortgage, knowing their utter inability to pay for that labor; and, so far as respondents are concerned, such construction would make them parties to the fraud, and enable them to profit from the unrewarded labor of those whose sweat they coined into gold to cancel the debt of another. Such construction does violence to the language they used, as well as to common honesty, and cannot be sustained. Respondents were to attend to the payment of the working expenses. The entire proceeds of the working of the mines was to be immediately delivered to them, and, if applied to expenses, could only be so applied by them. It is true, they did not become responsible for any of these expenses further than the proceeds might be sufficient to pay them; but to the extent required to pay such expenses they were not the owners of the gold dust, but trustees to convert it into money, and pay the expenses incurred in producing it. It is money which respondents have received, and which in equity and good conscience they were not entitled to retain, and for which an action for money had and received for plaintiffs' use would lie; and the second count of the complaint, though not in the form of the common count for money had and received, states facts which show such right. The labor was performed for the Cooks, to whom the gold belonged until it was delivered to respondents; and, as it was delivered for a specified purpose, the respondents could hold it for no other purpose. They did not become the owners of it, but were, under the agreement, the disbursing agents of the Cooks so far as it was required to defray the expenses of producing it. It was not necessary that respondents should have known of the employment of plaintiffs' assignors, or that they should have made an express promise to pay these plaintiffs or their assignors. In Lewis v. Sawyer, 44 Me. 337, the court, quoting from Hall v. Marston, 17 Mass. 575, said: "Whenever one man has in his hands the money of another, which he ought to pay over, he is liable to the action of money had and received, although he has never seen or heard of the party who has the right. When the fact is proved that he has the money, if he cannot show that he has a legal or equitable ground for retaining it, the law creates the privity and the promise." In Stoudt v. Hine, 45 Pa. St. 30, it was held that one in whose hands money is placed by a debtor for the payment of a debt is liable in an action for money had and received at the suit of the creditor to whom the payment was to have been made, and, as the defendant was liable as agent, rather than as surety, it was not necessary that his promise should be in writing. In Donkersley v. Levy, 38 Mich. 54, it was held that where an employer reserved a certain amount from the wages of his employes under an arrangement by which he was to pay their grocery accounts, but did not pay the grocers, the latter had an action against him for money had and received. In Pope v. Porter, 33 Fed. 7, the facts were that Cheney gave his promissory note for a certain sum to plaintiff, and secured the same by a chattel mortgage upon a lot of corn. The defendant bought the corn from Cheney, and agreed with him to pay the debt due Pope as part of the purchase price. Porter sold the corn, but did not pay the debt due from Cheney to Pope. Shiras, J., held that defendant was liable to Pope "for money had and received for the use and benefit of plaintiff, as well as upon the express promise to pay the debt as part of the purchase price." The supreme court of the United States, after conceding the general rule to be that privity of contract is necessary to the maintenance of the action of assumpsit, said: "But there are confessedly many exceptions to it. One of them, and by far the most frequent one, is the case where, under a contract between two persons, assets have come to the promisor's hands, or under his control, which in equity belong to a third party. In such a case it is held that the third person may sue in his own name. But then the suit is founded rather on the implied undertaking the law raises from the possession of the assets than on the express promise." Second Nat. Bank v. Grand Lodge, 98 U. S. 123. In McLaren v. Hutchinson, 18 Cal. 80, it was held that, where the defendant purchased land, and as a part of the consideration agreed to pay certain debts of the grantor, the creditor of the grantor could not maintain an action against the grantee for want of privity. But that case was overruled in Lewis v. Covillaud, 21 Cal. 189, and the latter case was approved in Lumber Co. v. Wagner, 67 Cal. 295, 7 Pac. 705.

The second count alleged that at the time the gold was delivered to respondents it was understood and agreed that plaintiffs' claims should be paid, while the latter part of the ninth finding is it was not then or at any time so agreed. The fourth finding, however, states the making of the written agreement, and that it was in force at the time the gold was delivered; and, as that agreement was that the proceeds of the mines should be applied to the payment of the expenses, it related directly to the delivery, and only became operative thereby. The agreement having been incorporated in the findings, the ninth finding, that there was no agreement as alleged is simply a misconstruction of the written agreement, and an erroneous conclusion of law. That part of the eleventh finding which states that W. and A. Cook are solely indebted to the plaintiffs is an erroneous conclusion of law when considered in connection with the facts stated in the other findings; and the same remark applies to that part of the thirteenth finding which says that the whole of the proceeds delivered to respondents was applied to the indebtedness of the Cooks to them, "pursuant to the agreement." The agreement being in writing, and before the court, whether the delivery was pursuant to the agreement is a conclusion of law. The conflicting oral evidence given in relation to the way in which the agreement was intended to be or was understood or interpreted by the parties to it cannot affect it.

It does not appear from the pleadings or findings what the entire expense of producing this gold was, nor whether any expenses were incurred other than that of the plaintiffs; but from the evidence contained in the record it appears without any conflict that the gold dust produced was slightly less than the expense of producing it, and that $1,702.94 was applied to the payment of the prior indebtedness of W. and A. Cook to the respondents. As the money paid out on account of expenses was paid to many persons who are not parties to the action, and most of it paid in advance of the receipt of the gold dust by respondents, an accurate adjustment would be impossible, and that substantial justice will be done by ordering judgment for plaintiffs for the amount applied to the prior indebtedness. We therefore advise that the judgment and order appealed from be reversed.

We concur: SEARLS, C.; BELCHER, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, it is ordered that the judgment and order appealed from be reversed, and a new trial granted.

BLYTHE v. AYERS et al. (two cases. Nos. 15,411, 15,528).[1]

(Supreme Court of California. April 24, 1894.)

New Trial—Appeal—Question for Trial Court—Legitimation of Bastard.

1. In a proceeding to determine heirship, parties who do not except to or attack a finding that they are not akin to decedent are not "parties aggrieved" within Code Civ. Proc. §§ 657, 938, providing that, for enumerated causes, a new trial shall be granted on the application of the party aggrieved, and that such party may appeal in certain cases.

2. Where, on an issue whether plaintiff was decedent's child, her mother testified positively that she was, and to facts which, if true, showed that she could not have been mistaken, and, on the other hand, there were circumstances tending to show that the story of plaintiff's mother was improbable, it was for the trial court to determine whether her statements were to be believed.

3. Plaintiff's putative father was at all times domiciled in California, her mother at all times domiciled in England, and plaintiff was born in England, and resided there continuously till her father's death. Held that, as the father was domiciled in California both at the time of her birth and at the time he performed acts alleged to have resulted in her legitimation, and as California laws authorize the legitimation of bastards by the doing of certain acts, plaintiff was at all times possessed of capacity for legitimation under Civ. Code, § 230. 31 Pac. 915, affirmed.

4. Where plaintiff's putative father, who was never married, on all occasions declared her to be his, acknowledged her paternity, had her christened by his name, and corresponded with her as his daughter, and furnished her a fixed sum yearly, and made a will providing for her, which was subsequently lost or destroyed, his acts constituted a full adoption and legitimation, within Code, § 230. 31 Pac. 915, affirmed.

5. Where a putative father wrote and signed letters, in the presence of a competent witness, to the child, addressing her as "my darling child," and signing himself "From your loving father," and also wrote to her grandfather with reference to having her christened in his name, he acknowledges himself to be her father within Civ. Code, § 1387, providing that every illegitimate child is an heir of any person who, in writing signed in the presence of a competent witness, acknowledges himself to be its father. 31 Pac. 915, affirmed.

6. A contention that the court did not specifically find that at the precise times when the father read and signed the letters acknowledging himself to be plaintiff's father, in the presence of the witness, such witness was "competent," is without merit where the letters were written in witness' presence June 15, 1881, and April 3, 1883, and the court found specifically that on February 25, 1883, witness was a competent witness.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; J. V. Coffey, Judge.

Proceeding by Florence Blythe against Ayers and others to establish her right to the estate of Thomas H. Blythe, deceased. From a judgment for plaintiff, and from an order denying a new trial, the Blythe Company appeals. Affirmed.

For prior report, see 31 Pac. 915.

Geo. W. Towle, Jr., D. M. Delmas, Timothy J. Lyons, J. C. Campbell, and S. W. & E. B. Holladay, for appellant. W. H. H. Hart, Garber, Boalt & Bishop, Thos. J. Bergin, W. W. Foote, and Henry I. Kowalsky, for respondent.

McFARLAND, J. No. 15,411 is an appeal by the Blythe Company, a corporation, from a judgment rendered in favor of the respondent, Florence Blythe; and No. 15,528 is an appeal from an order denying a motion for a new trial in the same case. Both appeals are here considered and determined. A number of other appeals, taken by various other defendants, were argued and submitted at the time of the argument and submission of said appeals, Nos. 15,411 and 15,528; and said other appeals will follow, and be determined by the conclusions arrived at in this present opinion.

[1] Affirmed on rehearing. See 36 Pac. 844.

The proceeding upon which these appeals arose was instituted and prosecuted to judgment by the respondent, Florence Blythe, under the provisions of section 1664 of the Code of Civil Procedure, to establish her right to the estate of Thomas H. Blythe, deceased. Nearly 200 defendants appeared claiming to be collateral kin of the said decedent, Thomas H. Blythe, and, as said kin, entitled to his estate. They were mostly associated in certain groups, as the "Williams" claimants, the "Jones" claimants, the "London Savage" claimants, the "Gipsy" claimants, etc. Their claims to heirship were mostly inconsistent with and hostile to each other; each group contending that the deceased, Thomas H. Blythe, was descended from parents different from those alleged by either of the other groups. The court found that the respondent, Florence Blythe, was the daughter and heir of the deceased. It also found that the Williams claimants were related to the deceased as alleged in their answer, and "that none of the defendants herein, other than those named and enumerated in finding number 18, was, nor is any of them, in anywise related to, or in any manner akin to, said Thomas H. Blythe, deceased." The Williams claimants appealed from the judgment, and brought up the evidence in a bill of exceptions; and their appeal has been heretofore disposed of by this court. See Blythe v. Ayres, 96 Cal. 532, 31 Pac. 915. The opinions there delivered make an extended statement of the case here unnecessary.

We do not deem it necessary to pass upon the contention of respondent that appellant's notice of appeal should have been served on all the parties to the proceeding. Neither is it necessary to pass upon the contention that, as appellant was allowed to appear in the Williams appeal, and did file an argument therein, it is bound by the decision on that appeal.

But, on these present appeals, respondent contends that the appellant, the Blythe Company, who was substituted for the Jones claimants, is not a "party aggrieved," and therefore has no standing as an appellant, because it did not except to, and does not attack, the said findings 18 and 20; and that the fact being established and unassailed that none of the defendants except the Williams claimants are "in any wise related to, or in any manner akin to, said Thomas H. Blythe, deceased," the appellant is in no position to inquire about any errors which the trial court may have committed in arriving at the conclusion that respondent is the rightful heir, and entitled to the estate. Appellant's predecessors based their right to contest for the estate upon their certain alleged kinship to the deceased; but, when it appears by an unchallenged finding that there is no such kinship, what, asks the respondent, does it matter to appellant where the estate goes, and how can it be prejudiced or aggrieved by any ruling made by the court in favor of another claimant? We confess that we can see no successful answer to this contention. Section 1664 was clearly intended to provide the means by which, where there are hostile claimants to an estate, all the conflicting rights thereto may be summarily and finally determined in one proceeding. In re Burton, 93 Cal. 461, 29 Pac. 36. The first step in the proceeding is taken by a claimant filing a petition (not a complaint), "praying the court to ascertain and declare the rights of all persons to said estate, and all interests therein, and to whom distribution thereof should be made." Thereupon the court is to make an order that notice be served on all persons "interested in said estate" to appear on a day named, in which notice shall be set forth, among other things, "the names of all who may have appeared claiming any interest in said estate in the course of the administration of the same up to the time of the making of said order, and such other persons as the court may direct; * * * and requiring all persons named, or not named, having or claiming any interest in the estate of said decedent, * * * to appear and exhibit, as hereinafter provided, their respective claims of heirship, ownership or interest in said estate to said court;" and, upon proof of service of the notice, "the court shall thereupon acquire jurisdiction to ascertain and determine the heirship, ownership and interest of all parties in and to the property of said deceased, and such determination shall be final and conclusive in the administration of said estate, and the title and ownership of said property." All persons desiring to appear shall, within the time limited, "file their written appearance;" and, after the expiration of the time, the court shall enter an order adjudging the default of all persons not appearing. Within 20 days thereafter, "any of such persons so appearing" may file his complaint, "setting forth the facts constituting his claim of heirship, ownership or interest in said estate with such reasonable particularity as the court may require;" and it must be served on the other parties appearing. "The party filing the petition as aforesaid, if he file a complaint, and if not, the party first filing the complaint, shall, in all subsequent proceedings, be treated as the plaintiff therein, and all other parties so appearing shall be treated as the defendants in said proceedings; and all such defendants shall set forth in their respective answers the facts constituting their claim of heirship, ownership or interest in said estate with such particularity as the court may require, and serve a copy thereof on the plaintiff." It is further provided, in terms, that "the court shall determine the heirship to said deceased, the ownership of his estate, and the interest of each respective claimant therein or thereto, and persons entitled to distribution thereof, and the final determination of the court thereupon shall be final and conclusive in the distribution of said estate, and in regard to the title to all the property of the estate of said deceased." It is further provided that questions which have not been determined under the provisions of said section 1664 may be raised on final distribution; "but where such questions shall have been litigated under the provisions of this section, the determination thereof as herein provided shall be conclusive in the distribution of said estate." It will be observed that while, of the "parties appearing," the one who chooses to proceed first and file a complaint is, for convenience, to "be treated" as plaintiff, and the others as defendants, the provision as to what the pleading of each party—whether plaintiff or a defendant—is to contain is exactly the same. The plaintiff is to file a complaint "setting forth the facts constituting his claim of heirship, ownership or interest in said estate with such reasonable particularity as the court may require." And the defendants "shall set forth in their respective answers the facts constituting their claim of heirship, ownership or interest in said estate with such particularity as the court may require." It is clear, therefore, that the alleged right of each party, whether nominally a plaintiff or defendant, is as much before the court for final adjudication as is the alleged right of either of the other parties; and it is the plain duty of the court to determine the alleged claim of each party to the proceeding. No party has a standing in the trial court unless he has averred "his claim of heirship," etc., and has set forth the facts constituting such claim; and he would not be there heard to contest the right of another claimant, if he did not set up any right in himself. But the appellant occupies the same position in this court that it would have occupied in the court below if it had there undertaken to contest the right of respondent, or of any other claimant, without averring any right in itself. The predecessors of appellant acquired a status in the court below by averring a claim to the estate founded upon a certain alleged kinship to the deceased; but the court having found that there was no such kinship, and that finding not being controverted, the appellant has no status here. Having no "claim of heirship, ownership or interest in the said estate," the appellant is not a "party aggrieved" within the meaning of sections 657 and 938 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and is not prejudiced by any ruling or judgment made or rendered touching the rights of respondent or of any other claimant.

The foregoing views are determinative of these two appeals against the appellant; but, as it is claimed in one or two of the other appeals which are to be determined by this opinion that sufficient exceptions were there taken to said findings 18 and 20, we will notice some of the other points argued by counsel for the various appellants. Very powerful arguments are made to the point that the evidence is insufficient to warrant the finding that respondent is the child of the decedent. These arguments were, no doubt, presented in all their force by the very able counsel to the learned judge of the trial court. The question here now is not whether the judge of that court weighed the evidence with absolute accuracy, and arrived at the only conclusion justly possible, —the same conclusion to which any other judge or jury would have been forced to come. The question is, was there such a manifest conflict of material evidence on the point as threw the determination of the fact, under the established rule, entirely within the province of the trial judge? It is needless to cite here the numerous decisions of this court to the point that we cannot disturb a finding of fact by a jury or trial judge which is the result of the consideration of evidence that is really and materially conflicting. Of course, we have in a few instances set aside a finding when, in our judgment, the apparent conflict of evidence was not substantial; but in Field v. Shorb, 99 Cal. 666, 34 Pac. 504, where we went as far in that direction as, perhaps, in any other case, we said that a finding should not be disturbed, whatever we might think of the preponderance of the evidence, "where there is presented a fair, reasonable ground for a difference of opinion, and where a conclusion either way could not be considered as the necessary result of an unsound judgment." The point now under discussion comes within that rule. It cannot be fairly said that there was no substantial evidence upon which to rest the conclusion of the court below. We do not propose here to notice the evidence in detail. It is sufficient for the purpose in view to say that the mother of respondent testified positively that respondent is the child of the decedent, and testified to facts which, if true, show that she could not have been mistaken as to such paternity; and that the decedent, who had several months' opportunity to observe her surroundings and conduct after his first sexual relations with her, was satisfied that respondent was his child. Counsel for appellant marshal a mass of circumstances from which they argue, no doubt with a great deal of force, the improbability of the story of respondent's mother; but, after all, the argument is merely the array of improbabilities, not conclusive, against the direct statements of a living witness, who could not be mistaken as to the main facts to which she testified. Whether or not, under the circumstances, her statements should be believed, was just such a question as the law leaves with the trial judge. With him was the power, and upon him rests the responsibility. The foregoing views also apply to the contention that there is not sufficient evidence that certain letters of the decedent were written and signed in the presence of the witness W. H. H. Hart. Hart testified to the fact; and it would be going beyond all precedent for us to hold here that he should not have been believed by the trial judge. It is to be observed, also, that the motions for new trials now pending here on appeal were denied in the lower court long after the decision of this court in Blythe v. Ayres had been rendered, which placed respondent's right upon section 1387, and was dependent, of course, upon the finding of the lower court on that point, based on the testimony of said Hart.

With respect to the two main propositions of law in the case, to wit, (1) was respondent adopted by the decedent under section 230 of the Civil Code? and (2) did decedent constitute her his heir under section 1387 of said Code? we do not desire to add anything to what was said in the opinions delivered in Blythe v. Ayres, 96 Cal. 532, 31 Pac. 915. Those questions were as elaborately argued in that case as in the present appeals, and were there most carefully considered by the court. Nothing has occurred since to shake our confidence in the correctness of the decision in that case.

We need not consider the elaborate arguments of counsel to the point that the complaint does not state facts sufficient to show an adoption of respondent under section 230. As to that question the justices of the court were divided in opinion at the time of the decision of Blythe v. Ayres, and there is still a division of opinion upon that subject. Indeed, it is doubtful whether, under the peculiar language of section 1664, strict rules of pleading apply to the proceeding instituted by that section. But all the justices qualified to act in the case agree, as all the justices acting in Blythe v. Ayres then agreed, that respondent is the heir of the decedent under section 1387.

The only new point made as to respondent's heirship, under section 1387, is that the court did not specifically find that at the precise times when the decedent read and signed the letters acknowledging himself to be the father of respondent, in the presence of W. H. H. Hart, the said Hart was a "competent witness." The letters were written in Hart's presence on June 15, 1881, October 21, 1881, May 16, 1882, and April 3, 1883; and the court did find, specifically, that intermediate those times, viz. on February 25, 1883, said Hart was a competent witness. The said W. H. H. Hart is mentioned a great many times in the record. He was a witness in the case, and an attorney of record. In each of the findings about the writing of the letters in his presence the court finds that "said W. H. H. Hart * * * was not by said Blythe called upon to witness the writing of the same, and said Hart did not attest the same as a subscribing witness thereto;" but there is no intimation that he was not a competent witness. It is hardly possible to imagine a court gravely making such a finding, if Hart had not been considered a sane human being, over 10 years of age. If we were to order any further finding on the subject, it is evident that the finding would have to be the same as the one relating to the date of February 25, 1883, in favor of his competency. Indeed, we see no substantial merit in the point.

There is also submitted, with the others, an appeal of Alice Edith from the judgment, but that appeal presents no new points. There was also a brief filed by leave of court, on behalf of the state, claiming an escheat of the Blythe estate. But if the state could be heard at all on this appeal, to which it is not a party, its contention is covered by the foregoing views. There are no other points presented in the briefs and arguments which call for special attention.

In the appeal No. 15,411 the judgment is affirmed, and in the appeal No. 15,528 the order denying a motion for a new trial is affirmed.

(No. 18,200.)

SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE—UNRECORDED DEED—DELIVERY.

1. Where a contract of sale of land was taken to two persons, but the deed ran to one only, who, for the purposes of a manufacturing company controlled by him, and operating in connection with the land, conveyed to the company, and took back a deed to himself and the other owner, which was not recorded, a purchaser from such other can enforce specific performance and partition against the company and its controlling member.

2. Delivery of a deed to one of two joint purchasers is a delivery to both.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Fresno county; M. K. Harris, Judge.

Suit by M. D. Eshelman against the Henrietta Vineyard Company and G. H. Malter for specific performance; consolidated with a suit between the same parties for partition, and a suit by the company and Malter against I. S. and M. D. Eshelman for ejectment. Judgment for the Eshelmans. The company and Malter appeal in each case. Affirmed.

Edward Lynch, for appellants. Tupper & Tupper, for respondents.

PATERSON, J. The appeals in these three cases all rest upon the same statement of facts. Action 3,180 is for the specific performance of a contract to sell certain lands. No. 3,593 is for the partition of 14.46 acres of land, which embraces the 8.06 acres for which specific performance is sought. No. 3,653 is an action brought by the corporation and Malter to eject the plaintiff in the first action from the possession of the same 14.46 acres of land. In Eshelman v. Vineyard Co. (No. 18,018, this day filed) 36 Pac. 775, M. D. Eshelman appealed from that portion of the judgment entered in the court below denying her prayer for specific performance. In No. 3,180 the defendants on this appeal attack a part of the same decree on the ground that there is no evidence to show that the respondent became the owner of an undivided one-half interest in the land, as found by the court below. In addition to the facts stated in Eshelman v. Vineyard Co. (No. 18,018), the court below found the following: The board of directors of the vineyard company consisted of five persons, of whom Malter was one. The latter was president of the corporation, and owner of all the capital stock except a small amount, which he furnished to four other persons to enable them to qualify and act as directors. These persons were controlled in their action entirely by the wishes of Malter. By direction of Malter the corporation sold and conveyed the 14.46 acres of land described in the complaint to Malter and Rogers, the deed being executed to them on or about January 21, 1886. The deed was thereafter kept by Malter among his private effects, and was never recorded. Rogers conveyed to the plaintiff on April 1, 1891. As conclusions of law, the court found that the plaintiff was not entitled to judgment for specific performance, because estopped by the acceptance of the deed from said corporation of January 21, 1886, but that she became, by the transfer to her of Rogers' title, a tenant in common with defendant Malter in said 14.46 acres of land, and the owner of an undivided interest therein. The court also found that the vineyard company had no title or interest in said tract of land, but that the defendants should be compelled to perfect title in plaintiff to said undivided half interest, and that said corporation and Malter should be required to execute proper instruments necessary to show of record that the title transferred by the corporation to Malter and Rogers had been, as to said Rogers' interest, vested in the plaintiff.

It is contended by the appellants that the evidence is insufficient to support the findings of fact and the conclusions of law as to the title and interest of E. B. Rogers in the winery tract, regardless of the question whether that tract is composed of 14.46 acres, as described in the deed, or of 7.04 acres, as contended for by respondent; but we have carefully examined the evidence, and think there is sufficient to sustain the decision. It tended to show that Malter and Rogers were joint owners, and that the vineyard company was used as a means to the more successful operation of the winery plant. Malter was the owner of practically all the stock of the corporation, and its officers were, in fact, simply his agents. He put the legal title of the property in the name of the corporation as a matter of convenience. The contract of purchase from Chapman in 1881 was in the name of both Malter and Rogers, but the deed was taken in the name of Malter alone. The latter claimed that Rogers was to pay for his interest out of the profits of the firm, but that he never did so, having greatly overdrawn his account; but it was for the court to say, on all the circumstances, whether this was so. There is evidence of acts and declarations by Malter showing that Rogers and himself were joint owners. It is unnecessary for us to recount them here. Some of them are specified in respondents' brief, and, in view of the circumstances showing the real relation of the parties to the corporation, we think that the evidence was admissible.

Being joint owners, the delivery of the deed to Malter was a delivery to both.

Upon the evidence, findings, and stipulations of counsel, we think the judgments in all the cases should be affirmed, and it is so ordered.

SAWYER v. COLGAN, Controller. (No. 18,068.)[1]

STATE BONDS—APPROVAL OF STATE EXAMINERS—LIMITATIONS—INTEREST.

1. State bonds and coupons issued under a statute directing their payment, and providing a fund for that purpose, need not be presented to the state board of examiners for approval, as they are not claims within the meaning of Pol. Code, § 672, prohibiting the controller from drawing warrants for claims until approved by such board.

2. Under St. 1852, p. 59, authorizing an issue of bonds to pay expenses of expeditions against the Indians, bonds and coupons were issued, payable at the office of the state treasurer in 10 years, "provided the same be not sooner paid from funds anticipated in said act to be derived from the government of the United States." Congress did appropriate money to pay these bonds, but provided for payment at the national treasury, and imposed certain reasonable conditions, to prevent imposition and fraud. Held, that the liability of the state of California was contingent upon the failure of congress to provide for the payment of such bonds, and, congress having provided for their payment, the state never became liable thereon.

3. Under Act Feb. 15, 1851, §§ 1, 7, authorizing a loan to pay expense of Indian wars, and providing that any money in the treasury not otherwise appropriated is set apart for the payment of such bonds and coupons, bonds were issued maturing in 10 years. From their maturity until 1889 there was never any money in the treasury which had not been appropriated for some specific purpose prior to its receipt by the treasurer. Held, that as the bonds were payable out of a particular fund, which was not provided until 1889, the statute did not commence to run against such bonds and coupons until that time. De Haven and Harrison, JJ., dissenting.

4. Civ. Code, § 1917, providing that debts shall bear interest, does not apply to indebtedness of the state, and the state is not liable to pay interest on its debts, unless it has contracted to do so.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Sacramento county; A. P. Catlin, Judge.

Application by Sawyer for a writ of mandate commanding Colgan, as controller of the state, to issue a warrant upon the treasury for the payment of a certain bond and coupons. From a judgment denying the writ, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

W. C. Belcher and Geo. E. Bates, for appellant. Wm. H. H. Hart, Atty. Gen., and Barham & Bolton, for respondent.

PATERSON, J. The appellant applied to the court below for a writ of mandate, commanding the respondent, as controller of the state, to issue a warrant upon the state treasury for the amount claimed to be due on a certain bond and on certain coupons. Judgment was entered denying the prayer of the petitioner, and from that judgment he has appealed to this court.

[1] For memorandum amending opinion, see 36 Pac. 834.

The bond mentioned was issued July 15, 1854, under an act approved May 3, 1852 (St. 1852, p. 59), authorizing the state treasurer to issue bonds to an amount not exceeding $600,000, for the payment of the expenses of certain expeditions against the Indians. Bonds to the full amount authorized by the act were issued, and made payable May 2, 1862, with annual interest coupons attached. It was stipulated in the bonds that they should be payable at the office of the state treasurer, "provided the same be not sooner paid from funds anticipated in said act to be derived from the government of the United States, with interest at the rate of seven per cent. per annum, payable at the state treasurer's office on the surrender of the annexed coupons on the 1st day of January, A. D. 1853, and annually thereafter." Some of the coupons presented were attached to this bond; others were detached from other bonds issued under the same act, and the remainder were detached from bonds issued under the act of February 15, 1851, hereinafter referred to. It is claimed by the respondent that the bonds and coupons are not audited claims, and that the controller, by the provisions of section 672, Pol. Code, is prohibited from drawing his warrant for such claim until it has been approved by the state board of examiners; but, after careful consideration of all the provisions of the Code, and the decisions bearing upon the subject, we are satisfied that the point is not well taken. Meyer v. Porter, 65 Cal. 67, 2 Pac. 884; Freehill v. Chamberlain, 65 Cal. 603, 4 Pac. 646. Section 1 of the act of 1852 (St. 1852, p. 59) reads as follows: "Section 1. A sum not exceeding six hundred thousand dollars is hereby appropriated and set apart as an additional war fund, payable in ten years out of any money which may be appropriated by congress to defray the expenses incurred by the state of California, and interest thereon at the rate of seven per cent. per annum, in the suppression of Indian hostilities, or out of the proceeds of the sale of any public lands which may be donated or set aside by congress for that purpose; and should no such appropriation or donation be made, or if an amount sufficient should not be appropriated or donated within the said ten years, then the bonds authorized to be issued by this act shall be good and valid claims against the state, and shall be paid out of any moneys in the treasury not otherwise appropriated to pay the expenses of the expeditions mentioned in this act." We think it clear that the liability of the state upon the bonds thus provided for was conditional; they were conditioned upon the failure of congress to make an appropriation to pay them. Upon the failure of congress to do so, and not before, were they to become good and valid claims against the state. They were to be paid within 10 years; and, if congress within that time made no appropriation to pay them, they were to be paid out of money in the state treasury not otherwise appropriated. Congress did make an appropriation to pay these bonds. Section 9 of the act of congress of August 5, 1854, provided as follows: "Section 9. And it is further enacted that the secretary of war be and he is hereby authorized and directed to examine into and ascertain the amount of expenses incurred and now actually paid by the state of California in the suppression of Indian hostilities within the said state prior to the first day of January, A. D. 1854, and that the amount of such expenses when so ascertained be paid into the treasury of said state; provided, that the sum so paid shall not exceed in amount the sum of $924,259.65; which amount is hereby appropriated out of any money in the treasury not otherwise appropriated." But it is said that subsequent acts of congress imposed conditions which were not in any way binding on the bondholders, and that in any event the condition was not complied with until the funds provided by the act of congress were paid into the state treasury.

Neither of these contentions we think is sound. Section 8 of the act of congress passed August 18, 1856, provides: "That the secretary of war is hereby authorized and directed to pay to the holders of war bonds of the state of California the amount of money appropriated by act of congress, approved May (August), 1854, in payment of expenses incurred and now actually paid by said state of California for the suppression of Indian hostilities within the said state prior to the first day of January, A. D. 1854, under the following restrictions and regulations: Before any bonds shall be redeemed by the secretary of war they shall be presented to the board of commissioners, appointed by the legislature of said state by an act approved April 19, 1856, and the amount due and payable on each bond will be endorsed thereon by said commissioners. Upon presentation to the secretary of war of any bond or bonds thus indorsed, it shall be his duty to draw his warrant in favor of the holder or holders thereof for the amount certified to be due upon the same by said commissioners, upon the secretary of the treasury, who is hereby directed to pay the same; provided, that said amounts in the aggregate shall not exceed the amount of money appropriated by the act of congress approved August 5, 1854. Said bonds, after redemption, and after taking off the coupons that remain unpaid, shall be delivered to the secretary of war to be canceled." The conditions therein provided were not unreasonable, but were merely such precautionary measures against imposition and fraud as congress had a right to take. The act of May 3, 1852, contemplated action on the part of congress, and the bondholders must have known when they accepted the bond that, if congress made an appropriation to pay it, some safeguard would be provided to prevent fraud and imposition. Furthermore, by an act passed June 23, 1860 (12 St. p. 104, § 4), congress provided as follows: "That the secretary of war be and he is hereby authorized to pay out of the unexpended balance of appropriation for the war debt of the state of California, made by the last section of the act approved August 5, 1854, entitled 'An act making appropriation for the support of the army for the year ending the 30th of June, 1855,' any outstanding and unpaid bonds, and coupons issued by said state for said war debt prior to the passage of said act, but bearing date subsequent to the 1st day of January, 1854; provided, that no payment shall be made beyond the unexpended balance of said appropriation now remaining in the treasury." This act was passed about two years prior to the maturity of the bond in suit. There is no additional condition imposed therein, and we are unable to see why the amount of petitioner's bond and coupons could not have been collected out of this unexpended balance. It is not sufficient answer to say that this balance was insufficient to pay all the outstanding bonds and coupons; it is enough to know that petitioner's bonds and coupons would have been paid if they had been presented at the proper time. Prior to the passage of this last act referred to there had been presented, and paid by the United States, bonds and coupons amounting to the sum of $914,071.02. Again, on July 25, 1868, congress passed an act (15 St. p. 175) "To reappropriate an unexpended balance of an appropriation made by an act approved August 5, 1854, to refund to the state of California expenses incurred in suppressing Indian hostilities, said balance having lapsed and been covered into the treasury on the 30th day of June, 1863, $10,183.63; provided, that nothing shall be paid except subject to existing provisions of law, and upon the finding and certificate of the third auditor that the same is actually due." From June 23, 1860, therefore, down to the time the unexpended balance lapsed into the treasury, this amount, $10,183.63, was in the treasury, and applicable to the payment of bond 420 and the coupons mentioned in section 4 of the act. Eight years later that amount was reappropriated. See, also, 21 St. p. 510. Bond No. 420 was dated July 15, 1854. The coupons taken from said bond and others issued under the act of May 3, 1852, were all for interest, which became due at least a year subsequent to January 1, 1854. If any of these obligations were not paid by reason of erroneous rulings on the part of the officers of the departments, it is sufficient to say that the result is not due to any fault of the state or its officers. The latter have a right to rely upon the acts of congress. The condition upon which the state was to be liable has not arisen. The act of 1852 did not stipulate that the bonds would be paid by the state, if the money appropriated by congress was not paid into the state treasury. The construction contended for is too strict. The act appropriates such moneys as congress may appropriate to defray the expenses incurred, without stating the manner of appropriation which might be adopted by congress. The state acquiesced in the action of congress, and recognized the propriety of the method chosen for the payment of the claims by appointing commissioners to represent the state and exhibit the vouchers required. It cannot be claimed in reason that congress, with the duty resting upon it to pay the expenses, had not the right to scrutinize the claim and to take reasonable precautions against the fraudulent demands. The bond on its face provides for payment by the state, "provided the same be not sooner paid from funds anticipated in said act to be derived from the government of the United States." It was understood that congress might pay the money over to the state, and in that event the bonds would be payable at the office of the state treasurer, but it was not unreasonable to suppose, and such was anticipated, doubtless, that the demands should be made payable by congress at the national treasury. It was the duty of the general government under the constitution to defend the states from invasion or insurrection, and when the state of California found it necessary to raise funds in order to defend itself, the general government became in duty bound to reimburse the state for the cost of such defense. The state, however, recognized its obligation to pay those who had enlisted in its defense, if the general government failed to discharge its obligation to the state. Therefore, it was provided that, if congress did not within 10 years make provision for the payment of the bonds, the state would pay them. Our conclusion is that the state of California never became liable to pay bond 420 or its coupons, or any of the coupons of bonds issued under the act of 1852.

The question as to the liability of the state upon the coupons of bonds issued under the act of 1851 is not so clear. Sections 1 and 7 of that act read as follows: "Section 1. By virtue of the power given to the legislature by the constitution of this state—article VIII.; 'in case of war to repel invasion or suppress insurrection'—a loan not exceeding five hundred thousand dollars is hereby authorized to be negotiated upon the faith and credit of the state, payable in ten years, and at any period after five years, at the pleasure of the state; said loan to pay a rate of interest not exceeding twelve per cent. per annum, payable annually or semiannually, at such place as the contracting parties may agree; provided, however, that the interest of the first year may be paid in advance out of the loan thus made." "Sec. 7. Any claim which this state has now, or may hereafter have, upon the general government for moneys expended out of this loan, for the purposes aforesaid, shall be and the same is hereby set apart and pledged for the payment of the principal and interest accruing upon said bonds, together with all other moneys in the treasury not otherwise appropriated, or so much thereof as may be necessary." Respondent claims that, if the act provided for an appropriation to pay the bonds and coupons therein referred to, which is denied, then, it having been shown that there has been at all times since the maturity of the coupons in suit in the general fund sufficient money with which to pay these coupons, the action is barred by the statute of limitations. But the court found that "from 1862 to 1889, both inclusive, there was not in any year any surplus in the general fund in the state treasury, in excess of appropriations for current expenses, and special appropriations for particular purposes for that year," and we know from the public records that in every year, except 1889, since the obligations in suit matured, there has been levied upon the property of the state an amount equal to, and specifically appropriated by the legislature for, the expenses of the state during the fiscal year for which the tax was levied. There has never been, prior to the year 1890, any money in the state treasury which had not been appropriated by the legislature to some specific purpose for the support of the state government prior to the time of its receipt by the state treasurer. The findings show that in 1890, for the first time, a surplus of about $500,000 was received into the state treasury. Prior to that time the petitioner never could have maintained a mandate for the payment of his coupons, and, this being so, of course the statute of limitations is no bar to the proceeding. The words of the act, "not otherwise appropriated," cannot be taken to mean "not heretofore otherwise appropriated." The bonds were not to mature until the expiration of 10 years, or at the option of the state after 5 years. It was intended that the obligations provided for by the act should be payable out of any money which should at their maturity or thereafter be found in the state treasury, and which at the time it reached the treasury had not been appropriated to some other purpose. Humbert v. Dunn, 84 Cal. 57, 24 Pac. 211. Sufficient funds must be reserved to defray the expenses of the government,—the ordinary expenses of the legislative, executive, and judicial departments of the state. Respondent claims that interest is one of the expenses of the state as much as salaries of the judges, the governor, and other state officers, and cites in support of the proposition In re Appropriation by General Assembly, 13 Colo. 316, 22 Pac. 464; but the constitution of that state, in providing for the necessary appropriations to defray the expenses of the executive, legislative, and judicial departments of the state government for each fiscal year, expressly includes "interest on any valid public debt," and the case cited is authority in support of the proposition that the appropriations to defray the expenses of the government for a particular fiscal year are entitled to preference over any other appropriations from the general public revenue of the state, without reference to the dates of their passage. It is a general rule that when payment is provided for out of a particular fund, or in a particular way, the debtor cannot plead the statute of limitations without showing that the particular fund has been provided or the method pursued. 1 Wood, Lim. (2d Ed.) p. 363; County of Lincoln v. Luning, 133 U. S. 529, 10 Sup. Ct. 363; Underhill v. Trustees, 17 Cal. 172; Freehill v. Chamberlain, supra. No provision was made by the state for the payment of these bonds until the year 1889, and we are of the opinion, therefore, that the statute did not begin to run against the bonds or coupons until that time. If the petitioner had presented his coupons for payment prior to that time, his demand would have been refused on the ground that there were no funds. He could not sue the state, because there never was any act authorizing him to sue. "His remedy—if remedy it may be called—still lay in the voluntary exercise of the taxing power of the state. In other words, the state, by reason of her sovereignty, still held control of the question of payment as to all its incidents of time, mode, and measure." Sharp v. Contra Costa Co., 34 Cal. 284; Rose v. Estudillo, 39 Cal. 275; People v. Miles, 56 Cal. 401.

It is contended by the appellant that his bonds and coupons bear interest from the time of their maturity until payment; but section 1917 of the Civil Code, cited, does not apply to an indebtedness of the state, and the state is not liable to pay interest on its debts, unless its consent to do so has been manifested by an act of its legislature, or some lawful contract of its executive officers. U. S. v. North Carolina, 136 U. S. 211, 10 Sup. Ct. 920; Carr v. State, 127 Ind. 204, 26 N. E. 778. In mandamus the controller can be required to draw his warrant only for what is expressly authorized by the statute. Auditorial Board v. Arles, 15 Tex. 72; Davis v. Porter, 66 Cal. 658, 13 Pac. 874, Davis v. Yuba Co., 75 Cal. 452, 13 Pac. 874, and 17 Pac. 533, was an action brought to recover the sum of $5,600 and interest; it was not a case of mandate. The appropriation made by the act of 1851 was not repealed by the act of 1852, as claimed by respondent. The latter act expressly provides that "the repeal in no wise affects the war loan bonds already issued under the provisions of the act so repealed." In view of what has been said, it is unnecessary to consider the contention of the respondent that the act of 1852 is unconstitutional because it created a debt or liability against the state exceeding the limit provided for in article 8, Const. 1849, and it is not claimed that the act of 1851 is unconstitutional on that or any other ground.

We think that petitioner is entitled to a warrant for payment of the coupons issued under the act of 1851, but is not entitled to a warrant for the payment of bond No. 420, or any of the coupons issued under the act of 1852. The judgment is reversed, with directions to the court below to issue a peremptory writ of mandate to respondent, commanding him to draw his warrant upon the state treasurer, payable out of the general fund, in favor of petitioner, for the sum of $1,800, and to further adjudge that petitioner herein recover from the defendant the costs of this proceeding.

We concur: McFARLAND, J.; FITZGERALD, J.; GAROUTTE, J.

DE HAVEN and HARRISON, JJ. We dissent from the judgment because, in our opinion, the only appropriation made by the act of February 15, 1851, for the payment of the bonds issued thereunder was such money not otherwise appropriated as might be in the state treasury at the date of the maturity of such bonds. Upon all the other points which it discusses we fully concur in the foregoing opinion of Mr. Justice PATERSON.

BLANCHARD v. PACIFIC ROLLING-MILL CO. (No. 15,430.)

(Supreme Court of California. April 24, 1894.)

Goods Sold to Arrive by Ship — Delivery at Purchaser's Wharf — Delay — Liability for Expenses.

Where plaintiff sold to defendant iron, to arrive by a certain ship, then on her way,—the iron to be delivered at defendant's wharf, and received by him, as discharged,—defendant is liable to plaintiff for the necessary charges paid by him for the use of the ship and wharfage while awaiting, after arrival, opportunity to discharge, defendant's wharf being occupied by other vessels.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; Eugene R. Garber, Judge.

Action by J. O. Blanchard against the Pacific Rolling-Mill Company. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. Affirmed.

T. Z. Blakeman, for appellant. Page & Eells, for respondent.

GAROUTTE, J. Macondray & Co. sold to defendant, Pacific Rolling-Mill Company, 500 tons of scrap iron, to arrive by ship Titan, then on her way to San Francisco from Hong Kong, said iron to be delivered to defendant at defendant's wharf, and received by purchaser from the ship's side when discharged. The ship arrived in due course, and defendant was notified that the iron was on board, ready to be discharged, but, owing to the fact that defendant's wharf was occupied by other vessels, Macondray & Co. were unable to deliver the iron for several days after its arrival, and after the ship was ready to discharge it. Owing to this delay, Macondray & Co. were compelled to pay the owners of the ship for the use thereof while said iron remained in the hold awaiting discharge and delivery, and also were compelled to pay an additional amount for wharfage, the entire sum being $724.70. The plaintiff, as assignee of Macondray & Co., sued the defendant and appellant for the amount of money so expended. This amount so paid to the master of the ship was found by the court to be a reasonable charge for such use. The foregoing facts are all substantially found by the court, and we think the evidence is entirely sufficient to sustain the findings as to such matters. The case of Dibble v. Corbett, 5 Bosw. 202, seems to be directly in point as to all the questions here involved. In that case the following instruction of the court was upheld: "The rule of damages in this case does not depend upon the charter party of the schooner, but the plaintiff's right to have simply the necessary expenses of taking care of the property, and keeping it, during the period of unreasonable delay, and nothing more can be recovered." And again: "It does not excuse the defendants for delay in receiving the goods that their vessel was not in readiness to receive them. If the defendants designated the Valleyfield as the ship to receive the goods, and that vessel was not ready, it was their duty to find another, or receive the goods at some other place." See, also, Story, Sales, §§ 394, 404. If Macondray & Co. were liable to the owners of the vessel for the use of the hold for storage purposes, then this defendant is liable to Macondray & Co. to the same extent, for such would be the amount of damage actually suffered by them. The evidence discloses that the charge made by the owner of the ship was a customary charge, and also a reasonable charge, under the circumstances of the case; and, as we have seen, the court finds the charge to be a reasonable one. We think the liability of Macondray & Co. to the master of the ship necessarily follows from these facts, and, such liability existing, the liability of the defendant to Macondray Co. follows, as a matter of course. For the foregoing reasons, it is ordered that the judgment and order be affirmed.

We concur: HARRISON, J.; PATERSON, J.

PERINE v. ERZGRABER. (No. 15,344.)

SUBJECT OF ACT—STREET IMPROVEMENTS—ASSESSMENTS.

1. St. 1889, p. 157, providing for levying and collecting assessments for work upon streets, and, by section 8, that the warrant, assessment, certificate, diagram, and affidavit of demand and nonpayment shall be held prima facie evidence of the regularity of the assessment, embraces but one subject, within Const. art. 4, § 24.

2. The notice of a resolution for street improvements required by St. 1889, p. 157, § 2, "stating that the resolution was passed, and describing briefly the improvements proposed," is sufficient if it states work to be done on curbs and sidewalks, although the resolution, in addition to the work described, stated that a portion of the roadway would be paved.

3. An assessment for street improvements under St. 1889, p. 157, can be made only on the lots on which the work abuts.

4. In an action to recover an assessment for street improvements under St. 1889, p. 157, which, by section 8, makes the warrant, assessment, certificate, and diagram, with affidavit of demand and nonpayment, prima facie evidence of the regularity of the assessment, plaintiff need not introduce evidence as to each act in the series.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; John F. Finn, Judge.

Action by G. M. Perine against Catherine Erzgraber to recover an assessment for street improvements. From a judgment for plaintiff, and order denying her motion for new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Horace W. Philbrook, for appellant. J. C. Bates, for respondent.

SEARLS, C. Action to recover a sum of money due upon a street assessment, and to foreclose the lien thereof upon a lot of land in the city and county of San Francisco. Plaintiff had judgment, from which, and from an order denying a motion for a new trial, defendant appeals.

The proceedings alleged in the complaint were based upon the act of March 18, 1885 (St. 1885, p. 147), as amended by the act of March 14, 1889 (St. 1889, p. 157). At the trial, plaintiff offered in evidence the assessment, diagram, warrant, certificate of the engineer, affidavit of demand and nonpayment, with proof of their filing, recordation, etc. Defendant objected to the introduction of these documents upon various grounds, which may be condensed by saying upon the grounds that no proof had been made of the passage of a resolution of intention by the board of supervisors to order the work to be done, or any resolution ordering the work to be done, or that the board ever acquired jurisdiction to order said alleged work to be done; that the affidavit of demand is inadmissible to prove a demand; that the charges of $33 for engineering and $20 for inspectors' pay are unauthorized, etc. The objections were overruled, the documents admitted in evidence, whereupon plaintiff rested his case. Defendant moved for a nonsuit upon grounds involving substantially the question raised by the objection to the proffered evidence, which motion was denied by the court. These rulings of the court are assigned as error by the defendant.

It is provided by section 8 of the act of March 14, 1889 (St. 1889, p. 168), which amends section 12 of the act of 1885, that in actions to recover assessments in such cases "the said warrant, assessment, certificate and diagram, with the affidavit of demand and non-payment, shall be held prima facie evidence of the regularity and correctness of the assessment, and of the proper proceedings and acts of the superintendent of streets and city council upon which said warrant, assessment and diagram are based, and like evidence of the right of the plaintiff to recover in the action." The contention of appellant is that this provision of the statute is in violation of the mandate of section 24 of article 4 of the constitution, which is as follows: "Every act shall embrace but one subject, which subject shall be embraced in its title.[1] But if any subject shall be embraced in an act, which shall not be expressed in its title, such act shall be void only as to so much thereof as shall not be expressed in its title." The precise question raised here was under discussion in the similar case of McDonald v. Conniff, 99 Cal. 386, 34 Pac. 71, recently decided contrary to the contention of appellant. In justice to counsel for appellant in this case it should be said his brief was filed prior to the decision in McDonald v. Conniff, supra, the decision in which is in the face of nearly every point made by him here. The evidence was properly admitted, and, when admitted, was prima facie evidence of all the facts going before and necessary to be proven in the case. It follows that the motion for a nonsuit was properly denied.

The resolution of intention passed by the board of supervisors described the work intended to be ordered as follows: "That granite curbs be laid on Locust avenue, between Larkin and Polk streets, where not already laid; that bituminous rock sidewalks be laid thereon where not already laid, and except where artificial stone sidewalks are now laid; and that the roadway thereof be paved with bituminous rock where not already so paved." The only evidence offered by the defendant to impeach the prima facie case made by plaintiff related to the notice of the resolution of intention which was posted upon the street, and which the evidence showed was in the following words: "Notice of Street Work. Public notice is hereby given that the board of supervisors of the city and county of San Francisco passed, on the 23d day of March, 1891, a resolution of intention, No. 4,894 (third series), providing that granite curbs be laid on Locust avenue, between Larkin and Polk streets, where not already laid; that bituminous rock sidewalks be laid thereon where not already laid, and except where artificial stone sidewalks are now laid; and that the roadway where not already so paved crossing. And all parties interested are referred to said resolution for further particulars. James Gilleran, by E. Owens, Deputy." The only objection urged to the notice as posted is that it does not sufficiently describe the work or improvement proposed. The statute (section 2 of act of 1889) requires the notice to "state the fact of the passage of the resolution, its date, and briefly the work or improvement proposed, and refer to the resolution for further particulars." It will be observed that the notice as posted contained a complete description of the improvement to be made, except that in describing the work to be done on the roadway the words "be paved with bituminous rock" are omitted after the word "roadway" and before the word "where." The statute does not require an accurate and full description of the work to be contained in the notice. The evident object is an identification of the work, its locality, the fact of the passage of the resolution, and its date, with a reference to the resolution for further particulars. The statute evidently contemplates the existence of particulars in the resolution which are not contained in the notice, otherwise there would be no need of a reference to the resolution to obtain them. In the present instance the notice was precise as to the specific facts required by the statute, accurately described the portion of the street to be improved, and contained such brief description of the work as, with the reference to the resolution, could not fail to inform all parties in interest. This was a substantial compliance with the terms of the statute, and was sufficient. The assessment and diagram show that the work was all done on the north side of and north of the center line of Locust avenue, and in front of the lot of defendant. The contention of appellant that the assessment was void by reason that it was levied upon the lot on one side of the street only is met by the statute and by the decision upholding it in McDonald v. Conniff, supra, and need not be further noticed.

[1] The title to St. 1889, p. 157, is as follows: "An act to amend sections two, three, four, five, six, seven, eight, nine, twelve, twenty-four, twenty-six, thirty-four and thirty-seven of an act entitled 'An act to provide for work upon streets, lanes, alleys, courts, places and sidewalks and for the construction of sewers within municipalities,' approved March 18, 1885, and to add a new section thereto, to be called section twelve and one-half, relating to the payment of work in instalments."

The judgment is supported by the findings. The specifications of the insufficiency of the evidence to support the findings are evidently predicated in the main upon the theory that it devolved upon the plaintiff to prove all the separate steps taken up to and including the assessment. In one sense, this is true; but it is not true in the sense that he must introduce independent evidence as to each act in the series. When he introduced the "warrant, assessment, certificate, and diagram, with the affidavit of demand and nonpayment," he in fact introduced what the statute has made prima facie evidence of all the necessary acts and of his right to recover in the action. Defendant having failed to successfully impeach this prima facie case, the court was justified in finding the allegations of the complaint to be true. The judgment and order appealed from should be affirmed.

WYATT v. STEPHENS. (No. 21,101.)

(Supreme Court of California. April 24, 1894.)

DISBARMENT—APPLICATION—WHEN ENTERTAINED.

A proceeding to disbar, on application of a client, who claims that he engaged the attorney to settle a claim for half the amount collected; that he settled for $500, told his client that he settled for $300, gave him $125, and failed to keep his promise to give him $25 more,—will not be entertained till the truth of the matter has been settled in a criminal prosecution, or an action to recover the money.

Application of James J. Wyatt for disbarment of John J. Stephens. Charge dismissed.

BEATTY, C. J. This is a proceeding for the disbarment of an attorney who is accused by a former client of fraudulently appropriating money collected for the latter. It is alleged, in substance, that Wyatt, having a claim for damages on account of personal injuries against a railway company, entered into an agreement with Stephens (and other attorneys, who are exonerated from all blame in the matter), by which he was empowered to make a settlement of said claim on such terms as he and his associates might consider reasonable, they (the attorneys) to retain as compensation for their services one-half of the amount collected; that, in pursuance of said agreement, Stephens settled the claim for $500, which sum he received from the corporation on the 9th day of February, 1894; that he represented to Wyatt that he had settled for $300, and paid him only $125, promising, but failing, to pay him the balance of $25; that he afterwards paid to his associates $100, retaining for himself $275; that his statements in regard to the settlement were willfully false, and made for the purpose of defrauding, etc.

So far as these allegations tend to show that the accused attorney has been guilty of a criminal offense, the charge here falls within the rule announced in the Case of Tilden, reported in 25 Pac. 687, in which we distinctly announced that we would not investigate such charges until after regular proceedings in the courts having jurisdiction of the offense. The present case presents even stronger objections to the proceedings which we are asked to institute. If the facts alleged are true, the accuser has an undoubted right to recover in a civil action, by the verdict of a jury, the money of which he claims to have been defrauded. But without making any attempt to establish his right, or the guilt of the accused, in the ordinary tribunals, by either criminal or civil process, he asks this court to lay aside the important and pressing business with which every moment of its time is fully occupied, in order to investigate, in the first instance, a charge which may be tried and determined in the courts of the county. We should feel entirely justified in refusing to accede to such a demand, even if the pressure of more imperative engagements did not render it necessary. When an accusation of this kind is preferred, not by a bar association, or any responsible public officer charged with the conservation of the public interest, but merely by a party complaining of a private injury, we must decline to investigate it until such party has shown his good faith by first resorting to regular proceedings in the ordinary tribunals. In the recent Case of Burris, 36 Pac. 101, the charge was not filed here until after investigation in the probate court, and refusal to pay over the money in controversy. In other cases the charge has either been made by a representative and quasi public body, such as the bar association, or the charge has been of the breach of some obligation resting upon attorneys alone, as distinguished from ordinary breaches of duty. It ought, perhaps, to be stated, in view of the publicity given to this charge, that Mr. Stephens has voluntarily appeared without a citation, and requested a speedy investigation of the matter. We cannot, however, consent to depart from the rule above announced, which, as we have said, is necessary to enable us to attend to the business before us. The charge is dismissed.

CLARK v. SVEA FIRE INS. CO. (No. 15,355.)

(Supreme Court of California. April 24, 1894.)

ACTION ON POLICY — OWNERSHIP OF PROPERTY — SALE IN FRAUD OF CREDITORS — PROPERTY INSURED AS FIXTURES.

1. In an action on a fire policy, assigned to plaintiff with the approval of the company, when the insured property was sold to plaintiff, defendant cannot show that the sale was in fraud of creditors, and therefore no title passed to plaintiff.

2. Where property is insured as fixtures, insurance can be recovered thereon as such, whatever it is as between insured and his landlord.

Action by William Clark against the Svea Fire Insurance Company. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. Affirmed.

T. C. Van Ness, for appellant. E. P. Cole (E. W. McGraw, of counsel), for respondent.

GAROUTTE, J. This is an action upon a policy of fire insurance, and defendant appeals upon a bill of exceptions from a judgment rendered against it.

1. It is insisted that the court erred in its rulings upon the admission of evidence as to the ownership of the property covered by the policy. The policy was issued to the Brown-Steele Packing Company upon a stock of meats, and also upon the office fixtures and furniture situated in the building used by plaintiff in the conduct of the business of storing meats, etc. Plaintiff's title to the property is derived by a bill of sale from the Brown-Steele Packing Company, and the policy was assigned to plaintiff at the time the bill of sale was made, and such assignment was duly approved by the defendant company. At the trial, defendant offered to show that the property was transferred to plaintiff for the purpose of defrauding the creditors of the Brown-Steele Packing Company, and that, consequently, the bill of sale carried no title. This line of evidence was rejected by the court, and, we think, most properly rejected. The subject-matter covered by the evidence offered was of no concern to the defendant. The creditors of the plaintiff's vendor were the only parties injured by the transfer, and they only could complain. Defendant has cited no case to support his claims in this regard, and we know of none. The law all looks the other way.

2. It is claimed that the court erred in excluding evidence tending to show that certain fixtures were not within the protection of the policy. The burned premises were occupied by the plaintiff as a tenant, and appellant claimed that certain fixtures were so attached to the building as to become an integral part thereof, and hence the property of the landlord. This property was insured by the company as fixtures, and the premiums therefor received by it. Appellant's position in this regard commends itself to the court as one deserving but little consideration. Aside from any question of estoppel, there is nothing in the point. The plaintiff was a tenant of the premises at the date of the fire, and these fixtures were trade fixtures placed in the building by himself. As against all the world, save the landlord, they were without doubt the property of the tenant. If the terms of the policy were not broad enough to cover them, and no claim was made by plaintiff for their loss, the whole matter was immaterial. If they came within the provisions of the policy, and were insured as fixtures, then fixtures they are as far as the present litigation is concerned.

3. The amount of the damage suffered by plaintiff was fairly submitted to the jury under clear and unequivocal instructions of the court, and we are not prepared to say that the verdict is in excess of the damage proved.

There are a few other matters relied upon for a reversal of the cause, but they are of minor importance. We find no substantial merit in the appeal. For the foregoing reasons, it is ordered that the judgment be affirmed.

We concur: HARRISON, J.; PATERSON, J.

DORMAN v. SOTO. (No. 15,478.)

(Supreme Court of California. April 24, 1894.)

Sale of Personalty—Delivery and Change of Possession.

Where plaintiff's son-in-law gave to her a bill of sale of articles on his ranch, which remained there, and were used by him, there was no delivery and change of possession that would defeat an attachment of the property in an action against the son-in-law, though, with the bill of sale, there was given to plaintiff a deed of an undivided half of the ranch, and, before the attachment, plaintiff visited her son-in-law.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Contra Costa county; Joseph P. Jones, Judge.

Action by Asenath Dorman against Frank Soto. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. Reversed.

R. H. Latimar and C. Y. Brown, for appellant. W. S. Wells and Cary Howard, for respondent.

VANCLIEF, C. This action was brought to recover certain personal property (8 horses and 40 tons of hay), or the value thereof. The defendant appeals from the judgment in favor of plaintiff, and from an order denying his motion for a new trial. The defendant, a constable, justifies the taking and detention of the property by virtue of a writ of attachment issued by a justice of the peace at suit of Williams against Thurber and wife, alleging that the horses and hay were the property of Thurber and wife, and denying that plaintiff was the owner, or entitled to the possession, thereof. Plaintiff claimed title to the property by purchase from Thurber and wife, Thurber being her son-in-law. The purchase was evidenced by a bill of sale executed by the husband alone, as follows: "Know all men by these presents: That for and in consideration of the sum of one dollar ($1) to me in hand paid, and other valuable consideration to me moving, I have this day sold, assigned, set over, transferred, and delivered unto Asenath Dorman (widow), of Alameda county, state of California, the following described personal property, now in Contra Costa county, state of California, on the premises this day conveyed by myself and Ellen D. Thurber (my wife) to said Asenath Dorman, to wit: Eight work horses; all hay on said premises owned or belonging to me. Witness my hand this 20th day of August, 1892. A. S. Thurber. Witness: Cary Howard."

The appellant contends that there never was any delivery of the property described in the bill of sale, and consequently that the transfer was not followed by any actual change of possession, and is therefore void as against Williams, the attachment creditor; and I think this point is well taken. Since it appears that, at the time of execution of the bill of sale, Thurber and wife had the possession and control of the property, were then indebted to Williams, the plaintiff in the attachment suit, and that the attachment proceedings were regular, the burden of proving an immediate delivery, followed by an actual and continued change of possession of the property described in the bill of sale, devolved upon the plaintiff. Yet there is no evidence sufficiently tending to prove a delivery and continued change of possession to raise a substantial conflict with the evidence to the contrary. Indeed, it is neither alleged, nor found as a fact, that there was any delivery or change of possession. But conceding that an allegation and finding that plaintiff was the owner, and entitled to the possession, is sufficient to uphold the judgment, yet such finding is not justified by the bill of sale alone, which was executed in Oakland, Alameda county, while the property described therein was on Thurber's ranch, in Contra Costa county. The plaintiff rested her case on the bill of sale and her own testimony. Her testimony in chief is as follows: "I am the plaintiff in the above-entitled action. This paper (paper shown witness) was delivered to me by A. S. Thurber on the 20th day of August, 1892. It is a bill of sale for property contained in the complaint. I continued to be the owner of this property on the 8th day of September, 1892." Cross-examination: "I live in Oakland, and sometimes in Alameda. I have lived in Oakland for about the last six years continuously. My home has been with my daughter Mrs. Soto, in Oakland; but, since Mrs. Thurber has moved to Alameda, I have visited some at her house. I have lived with my daughter Mrs. Soto in Oakland, and stop sometimes with my daughter Mrs. Thurber, wife of A. S. Thurber. The bill of sale was made and delivered to me on the 20th day of August, 1892, at my daughter's home in Oakland, by A. S. Thurber. The consideration of this bill of sale was twenty dollars in money, and, A. S. Thurber being my son-in-law, I went on his note for five thousand dollars to six thousand dollars; and this transfer was to pay me for the twenty dollars in money which I had already paid him, and which I may be called upon to pay out on any of the notes which I had indorsed for him. The horses and hay were on the ranch known as the 'Treat Ranch,' in Contra Costa county, state of California. At the time the bill of sale was made, I was very intimate with A. S. Thurber, he being my son-in-law. I visited at his home, and I was getting uneasy about his affairs,—whether his fruit crop would be sufficient to pay off his indebtedness and the notes I went security for, so I would be released,—and he was getting uneasy about not being able to pay off his debts, and about being able to release me; and I wanted a bill of sale of his personal property, because I thought I might have to pay these notes I went security for him. This stock was kept on the ranch continuously, and is there yet. I went to the Thurber ranch a few days after the receipt of the bill of sale from Thurber to me, and stayed there until about November 13, 1892, when I left on business. I stayed there until I came down to Martinez to pay my taxes; and the sheriff met me down there, and served a summons on me in the Treat suit. Then I went to Oakland to hunt me a lawyer, to know what to do. Then I caught cold, and was detained in Oakland. I put my son Charles Dunn in charge of the property for me, when I received the bill of sale, and he stayed there all the time. I went to the ranch soon after the bill of sale was made, and stayed there until November. Mr. and Mrs. Thurber remained also until I left, about the 13th day of November, 1892, when they moved to Alameda." The testimony on the part of the defendant showed that Thurber used the property on his ranch after the execution of the sale, continuously, until it was attached, as he had used it before. The plaintiff, in rebuttal, testified: "I sent this paper to my son Charles Dunn about the time I bought the property from Thurber: 'Oakland, Cal., August 20, 1892. Chas. Dunn, Esq., Concord, Cal.—Dear Sir: You are hereby requested and directed to take possession of the land and premises next formerly owned by Alfred S. Thurber and wife, near Concord, with all personal property thereon, owned or claimed by them, or either of them, except wearing apparel and household furniture, and the same to hold, as my agent, and subject only to my orders and control. Yours, truly, Asenath Dorman.'" Charles Dunn, having been called as a witness for defendant, testified: "I lived during the year and fall of 1892 on the Treat ranch. Thurber and wife lived there also. ['Treat Ranch' being the name of the ranch owned by Thurber and wife.] I claimed an undivided one-half of the hay Soto attached, * * * and served notice on Soto, the constable. The other half belonged to Mrs. Thurber, wife of A. S. Thurber. * * * The share of Mrs. Thurber was hauled away in November, 1892." Being called by plaintiff in rebuttal, Charles Dunn testified that his mother's letter to him of August 20, 1892, was given to him by Mr. A. S. Thurber a few days after its date; but he did not testify that he took possession or charge of the property for the plaintiff, or that he did anything directed by that letter, nor is there any evidence that he did. On what ground he claimed one-half of the hay at the time of the levy, does not appear, nor why, if the other half belonged to Mrs. Thurber, as he testified it did, her half was not subject to the attachment. Plaintiff, also, in rebuttal, introduced a deed to her from Thurber and wife for one-half of the Treat ranch, undivided, which appeared to have been recorded August 22, 1892; and it is claimed by appellee that this deed was sufficient evidence of a delivery and continuous possession of the horses and hay described in the bill of sale, as they were on the ranch from the date of the bill of sale until they were attached. But this contention is answered by several cases in this state. Cahoon v. Marshall, 25 Cal. 197; Bunting v. Saltz, 84 Cal. 168, 24 Pac. 167. I think the judgment and order should be reversed, and a new trial granted.

We concur: SEARLES, C.; BELCHER, C.

PEOPLE v. McREYNOLDS et al. (No. 15,400.)

BAIL—LIABILITY OF SURETIES.

1. Sureties on a prisoner's bail bond are discharged where, after having delivered him into the custody of the sheriff pursuant to an order of the court under Pen. Code, § 1129, he is released by another order, made without their application or knowledge, and escapes.

2. In such case the sureties need not satisfactorily excuse the prisoner's neglect to appear, as provided by Pen. Code, § 1305, as a condition precedent to their release.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Sonoma county; R. F. Crawford, Judge.

Action by the people against James McReynolds and others. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Reversed.

D. R. Gale and Rutledge & Pressley, for appellants. Emmet Seawell and J. R. Leppo, for the People.

McFARLAND, J. Defendants were sureties on a bail bond conditioned for the appearance, etc., of one R. Lee McReynolds, who had been committed by a magistrate upon a charge of grand larceny. An information was thereafter duly filed in the superior court, charging said R. Lee with said crime. He appeared in said court on September 7, 1891, and was arraigned, and pleaded not guilty; and the cause came on regularly for trial on November 10, 1891, at 10 o'clock a. m., at which time the said R. Lee was present in court with his counsel. Thereupon, on motion of the district attorney, the court duly made an order that said R. Lee "be, and he is hereby, committed to the custody of the sheriff of Sonoma county, Cal., pending the trial of the above-entitled matter;" and under said order the said sheriff took said R. Lee into his custody. Afterwards the court, on motion of the district attorney, "without the application, knowledge, or consent of said defendants," made another order setting aside the said order committing said R. Lee to the custody of the sheriff; and under said last order the sheriff "released and discharged from and out his custody the said R. Lee McReynolds, and permitted him to go at large, and did not deliver the said R. Lee McReynolds into the custody of said defendants, or either of them." The trial of the cause was continued until the next day, at which time the said R. Lee was not present; and, having been called at the door, and not appearing, the court made an order forfeiting the bond. Afterwards the present action was brought to recover of defendants the amount named in the bond, and judgment was rendered against them for said amount, the case having been tried without a jury. They appeal from the judgment and from an order denying their motion for a new trial.

In our opinion, the judgment and order must be reversed. The liability of appellants upon the undertaking ceased when the said R. Lee was taken into the custody of the sheriff under said order of the court, which was an order the court had power to make. Pen. Code, § 1129. Upon the release of a person on bail he is in the custody of the sureties, and the consideration of the bond, accruing to the sureties, is his freedom from any other custody. The responsibility of the sureties is based upon their custody of the person bailed, and their rights and powers under such custody. If they are at any time fearful that he may not appear, they can have him arrested and surrendered, or he may surrender himself; and, in either event, they are exonerated. Pen. Code, § 1300. When the court orders him into the custody of the sheriff, and the latter takes him, the same result follows. Vacating the order did not, by operation of law, restore him to appellant's custody. The fact that in the case at bar the sheriff had the said R. Lee in his custody, under the order, for only a short time, is immaterial. It makes no difference whether the time was 10 minutes or 10 months. The theory upon which the case seems to have been decided—that appellants should have shown affirmatively that the custody of the sheriff actually prevented them from afterwards producing the said R. Lee—is not sound. When he was taken into the sheriff's custody they were released from any further care as to his whereabouts. He probably absconded for the very reason that he considered the sureties exonerated by the said order committing him to the custody of the sheriff. We have discovered no decisions in this state where the point here involved was directly passed upon, unless Babb v. Oakley, 5 Cal. 94, be one, where the court said that "the offer of the defendant Oakley to surrender himself in discharge of his sureties was a good surrender, and discharged them from all liability;" but the facts in that case are very meagerly stated. There are, however, direct authorities to the point in sister states. State v. Orsler, 48 Iowa, 343; People v. Stager, 10 Wend. 431; Medlin v. Com., 11 Bush, 605. See, also, Reese v. U. S., 9 Wall. 13. The position of respondent that appellants could protect themselves only under section 1305, Pen. Code, is not tenable. That section relates only to a case where the defendant or his sureties are able to come before the court and "satisfactorily excuse his neglect" to appear. Of course, that could not have been done in the case at bar. The defendant ran away without any excuse that could be given for him. The judgment and order appealed from are reversed.

MUNICIPAL CORPORATION — REORGANIZATION AS CITY—ELECTION—VALIDITY—PETITION FOR SUBMISSION.

1. Under St. 1883, p. 93, § 4, providing for submission to a vote at the next general election of a proposition to reorganize a town as a city whenever a petition shall be presented to the board, signed by one-fifth of the qualified electors, a petition to which the required number of signatures was obtained by attaching thereto signatures cut from other petitions, identical in form, gives the board no jurisdiction to submit such proposition.

2. A regular annual election provided by law for the election of municipal officers, though no state or county officers are chosen, is a "general election," within the meaning of such statute.

3. Under Const. art. 11, § 6, authorizing towns to reorganize under the general laws relating to municipal corporations "whenever a majority of the electors voting at a general election shall so determine," a majority of all the electors voting at such election, and not merely a majority of those voting on such proposition, is required.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Alameda county; W. E. Greene, Judge.

Quo warranto, on the relation of one Wells, against the town of Berkeley, to test the legality of the proceedings taken to reorganize such town as a municipal corporation of the fifth class. From a decree declaring such proceedings void, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Edw. C. Robinson (W. Laird Hill and Edw. A. Holman, of counsel), for appellant. Atty. Gen. Hart and T. F. Graber, for respondent.

BELCHER, C. This is an appeal from a judgment on the judgment roll, and the only contention of appellant is that the judgment is not supported by the findings. The action was instituted by the attorney general upon the relation of one Wells, challenging the legality of the proceedings taken for the reorganization of appellant, as a municipal corporation of the fifth class, under the general laws of the state. The court found the facts to be, in substance, as follows: The town of Berkeley was organized as a municipal corporation in 1878 under an act of the legislature approved April 1, 1878, and entitled "An act to incorporate the town of Berkeley, in Alameda county;" and thereafter it continued to exercise its corporate franchise, under and by virtue of said act, until June 28, 1893. On April 3, 1893, at a regular meeting of the board of trustees of the town, there was presented to said board, read, and placed on file, a petition asking that the question of the reorganization of the town as a city of the fifth class, under the general laws relating to municipal corporations, should be submitted to the electors thereof at the next general election to be held therein. This petition was signed by only 47 qualified electors of the town, but attached to it were seven other sheets of paper, signed by qualified electors of the town, numbering in the aggregate 165. The signatures were obtained as follows: Prior to April 3, 1893, eight separate petitions, identical in form and language, were circulated by different persons, and signatures were obtained to each of them. After these petitions had all been signed, the signatures on seven of them were cut off and detached by a person having no authority to do so, and were then attached to the other one so that they appeared to constitute a part of it. The petition to which the seven detached sheets were thus attached was then, by the same person, presented and filed, as aforesaid, as and for a genuine petition containing 212 signatures. The whole number of votes cast at the last prior municipal election held in the town was 1,055. On the day the said petition was presented, April 3d, the board of trustees, acting upon the same, passed an ordinance submitting to the electors of the town at the next general election to be held therein, to wit, on the 8th day of May, 1893, the question of the reorganization of the town as a city of the fifth class. The election on May 8th was the annual election provided for by the charter of 1878 for the election of municipal officers; and at that election 1,287 electors voted for town officers, and 533 in favor of reorganization, and 517 against reorganization. In due time the board of trustees canvassed the vote, and declared the proposition to reorganize carried, and thereupon caused their clerk to make, and transmit to the secretary of state, a certified abstract of such vote. Thereafter, the said board called a special election for the election of the officers required by law to be elected in cities of the fifth class, and the election was held on June 26th. On June 28th the board canvassed the vote, and declared the result; and from and since the said last-named date the defendant has been, and still is, holding and exercising the franchise of a municipal corporation of the fifth class, under and by virtue of the proceedings hereinbefore set forth, and not otherwise. And, as conclusions of law, the court found "that said defendant has never been legally organized as a city of the fifth class, and that all the steps, proceedings, and elections held in that behalf, as in the findings of fact herein are stated, were and are void; that defendant has usurped, intruded into, and unlawfully held and exercised, the franchise of a municipal corporation of the fifth class, and is now usurping, intruding into, and unlawfully holding and exercising, such franchise." Three questions are presented, and counsel on both sides earnestly ask that each of them be considered and decided. They are: First. Was the petition presented to the board of trustees sufficient to give it jurisdiction to submit the proposition of reorganization to a vote of the electors? Second. Was the election at which the proposition was submitted a general election, within the meaning of the statute? Third. To carry the proposition, was a majority of all the electors voting upon it sufficient, or was a majority of all those voting at the election necessary?

1. The constitution provides: "Corporations for municipal purposes shall not be created by special laws; but the legislature, by general laws, shall provide for the incorporation, organization and classification, in proportion to population, of cities and towns, which laws may be altered, amended or repealed. Cities and towns heretofore organized or incorporated may become organized under such general laws whenever a majority of the electors voting at a general election shall so determine, and shall organize in conformity therewith." Section 6, art. 11. In obedience to this mandate of the constitution, an act was passed by the legislature, and approved March 13, 1883, entitled "An act to provide for the organization, incorporation and government of municipal corporations." St. 1883, p. 93. Section 4 of this act provides: "The common council, board of trustees, or other legislative body of any city and county, city or town, organized or incorporated prior to the first day of January, eighteen hundred and eighty, at twelve o'clock meridian, shall, upon receiving a petition therefor, signed by not less than one-fifth of the qualified electors of such city and county, city, or town, as shown by the vote cast at the last municipal election held therein, submit to the electors of such city and county, city, or town, at the next general election to be held therein, the question whether such city and county, city, or town, shall become organized under the general laws of the state relating to municipal corporations of the class to which such city and county, city, or town may belong." It is clear that under these provisions a municipality could only be reorganized in the manner and after a compliance with all the conditions prescribed. It follows, therefore, in this case, that a petition was necessary, and that, unless one signed by the requisite number of electors was presented to the board, it had no jurisdiction to submit the question of reorganization to the electors, and they had no right to vote upon it. As before stated, the number of votes cast at the last municipal election held in the town was 1,055. It was necessary, therefore, that the petition be signed by at least 211 electors. The petition presented was signed by only 47; and, unless the signature on the attached sheets could be counted, it was clearly insufficient. Probably, if the several petitions, as signed, had been presented, they might and should be regarded and treated as "a petition," within the meaning of the statute; and in a similar case it was so held by the supreme court of Florida. McKinney v. Commissioners, 26 Fla. 267. In Fox v. Board, 49 Cal. 563, the same question now in hand arose; and it was held that "if two petitions identical in language are circulated and signed, and, to make the required number of names, the signatures on one petition are cut off and pasted onto the other, which is presented, the board have no authority to order the election." The court, by Wallace, C. J., said: "The petition presented to the board must be that petition which was signed by the petitioners. Both signature and presentation are necessary. In this view, the identity of the instrument presented as being that which came from the hands of the petitioners is indispensable. To say that, though the signers did not affix their names to the petition presented, they did affix them to another and similar petition, not presented to the board, is no answer. Nor does it satisfy either the terms of the statute, or its obvious policy, which was to shut the door against frauds which would inevitably occur if the practice of detaching signatures from one petition, and attaching them to another, were permitted." And Crockett, J., in a concurring opinion, also said: "If numerous petitions with similar headings be circulated for signatures, and if the headings from all the petitions, except one, be cut off, and all the names, without the knowledge or consent of the signers, be pasted to the one heading, and in that form presented to the board, it is clear that the paper thus presented was not 'signed' by those whose signatures were affixed to it by pasting. Whether they signed another paper with a similar heading will rest entirely in parol, and can only be ascertained by oral proofs. If such proof will suffice as to a portion of the petitioners, it will be equally effective as to all. We might then have the case of a petition never in fact signed by any one, and the omission could be supplied only by oral proof that the petitioners had signed other similar petitions. If a practice of this kind was tolerated, it would open the door to numerous frauds, and would result in substituting oral proof for that which the statute requires to be in writing." There are some conflicting authorities in other states, and counsel for appellant insist that the decision in the Fox Case should be overruled. It has, however, so far as we know, remained unquestioned in this state for nearly 20 years, and seems to be based on sound and convincing reasoning. It should therefore, in our opinion, be upheld and followed.

2. The election held on May 8, 1893, was the annual election provided for by law for the election of municipal officers, and in our opinion it was a general election, at which the question of reorganization might properly be submitted. It is true that the words "general election" are ordinarily used to designate one at which state and county officers are elected, but we know of no provisions in the constitution or statutes limiting them to such an election. Two classes of elections, only, are spoken of,—general and special; and a regular annual municipal election cannot be included in the latter class, but must be treated as a general election. In Ruggles v. Trustees, 88 Cal. 430, 26 Pac. 520, application was made for a writ of mandate to compel the trustees to call and provide for the holding of an election of city officers. The court said: "Prior to May 6, 1890, the city of Woodland, in Yolo county, was a municipal corporation under a special charter. On that date a proposition to reorganize as a city of the fifth class, under the general incorporation act approved March 13, 1883, was duly submitted to the electors of said city, and approved by a majority vote." And it was held that a peremptory writ should issue. No general state or county election took place on May 6th, but the court must have considered the election held on that day a general election, or it could not have said that the proposition to reorganize "was duly submitted to the electors."

3. At the election held on May 8th, a majority of all the electors who voted upon the proposition to reorganize were in favor of it, but not a majority of all who voted at the election. The provision of the constitution in regard to elections like that under consideration has been quoted, and it will be observed that the words used are, "whenever a majority of the electors voting at a general election shall so determine." These words clearly do not indicate that only a majority of the electors voting upon the proposition is necessary, but would seem to imply that a majority of all those voting at the election is required. And such was evidently the interpretation placed upon this provision by the legislature when it passed the general municipal incorporation act of 1883. Section 4 of that act, after providing for the presentation of a petition, the submission of the question at the next general election, etc., proceeds as follows: "The votes so cast shall be canvassed at the time and in the manner in which the other votes cast at such election are canvassed. If upon such canvass a majority of all the electors voting at such election shall be found to have voted for such reorganization, the said council, board or other legislative body shall, by an order entered upon their minutes, cause their clerk, or other officer performing the duties of clerk, to make and transmit to the secretary of state a certified abstract of such vote, which abstract shall show the whole number of electors voting at such election, the number of votes cast for reorganization, and the number of votes cast against reorganization." This language plainly implies, we think, that a majority of all the electors voting at the election is necessary to carry the proposition to reorganize. Counsel on both sides have argued the question at great length, and have cited numerous authorities, but we do not deem it necessary to follow their arguments further, or to review the cases referred to. It follows that the court below drew correct conclusions from the facts, and that the judgment should be affirmed.

MOORE v. SLEEPER et al. (No. 15,309.)

SHERIFF'S INDEMNITY—JUDGMENT AGAINST SURETIES.

1. Code Civ. Proc. § 1055, providing that a judgment against a sheriff for an act done, by virtue of his office, after notice to the sureties on an indemnity bond, is conclusive of his right against them, and the court may, on notice, enter judgment, with costs, against them, does not require a joint judgment, if the sureties' bond be several, and for different amounts, nor forbid a judgment for less than that against the sheriff, if the sureties are bound for less, but in such case judgment should be entered against the sureties for the amount of the bond, and for which each has bound himself, not to exceed the judgment against the sheriff, and costs.

2. On motion for judgment over on a sheriff's indemnity bond, the burden is on the sureties to show that the judgment against the sheriff had been satisfied by themselves, or by a return of the property seized, or that the property to satisfy it still is, or ought to be, in the sheriff's possession.

3. The fact that each indemnitor is bound for less than $300 does not deprive the superior court of jurisdiction to give judgment against each on supplemental motion, under Code Civ. Proc. § 1055, in an action against the sheriff, of which it has jurisdiction.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Mendocino county; R. McGarvey, Judge.

In the matter of the action of Albert W. Lewis against L. A. Young and others. On motion by Gawn Moore, sheriff, against J. M. Sleeper and others, for judgment over on his indemnity bond in the attachment. Motion denied, and Moore appeals. Reversed.

J. H. Seawell and T. B. Bond, for appellant. T. J. Sheridan, for respondents.

DE HAVEN, J. Appeal from an order denying a motion made under section 1055 of the Code of Civil Procedure, to have judgment entered in favor of a sheriff, and against sureties named in a bond indemnifying him against liability on account of the execution of a writ of attachment. The indemnity bond was given in an action brought by one Albert W. Lewis against L. A. Young and others, and recites that said Lewis, as principal, and the respondents, as sureties, are jointly and severally bound to the appellant in this proceeding in the sum of $1,000; and then, after referring to the fact of the delivery to the appellant, as sheriff, of the writ of attachment issued in the action of Lewis v. Young et al., and of the attachment of certain personal property thereunder, the bond proceeds to specify the particular liability of each of the sureties, as follows: "The said Robert Bucknell is bound in the sum of $200, and the said R. C. Tallman is bound in the sum of $200, and the said J. M. Sleeper is bound in the sum of $200, and the said E. Burk is bound in the sum of $100, and the said W. W. Dunton is bound in the sum of $100, and the said M. L. Thompson is bound in the sum of $100." After the execution of this bond the claimants of the attached property brought an action against the appellant for its recovery, and obtained a judgment against him for the return of the property or its value, $850, and also for $278.50, costs of the action. The respondents here were duly notified of the pendency of that action, and were requested to defend the same, and were further notified that, in case judgment was recovered against the appellant, he would move for a judgment against the respondents here, under section 1055 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The motion appealed from seems to have been denied by the superior court upon the ground that the sureties in the bond were bound in different amounts, and each for a less sum than the judgment against the obligee in the bond, and that section 1055 of the Code of Civil Procedure does not authorize a several judgment in different amounts against sureties upon a bond of indemnity, or any judgment against such sureties for less than the whole amount of the judgment recovered against the obligee named in such bond. It will be noticed that the indemnifying bond is somewhat ambiguous as to the extent of liability assumed by the sureties. In the first paragraph, it is stated that they are jointly and severally bound with the principal in the full sum of the penalty named in the bond; but this is followed by a more particular statement to the effect that certain of the sureties are severally bound in different amounts, each for a less sum than $1,000,—the penalty of the bond. We think the last or more particular statement is to govern in ascertaining the liability of the sureties; and, while the superior court correctly construed the bond in this respect, we think it was in error in holding that section 1055 of the Code of Civil Procedure would not permit a several judgment to be entered against the sureties in accordance with the terms of the bond. The language of that section is: "If an action be brought against a sheriff for an act done by virtue of his office, and he give written notice thereof to the sureties on any bond of indemnity received by him, the judgment recovered therein shall be conclusive evidence of his right to recover against such sureties; and the court may on motion, upon notice of five days, order judgment to be entered up against them for the amount so recovered, including costs." This does not necessarily require that the judgment thus provided for shall be a joint judgment when the obligation of the sureties is several, and they become liable for different amounts, or that the judgment to be entered shall not be for a less amount than the one recovered against the sheriff obligee, if the sureties upon the indemnity bond have not bound themselves for so great a sum. The section should be construed as authorizing the entry of a judgment against the sureties for the amount named in the bond, and for which each has become liable. but not to exceed the amount of the judgment recovered against the sheriff, including costs of the action. We certainly can see no reason why the same character of judgment may not be entered against the sureties under this section as might be in an ordinary action against them to recover upon the bond.

The respondents further contend that the order should be affirmed because it was not shown that the appellant had paid the judgment recovered against him, or had not satisfied all of it, except the portion thereof relating to costs, by a return of the property, or that he did not retain the property with which to satisfy it. It was not necessary for the sheriff to show these facts. He became liable when the judgment was rendered against him, and it was against this liability that he was indemnified by the respondents; and he made out a prima facie case, under the statute, by the production of the indemnity bond, the judgment against him, and proof of notice to the respondents to appear and defend the action in which the judgment was recovered. And in order to overcome this prima facie case the burden was on the respondents to show that the judgment against the appellant had been satisfied by themselves, or by a return of the property, or that the property with which to satisfy it was, or ought to have been, still in the possession of appellant. This conclusion is in harmony with the principle underlying the decision in Pieper v. Peers, 98 Cal. 42, 32 Pac. 700, and that case may be regarded as an authority in support of our views on this point.

It is lastly claimed by the respondents that the superior court was without jurisdiction to render a several judgment against them in this proceeding because each of them is a surety on the indemnity bond for a sum less than $300. But this proceeding is not an independent action. It is simply a supplemental motion made for judgment against the sureties in an action of which the superior court had jurisdiction, and in which it had already proceeded to judgment against the nominal defendant. The provision in section 1055 of the Code of Civil Procedure, permitting such a motion as this to be made, proceeds upon the theory that indemnitors are the real parties defendant when a sheriff is sued for an official act for which they have indemnified him, and that when they have notice of the pendency of such an action the judgment against the sheriff is conclusive of his right to recover against them; and, this being so, the statute permits the sheriff to have judgment entered against them at once upon a motion in the action, without the expense and delay of prosecuting an action upon the bond of indemnity, and such a motion is not to be regarded as the commencement of an independent action against the sureties. Order reversed.

PIERCE v. HILTON. (No. 19,344.)

COMPLAINT IN EJECTMENT — SUFFICIENCY OF DESCRIPTION—RES JUDICATA.

1. A complaint in ejectment, in describing the land sued for, need not specify the character in which a surveyor mentioned in such description established lines referred to.

2. A complaint in ejectment for a portion of a rancho, describing the land sued for as "tracts A and B, as designated on the map accompanying the referee's report in the partition suit of said rancho," in the superior court, is not bad for insufficiency of description.

3. Where plaintiff in ejectment shows title to the whole tract in suit, and that defendant is in possession of a portion, defendant cannot complain of a judgment for plaintiff for such portion on the ground that the judgment does not sufficiently describe it.

4. A judgment of dismissal on plaintiff's own motion, and without defendant's consent, does not bar another action for the same purpose.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Santa Barbara county; B. T. Williams, Judge.

Ejectment by one Pierce against one Hilton. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

B. F. Thomas, for appellant. Wright & Day, for respondent.

HARRISON, J. Ejectment for a tract of land in Santa Barbara county, a portion of the Rancho Lomas de la Purificacion. The plaintiff had judgment, and the defendant has appealed directly from the judgment, without any bill of exceptions. 1. The land is described in the complaint, and also in the judgment, as follows: "Commencing at the N. E. corner of said rancho, and in the center of the Santa Ynez river, and thence meandering the center of said river as follows [16 courses]; thence leaving said river bed S. 34.36 chains to the center of Sec. 21, as established by A. S. Cooper, surveyor, T. 6, R. 30 W., S. B. B. & M.; thence S. 45 degrees E. to the center of the Calabasor creek; thence southerly about one mile and a half to a point directly south of the line between sections 21 and 22, T. 6 N., R. 30 W., S. B. M., as established by A. S. Cooper, surveyor; thence south to the southern line of the Rancho Lomas de la Purificacion, as patented; thence along the same N. 75½° E., 305.75 chains to the S. E. corner of said rancho; thence N. 198 chains to the point of beginning." The defendant demurred to the complaint upon the ground of uncertainty, in that it did not appear in what capacity or for whom Cooper acted when he established the center of section 21 or the line between sections 21 and 22. His demurrer was overruled, and he thereafter answered the complaint. In its judgment the court makes the same description of the land of which it finds the plaintiff the owner, and the appellant makes the same objection to the judgment as was made in his demurrer, and also urges that the description is itself uncertain. It was not necessary in describing the land to specify the character in which Cooper acted when establishing the lines therein referred to. We cannot say as a matter of law that the description is uncertain or defective. For all we know, these lines may be landmarks well known in that vicinity, and may be themselves designated by substantial monuments. Whether Cooper was a private or a public surveyor is immaterial.

If in fact the point and line referred to had been established, it is as much a matter of proof as though the reference had been merely to a pile of stones erected by Cooper. If the lines were never established, or cannot be ascertained, this fact could have been shown by the defendant at the trial. Irrespective of these references, however, the description of the land is not incapable of ascertainment. The northeast corner of the rancho, as patented by the United States, is capable of location, and is the northeast corner of the tract. The easterly line of the tract runs due south 198 chains to the southerly line of the rancho as patented, and the southerly line of the tract is the southerly line of the rancho as patented, running south 75½ degrees west for the distance of 305.71 chains from the southeast corner of the rancho. The northwesterly line of the tract is the Santa Ynez river, and the boundaries between the Santa Ynez river and the southern boundary of the rancho, as they are described in the complaint, can be readily ascertained by a surveyor. The tract of land is still further described in the complaint and in the judgment as "tracts A and B, as designated on the map accompanying the referee's report in the partition suit of said rancho," in said superior court. This reference is certain, and, for aught that appears in the record, capable of exact designation. No objection appears to have been taken at the trial to its sufficiency, or to the sufficiency of the evidence by which the court finds this to be the description of the plaintiff's land, and it cannot be said that on its face it is incapable of ascertainment. See De Sepulveda v. Baugh, 74 Cal. 473, 16 Pac. 223.

2. The court finds that the plaintiff was the owner in fee, and entitled to the possession, of the tract sued for, and that while so the owner, and entitled to the possession, the defendant entered into and upon "that portion of said premises lying immediately north of the southerly line of said tract, and ousted and ejected the plaintiff therefrom, and has withheld and still withholds said premises from the plaintiff; that at the time of the commencement of this action the plaintiff was entitled to the possession of the premises of which he had been so ousted," and rendered its judgment that the plaintiff recover from the defendant the possession "of all that portion of said tract lying north of the southerly line thereof of which the said defendant was on the 25th day of August, 1891, the date of the commencement of plaintiff's action herein, in possession." The defendant urges that the judgment is so uncertain that it cannot be enforced; that, inasmuch as the court does not designate the exact boundaries of the portion of which he is in possession, the judgment cannot be executed. It does not, however, lie in the mouth of the defendant to make this objection. If the plaintiff is entitled to the possession of the entire tract, and has been ousted of a portion thereof by the defendant, the defendant cannot complain that the judgment requires him to restore the possession of only this portion. The judgment is limited to the restoration of that portion of the tract of which the defendant was in possession at the commencement of the action, and, as the defendant does not establish a right to any portion of the tract, he could not complain even if he should be ejected from the entire tract. It is very evident from the entire record that the controversy between the parties had reference to the southern boundary of the plaintiff's tract, and that plaintiff, believing that the defendant had encroached upon his land, but not knowing the exact extent of the encroachment, described in his complaint the whole of the tract of which he claimed to be the owner. The defendant did not disclaim as to any portion of the land sued for, but denied the plaintiff's title to any part thereof, and pleaded the statute of limitations, and an adverse title in himself to the whole. He ought not now, after a trial upon these issues in which he failed to establish any of his defenses, to complain that the plaintiff merely showed that he had ousted him of a portion of that tract immediately north of the southern boundary, and not of the entire tract. Under its findings of fact, the court would have been authorized to render a judgment that the plaintiff have possession of the entire tract, and the defendant cannot complain that he is only required to deliver possession of that portion of which he had ousted the plaintiff. Vallejo v. Fay, 10 Cal. 377.

3. The defendant pleaded in his answer that the predecessor of the plaintiff had commenced an action against him to recover the same property on the 17th of June, 1887; that summons was issued in said action and served upon him, and that on the 7th day of July, 1887, he filed his answer therein, denying every allegation in the complaint; that on the 23d of July, 1888, the attorney for the plaintiff in said action entered and signed a dismissal thereof upon the register of actions kept by the clerk, and that thereafter, October 3, 1891, the court by its judgment formally dismissed said action. To this defense the plaintiff demurred, and the court sustained the demurrer. The defendant now contends that this was error, for the reason that the judgment in the former action operated as a bar to the prosecution of the present action, and cites Merritt v. Campbell, 47 Cal. 542, in support thereof. In that case, however, the judgment was rendered upon the agreement by the parties for the dismissal of the cause, and that each should pay his own costs. In the present case the action was dismissed by the plaintiff of his own motion, and without the consent of the defendant. Under such circumstances, the judgment entered upon the dismissal cannot be regarded as a bar to another action for the same purpose. Parks v. Dunlap, 86 Cal. 189, 25 Pac. 916. While the court held in Merritt v. Campbell that the facts of that case authorized it to hold that the dismissal was a bar, it also qualified its ruling by saying: "We are not to be understood as holding that a mere dismissal of an action by the plaintiff under the statute, and without any agreement upon his part to do so, is to be held to constitute a bar to its renewal, nor that a judgment of nonsuit, even, entered by consent, would have that effect, but only that a judgment of dismissal when based upon an undertaking in pursuance of the agreement of the parties must be understood, in the absence of anything to the contrary expressed in the agreement and contained in the judgment itself, to amount to such an adjustment of the merits of the controversy by the parties themselves, through the judgment of the court, as will constitute a defense to another action afterwards brought upon the same cause of action." The judgment is affirmed.

AGENT—DELEGATION OF AUTHORITY—SUFFICIENCY OF COMPLAINT—COSTS.

1. A person employed to secure a tenant for a ranch is not such an agent that he may delegate his authority; Civ. Code, § 2349, providing for such delegation of authority only in certain exceptional cases.

2. A complaint alleging an existing indebtedness on October 21, 1889, filed October 21, 1891, does not show an existing indebtedness on the latter date.

3. Where a nonsuit is granted in a civil case, the court may order plaintiff to pay the jury fees.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Alameda county; John Ellsworth, Judge.

Action by M. D. Fairchild and others against C. H. King and others. From an order granting a nonsuit, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

J. C. Bates, for appellants. A. P. Van Duzer, for respondents.

GAROUTTE, J. This is an action by Fairchild, Lawton, and Mathison, as brokers, to recover $10,000 commissions for services performed in finding a tenant for a certain tract of land belonging to defendant King. Plaintiffs were nonsuited by the trial court, and the evidence upon which they relied at the trial for a recovery is stated by their counsel, in a most favorable light for them, as follows: "Defendant King owned the ranch referred to in the pleadings and evidence. He authorized defendant Jackson to secure a tenant for said ranch. Defendant Jackson communicated with and authorized plaintiff Fairchild to secure a tenant for said ranch, and told him of defendant King's willingness to pay a liberal commission. Plaintiff Fairchild employed plaintiffs Lawton and Mathison to assist in securing a lessee; and said Lawton, Mathison, and Fairchild did negotiate with one A. L. Reed. Said Reed was introduced to defendant King by said Lawton, and defendant King entered into a lease of said ranch with said Reed." The evidence further disclosed that King had promised Jackson certain compensation if he produced a tenant. Upon this statement of facts, the judgment of nonsuit was properly granted in favor of defendant King. The plaintiffs were strangers to him. He never directly or indirectly contracted in any manner for their services. It is not claimed that Jackson was specially authorized to appoint sub-agents for the purpose of securing a tenant, as may be done in certain cases under section 2349 of the Civil Code. This case does not furnish one of the exceptions laid down in that section to the general principle that delegated power cannot be delegated. Wharton on Agency (section 709) thus states the rule: "A broker, like an attorney, is selected, as a specialist, on account of his presumed skill and discretion, and of the confidence bestowed on him by his principal. He therefore cannot depute his duties, so far as they are discretionary, to another." Plaintiffs also were properly nonsuited as to defendant Jackson. Their evidence, throughout the case, expressly repudiates the idea that defendant Jackson ever agreed to pay them anything for their services as brokers.

The complaint contains the following allegation: "That on the 21st day of October, A. D. 1889, said defendants became and were indebted to said plaintiffs, in the sum of $10,000, for services rendered said defendants at their special instance and request, as brokers, in finding a person ready and willing to lease, and in effecting a lease for the term of seven years of, a certain rancho in the county of Monterey, generally known as 'King's Rancho.'" It is now insisted that the facts therein recited must be deemed admitted, upon the ground of insufficient denials thereof. Conceding the denials of such a character as to avail nothing, still we think this allegation of the complaint of a character utterly valueless. The complaint was filed October 21, 1891. The allegation of the complaint attempts to set up an indebtedness existing October 21, 1889. An allegation of indebtedness of that date is no evidence of an existing indebtedness upon the date of the filing of the complaint two years later.

The court was justified in ordering the plaintiffs to pay the jury fees. Lukes v. Logan, 66 Cal. 33, 4 Pac. 883.

The remaining grounds relied upon for a new trial are unimportant. There is no merit in the appeal. Order affirmed.

BAILEY v. COX et al. (No. 15,416.)

(Supreme Court of California. May 1, 1894.)

CHANGE OF VENUE.

An action by stockholders of a corporation against other stockholders, the directors, and a mortgagee, to set aside the mortgage as fraudulently given by the directors for too large an amount, and to determine the amount of indebtedness to the mortgagee, is one which the mortgagee may have tried in the county of his residence, it being a personal action, and he being the only defendant against whom relief is sought.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Santa Clara county; John Reynolds, Judge.

Action by C. E. Bailey against E. J. Cox, John Tuohy, and others. From an order denying the motion of defendant Tuohy for a change of venue, he appeals. Reversed.

Daggett & Adams, for appellant. H. V. Morehouse and Hiram D. Tuttle, for respondent.

SEARLS, C. This is an appeal from an order of the superior court in and for the county of Santa Clara denying a motion of defendant Tuohy to transfer the cause from said county of Santa Clara to the county of Tulare for trial. The defendant the Buena Vista Fruit & Vineyard Company is a corporation organized June 6, 1891, under and pursuant to the laws of the state of California, and having its principal place of business at Tulare City, in the county of Tulare, state of California. The defendants John Tuohy, D. W. Madden, E. De Witt, P. F. Wood, N. A. Hummel, J. F. Boller and R. B. Bohannon were directors of the corporation. The other defendants, with perhaps one or two exceptions, were stockholders in the corporation. The prayer of the complaint asks the court to establish fraudulent dealings on the part of the directors; to set aside and cancel two certain mortgages given by the corporation to John Tuohy, who was president of said corporation, upon land in the county of Tulare, upon the ground that they are fraudulent; for a decree fixing the indebtedness of the corporation to defendants Tuohy, Cox, Wood, and De Witt; to account with and settle the rights of the corporation to and with said last-named defendants, the rights of the creditors and stockholders of the corporation.

The facts may be briefly stated thus: Defendant Tuohy was the owner of 720 acres of land and a few shares in the capital stock of two water companies, all worth $36,000, and situated in the county of Tulare. Tuohy had agreed to sell the property to defendants Cox, Wood, and De Witt, on or before September 1, 1891, for the sum of $36,000, and interest at 8 per cent. per annum. Thereupon the said Cox, Wood, and De Witt represented themselves to be the owners of the property, and by various devices, with the knowledge and consent of Tuohy, organized the corporation defendant, and agreed to sell and convey to it the property for $72,000, or double its value. Tuohy, Wood, and De Witt became directors in the company, and on the 16th day of September, 1891, Tuohy conveyed the property to the corporation for $72,000, receiving in payment $10,000 in cash, and two notes secured by mortgage on the land; one for $36,000 and the other for $26,000. Plaintiff avers that all this consideration in excess of $36,000 was fraudulent, and the result of the fraudulent acts of Tuohy, Cox, Wood, and De Witt, and many of the devices to perpetrate the fraud are set out. There are no facts stated showing indebtedness of the corporation to any person except to Tuohy upon the promissory notes secured by mortgage. Plaintiff is a stockholder in the corporation defendant, and a resident of the county of Santa Clara, as are some 14 other stockholders, out of, say, 50 stockholders made defendants in the action. Defendant Tuohy is a resident of the county of Tulare, and by timely demand, affidavit of merits, and notice moved for a change of the place of trial as before stated, upon two grounds: (1) Because the action is brought to determine the right and interest of said Tuohy as mortgagee in the lands described in the complaint, and that said lands are situated wholly within the county of Tulare. (2) Because said defendant John Tuohy is a resident of the county of Tulare, and is the only defendant against whom any relief is sought.

Under section 392 of the Code of Civil Procedure: "Actions for the following causes must be tried in the county in which the subject of the action or some part thereof is situated, subject to the power of the court to change the place of trial as provided in this code. (1) For the recovery of real property or of an estate or interest, and for injuries to real property. * * * (3) For the foreclosure of all liens and mortgages on real property." A mortgage lien upon real property is an interest therein, and the exercise by a court of the power of determining the validity of a mortgage upon such real property, with jurisdiction to annul or uphold such lien, is the determination of an interest in real property. Baker v. Insurance Co., 73 Cal. 182, 14 Pac. 686, and cases there cited. It is intimated that the court below was led to a denial of the motion for a change of the place of trial by the doctrine enunciated in Smith v. Smith, 88 Cal. 572, 26 Pac. 356. In that case the action was commenced in the county of Tuolumne against a defendant who was a resident of the county of Merced.

Defendant moved the court to change the place of trial to the county of his residence, and this court held, in substance, that the action was essentially an action for an accounting, which the defendant had a right, under section 395, Code Civ. Proc., to have tried in the county of his residence. The court further held that, in order to give the right of trial in the county where the property is situate, the action must be wholly local in character; and that, where a plaintiff unites in the same action a cause of action which is local with one which is transitory, the venue should be in the county of which the defendant is a resident. Also that the same result will follow in cause where the principal object of the action is the adjustment of questions personal in character, although as a sequence of their determination a conveyance of real property may be decreed. The distinction between Smith v. Smith and the present case is twofold: (1) Here the primary and principal object of the action is to attack and annul the lien of two mortgages upon the ground that they were conceived and brought forth in fraud of the rights of the plaintiff and other stockholders in the corporation defendant. (2) In the present case, the only defendant against whom plaintiff shows himself entitled to any practical relief is John Tuohy, who is shown to be a resident of the county to which the trial is sought to be changed. It is true that a considerable number of the defendants are residents of the county of Santa Clara, but they are made defendants without any other allegation in the complaint relating to them than that they are stockholders in the corporation defendant. As such they are proper, but not necessary, parties to the action. The defendants John Tuohy, Cox, Wood, and De Witt, according to the allegations of the complaint, planned and executed the fraud, but the defendant, Tuohy, reaped the fruits of it, and practically the only relief sought is against him; but, if it be conceded that the relief sought is against them all, and includes the other officers of the corporation defendant, the fact still remains that no defendant against whom any relief is sought is shown to reside in the county of Santa Clara. Under such circumstances, the order appealed from should be reversed, and the court below directed to enter an order transferring the cause to the county of Tulare for trial.

We concur: TEMPLE, C.; BELCHER, C.

PATERSON, J. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the order appealed from is reversed, and the court below directed to enter an order transferring the cause to the county of Tulare for trial.

HARRISON and GAROUTTE, JJ. We concur in the judgment upon the ground that the defendant Tuohy is the only defendant against whom any relief is sought, and, being a resident of Tulare county, has the right to have the cause tried in that county. The action is a personal action for the purpose of surcharging the amount of the indebtedness secured by the mortgages, and does not involve the determination of any right or interest in lands.

JOHNSON v. LA GRAVE et al. (No. 15,216.)

MECHANICS' LIENS—ABANDONMENT OF CONTRACT—MATERIAL MEN—TIME OF FILING CLAIMS.

Code Civ. Proc. § 1187, provides that every person save the original contractor, claiming a mechanic's lien, must, within 30 days after "the completion" of any building, file his claim of lien, and that cessation from labor for 30 days on "any unfinished contract" shall be equivalent to a completion thereof. Held, that persons who furnished materials to a contractor who abandoned his contract were not entitled to mechanics' liens where their claims were not filed within 60 days after such abandonment, though the owner afterwards made a contract to complete the building with another who completed it.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; John F. Finn, Judge.

Action by one Johnson against one La Grave and one Kearns to establish and enforce certain liens for materials furnished La Grave as a contractor for the erection of a building for Kearns. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

E. H. Wakeman, for appellant. John Flournoy, for respondents.

HARRISON, J. The respondent La Grave entered into a contract with his codefendant, Kearns, for the construction of a building in San Francisco for the sum of $4,956. After performing a portion of his contract, Kearns, on the 24th of October, 1891, gave to the appellant written notice that he abandoned the contract, and declined to proceed further in its execution, and thereafter did no work upon the building. La Grave subsequently made a contract with another builder for completing the construction of the building. The building was completed December 21, 1891, and the entire cost of its completion was $274 more than the original contract price with Kearns. Prior to the abandonment of the contract by Kearns, certain material men had furnished him materials for the construction of the building, which were used therein, and for which, in January, 1892, they filed, with the county recorder, claims for mechanics' liens. These liens were assigned to the plaintiff, who brought this action for their enforcement.

The court finds that, after the execution of the contract between Kearns and the respondent, and before work was commenced on the building, a sufficient memorandum of the contract was filed in the office of the county recorder, so that the right of the plaintiff to enforce his liens is limited by the contract between Kearns and La Grave. Section 1187, Code Civ. Proc., provides that "every person, save the original contractor, claiming the benefit of this chapter, must, within thirty days after the completion of any building, file for record with the county recorder" his claim of lien, and that "cessation from labor for thirty days upon any unfinished contract * * * shall be deemed equivalent to a completion thereof for all the purposes of this chapter." As Kearns abandoned the contract October 24, 1891, and as no work was thereafter done upon the building under said contract, it was incumbent upon those who would claim any lien by virtue of his contract with La Grave to file their claim of lien with the county recorder within 30 days after the 23d of November, and, as the claims of lien held by the plaintiff herein were not filed until January, 1892, they did not create any lien upon the building, or constitute any charge against the respondents. Although the appellant has specified as one of the particulars in which the evidence is insufficient to justify the finding that there was a cessation of labor upon such unfinished contract for 30 days, he does not dispute these facts, but claims that, inasmuch as, after Kearns gave notice to La Grave that he would abandon his contract, La Grave made a contract with another for completing the building, under which work thereon was resumed, there was, therefore, no cessation of work for 30 days upon the building, and, consequently, the claims of lien could be filed within 30 days after the actual completion of the building. The statute, however, makes the cessation from labor for 30 days upon any "unfinished contract" equivalent to a "completion" thereof, for all who claim a lien by virtue of that contract, as fully as though the building was actually completed. Lumber Co. v. Olmstead, 85 Cal. 80, 24 Pac. 648; Willamette, etc., Co. v. Los Angeles College Co., 94 Cal. 237, 29 Pac. 629. It is immaterial whether the building is subsequently completed by the owner or not; or, if completed, whether such completion is effected by the owner directly or through a contract with another. For the purposes of creating a lien thereon through the terms of the unfinished contract, the cessation from labor under that contract for 30 days is a statutory completion of the building, which sets the time running within which the claim of lien must be filed. For all purposes of claiming a lien the subsequent contract by La Grave is as disconnected with the one with Kearns as if it had been for the construction of a different building. The appellant's assignors had no connection with that contract, and did not furnish any materials for its performance, and it would be contrary to the manifest policy of the law upon this subject to hold that those who had furnished the labor and materials for the performance of this second contract should be postponed in the payment therefor until after the contract price of their contractor had been absorbed in the satisfaction of claims entirely disconnected with the contract under which they had furnished this labor and materials. The provision in section 1187 that cessation from labor for 30 days upon an "unfinished building" is equivalent to a completion thereof refers to cases in which the building is constructed by the owner without such contract as is required under the mechanic's lien law, and has no application if he has entered into a contract which limits the extent of his liability for liens. As the plaintiff is not entitled to enforce any lien upon the building, or to receive from the appellant any portion of the contract price, it is immaterial to him whether any portion of the moneys due to Kearns was unpaid at the time he abandoned the contract; nor is it any concern of his whether the respondent made a proper disposition of the unpaid portion of said contract price. The judgment is affirmed.

BUTTNER v. SMITH. (No. 15,427.)

OPTIONS—ACCEPTANCE—WHAT CONSTITUTES—INTEREST.

1. Defendant gave plaintiff a written option to purchase stock for $3,100 cash and the balance on time. On the last day of the option plaintiff said he would take the stock "according to the terms of the writing," but defendant, desiring time to get a portion thereof from one to whom it was pledged, indorsed an extension of 11 days on the agreement. After such extension, plaintiff let defendant have $3,100 to get the pledged stock, but he failed to do so, and, after the expiration of the option, demanded the return of the $3,100. Held that there was no binding acceptance of the option.

2. Plaintiff is entitled to interest on the sum sought to be recovered from the date of his demand for its return.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Santa Clara county; John Reynolds, Judge.

Action by Buttner against Smith to recover money paid defendant to assist him in getting possession of stock. From a judgment for plaintiff, and another denying a new trial, defendant appeals. From an order denying plaintiff's motion to add to the verdict interest on the amount from the date demand was made for its return to the date the action was begun, plaintiff appeals. Order denying a new trial affirmed, and judgment modified.

Kittridge & Krafft, for appellant. Thomas V. Cator, for respondent.

HARRISON, J. The appellant gave to the respondent the following agreement: "San Jose, Cal., May 24, 1889. I hereby grant to J. C. Buttner or assigns five days' refusal to purchase 490 shares of Union Mill and Lumber Co. stock for the sum of $15,100 on the following terms, to wit, $3,100 down on or before the 29th day of May, 1889, at 3 p. m.; $1,000, payable every six months thereafter, with interest on the whole balance, payable every six months, and the said 490 shares as security, and 20 shares additional; making 510 shares in all. * * * Chas. C. Smith." On the 29th of May the appellant desired further time to arrange about some of the stock that was held by one McCoy in pledge for an indebtedness of his, and made the following indorsement upon the foregoing instrument: "San Jose, May 29, 1889. The within agreement is hereby continued until the 9th day of June, 1889, at 3 o'clock p. m. C. C. Smith." This indorsement was made at the Garden City Bank, in San Jose, which at the same time held 170 shares of the stock in pledge for an indebtedness of the appellant, and where the respondent also had some money on deposit. After the above transaction, Buttner told Smith that he had some money to his credit at that bank, and, upon Smith's statement, in reply to Buttner's suggestion, that if he would let him have the money it would help him to get that stock, Buttner let him have $3,100. About ten days after this time, Smith saw Buttner, and told him he could not get the stock from McCoy; and about two weeks later Smith again went to Buttner, and proposed a change in the contract, by which Buttner could get the stock in some other way. This, however, was declined by Buttner. Smith failed to get the stock from McCoy, and, in August, Buttner demanded that he pay back the $3,100, and, upon his refusal, brought this suit. The case was tried before a jury, and a verdict rendered in favor of the plaintiff. From the judgment entered thereon, and from an order denying a new trial, the defendant has appealed.

As the accounts of the interviews and of the conversations between them given to the jury by the plaintiff and defendant, respectively, are conflicting, we must assume that in everything in which such conflict existed the jury gave credence to those statements which are necessary to support their verdict, and disregarded those in contradiction thereof. The appellant has not brought up with the record the instructions given by the court upon the issues before the jury, and we must also assume that the issues to be determined by them were fully and correctly presented and pointed out, and that they were also correctly instructed upon all matters of law arising in the case pertaining to these issues. Garrison v. McGlockley, 38 Cal. 78.

1. It is contended by the appellant that, although the instrument of May 24th was only an option, and binding upon Smith alone, yet its acceptance by Buttner on the 29th of May made it a mutual contract, binding upon him as well as upon the appellant; and that, consequently, he has no right of action for its breach until after an offer of performance on his part, and a refusal by the appellant. The evidence, however, fails to show that the option contained in the instrument was ever so accepted by Buttner as to give Smith the right to insist that he should take the stock. The statement of Buttner to Smith, on the 29th of May, that he was ready to take the stock "according to the terms of the writing," was conditioned upon the performance of those terms by Smith, and, if Smith had then tendered him the stock, he could have enforced the payment by Buttner; but when Smith told him that he was unable to close the transaction because a portion of the stock was held by McCoy, the conditional acceptance of Buttner ceased to have any effect, and did not become operative. The extension by Smith of his agreement until the 9th of June, which he then indorsed upon the original instrument, and gave to Buttner, had the same effect as if that date had been originally inserted in the instrument, and gave to Buttner until that date in which to accept the offer. While the transaction in which Buttner let Smith have the $3,100 involved in this action had reference to the negotiation for this stock, and may have been induced by the fact that the option had been given, it is shown by the evidence that it was made after this extension of time had been given, and was independent of the transaction. As the offer was never accepted by Buttner so as to become a binding obligation upon him, the appellant could not have been prejudiced by excluding his testimony in reference to any understanding respecting its terms.

2. When the cause was submitted to the jury, the court instructed them to give interest upon the sum of $3,100 from the date when the action was begun, and also directed the jury to make a special finding of the date at which the plaintiff made demand from the defendant for the return of this money. The jury found that this demand was made in the month of August, 1889, and the plaintiff thereupon moved the court to add to the verdict interest upon said sum of $3,100 from September 1, 1889, to the date when the action was begun. The court denied this motion, and the plaintiff has appealed therefrom. As the defendant was not entitled to retain the money after the plaintiff's demand therefor, his refusal to comply with such demand made him liable for interest thereon from that date (Civ. Code, § 3287); and the judgment should be modified by increasing the same as of the date of its entry in the sum of $377.26, the interest on $3,100 from September 1, 1889, to May 27, 1891, the date when the action was commenced. The order denying a new trial is affirmed, and the court below is directed to modify the judgment as above indicated.

(Supreme Court of California. April 30, 1894.)

CRIMINAL LAW—OBJECTIONS TO INDICTMENT—FALSE PRETENSES.

1. Objections to an information, that its allegations are uncertain, are waived, unless taken by demurrer before judgment.

2. An information for obtaining money by false representations concerning property sufficiently describes it, if it sets it out exactly as represented by defendant.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Butte county; John C. Gray, Judge.

C. A. Nesbitt was convicted of obtaining property by false representations, and appeals. Affirmed.

T. J. Crowley, for appellant. H. V. Reardon and Atty. Gen. Hart, for the People.

GAROUTTE, J. The defendant, Nesbitt, appeals from a judgment of conviction upon a charge of obtaining property by false and fraudulent pretenses and representations. No demurrer was filed to the information, and it is now insisted that it is not sufficient to support the judgment. The material allegations of the information are as follows: (1) The defendant willfully and feloniously, and with intent to defraud one M. L. Merry of his property, made to him certain false and fraudulent representations and pretenses. (2) These representations and pretenses were that he, the said defendant, and one Joseph Johnson, were the owners of certain machinery, consisting of boilers, engines, and pumps; that if the said M. L. Merry would execute, jointly with said defendant and said Johnson, a promissory note for the sum of $500, he, the said defendant, and said Johnson, would execute and deliver to said M. L. Merry a bill of sale of said machinery, as security for his joining in the execution of said note. And then and there the said defendant, for himself and said Johnson, executed and delivered to said M. L. Merry a bill of sale of said machinery. (3) Said Merry, believing said statements, and being deceived thereby, was induced to, and did then and there, execute and deliver, jointly with said defendant and said Johnson, to the Bank of Chico, his promissory note for the sum of $500, payable to the Bank of Chico, and said Bank of Chico paid defendant $500. (4) Said note was the property of Merry, and of the value of $500. The facts constituting the offense here charged are somewhat complicated, but we deem them quite well stated. In the absence of a demurrer, there is no serious objection to be urged to the pleading. A greater portion of appellant's argument, assailing the information as an unsound pleading, is addressed to its alleged ambiguities and uncertainties, but these matters can only be raised by special demurrer. Their presence in the information is not fatal to a judgment rendered upon the trial of the case. As an example of defendant's grounds of complaint, he insists that the property referred to in the information is not described with sufficient certainty. If such be the fact, it is the fault of the defendant, and not the fault of the pleader. A description of the property forms a portion of the false pretenses and representations; and the pleader was bound to set out these pretenses and representations in the information exactly as they were made by the defendant, regardless of the fact of their indefiniteness and uncertainty. We think the better practice would have been for the district attorney to have made a direct allegation in the information charging the defendant with having defrauded Merry of his note, and then the statute defining the offense here charged would have been literally followed. But this same question was fully discussed in the very recent case of People v. Weiger (Cal.) 34 Pac. 826, and an information similar to the present one in this regard was there upheld. In that case it is said: "Deception deliberately practiced for the purpose of gaining an unfair advantage of another is fraud. Goods obtained by such practices are obtained by fraud. One deprived of his property by such means is defrauded."

We see nothing upon the other branch of the case discussed by counsel demanding extended consideration. The judgment is affirmed.

NEARY v. GODFREY et al. (No. 15,239.)

DIVORCE—ASSIGNMENT OF HOMESTEAD.

Under Civil Code, § 146, providing that, in case of divorce, if the homestead has been selected from the separate property of either, it shall be assigned to the former owner, subject to the power of the court to assign it for a limited period to the innocent party, the court cannot assign it to the innocent party for a longer period than his life, and an assignment to him for 10 years is on the implied condition that he lives that long.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Alameda county; John Ellsworth, Judge.

Ejectment by Mary A. Neary against Alice E. Godfrey, administratrix, and others. Judgment for defendants. Plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Henry E. Highton, for appellant. Wm. R. Davis (W. Laird Hill, of counsel), for respondents.

GAROUTTE, J. This is an appeal from a judgment in favor of the defendants, entered upon an order sustaining a demurrer to the complaint, and the refusal of plaintiff to amend. The demurrer was upon the ground that the complaint did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, and the facts which were thus claimed to be insufficient to entitle plaintiff to relief were substantially as follows: In 1884, the plaintiff, being then the wife of one George Godfrey, and owning the premises described in the complaint as her separate property, united with her husband in a declaration of homestead, which was duly recorded. Subsequently an action for divorce was brought by plaintiff against her said husband, and in that action a decree was ultimately entered granting the defendant therein, the husband, who had filed a cross complaint, a divorce on the ground of the extreme cruelty of plaintiff. In that proceeding the homestead property was set aside to the husband for the period of 10 years, and the language of the decree is as follows: "Said homestead and homestead right, and the exclusive use and enjoyment thereof, are hereby assigned and awarded for a limited period, to wit, for the period of ten years from January 7, 1889, unto defendant, the innocent party; and the said homestead is thereafter to go, and it is assigned thereafter to go, to plaintiff as her separate property." Subsequent to this decree, the husband, Godfrey, continued to reside on the premises so awarded to him, but died within the 10 years. Before his death he again married, this second wife being the defendant administratrix in the present action. She was residing upon this property at the commencement of this action, and seven years of the ten-year term prescribed by the decree has not yet expired. The present action is in ejectment, brought by the first wife for the recovery of the property included in the aforesaid decree.

The power of the court in which the divorce proceedings were pending to award the use of the homestead (the separate property of the plaintiff) was derived from section 146 of the Civil Code, which declares: "In case of the dissolution of the marriage by the decree of a court of competent jurisdiction, the community property and the homestead shall be assigned as follows: * * * (4) If a homestead has been selected from the separate property of either, it shall be assigned to the former owner of such property, subject to the power of the court to assign it for a limited period to the innocent party." This provision of the law, respecting the length of time for which the homestead selected from the separate property of one spouse may be set aside to the other, is in all respects similar to those provisions of the Codes regulating the rights of the survivors of a family in such homestead property. See Civ. Code, § 1265, and Code Civ. Proc. § 1474. It is unnecessary to discuss what effect a decree of divorce, of itself, has upon homestead property as a homestead. In the present case the property has been dealt with by the decree of the court, and this litigation will be effectually disposed of by a construction of the terms of the court's decree in making a disposition of the property. The court could not award this property to the husband for a longer period than life; and if this decree, read in the light of the statute, will bear the construction that the right to the use ceased upon the death of the husband, regardless of the unexpired portion of the term of years, we are bound to give it such construction, for that was the limitation of the power of the court, and we must presume that the court intended to keep within its powers. As was said in Simpson v. Simpson, 80 Cal. 241, 22 Pac. 167: "The law did not authorize the court to assign the homestead, or any equitable interest in it, to the children, nor to the wife in trust for any purpose; and, in the absence of a reasonably clear expression to the contrary, the court must be presumed to have intended to act within the scope of its authority, and not to exceed it." Again, the court had the power to set aside the homestead to the innocent party "for a limited period;" but it is not necessary for us in this case to determine the exact meaning of the phrase "limited period," for it is conceded by all courts that such period cannot extend beyond the life of the party to whom the property is awarded. This principle is fully recognized in Hutchinson v. McNally, 85 Cal. 619, 24 Pac. 1071.

In this case the respondent, as the widow of the deceased, and as the administratrix of the estate, seeks under the decree of the court to hold possession of the property for a term of seven years after Godfrey's death.

If the decree, in terms, had set aside the homestead to Godfrey for life, and to his heirs for a term of seven years, thereafter it would have been void upon its face to the extent of the seven-year term at least, for such a decree would have been clearly beyond the power of the court to make. If a decree of that character would have been void, the same results should not be countenanced and approved through the present decree by any process of indirection, if those results can be avoided within the law. As is said in Simpson v. Simpson, supra: "The authority of the court, in actions for divorce, to transfer the property of either party to the other, or otherwise to dispose of it, is purely statutory; and the statute did not authorize the court to create a trust in the homestead or community property, but only to assign it directly to the innocent party, 'absolutely or for a limited period.'" In Bollinger v. Manning, 79 Cal. 11, 21 Pac. 375, we have this language: "So the fact that the court, by its order, set aside the property on which the homestead had been declared 'for the use of the family,' and not expressly to Mrs. Manning, is of no consequence. The property was community property, and on the death of the husband the title vested absolutely in the surviving wife. Code Civ. Proc. § 1474. The form of the order was, therefore, immaterial, as it did not and could not change or affect in any way the widow's rights, but simply excluded the property from administration." In Watson v. Creditors, 58 Cal. 556, it was said: "The law fixes the rights of the parties, and the title by which the property is held; and when the statute declares that the title shall vest absolutely in the survivor, no order of the probate court could make it the joint property of the husband and children of the husband and wife." This principle was aptly put in Smith v. Westerfield, 88 Cal. 378, 26 Pac. 206: "Although it is a court of general jurisdiction, yet, in the exercise of these powers, its jurisdiction is limited and special; and whenever its acts are shown to have been in excess of the power conferred upon it, or without the limits of this special jurisdiction, such acts are nugatory, and have no binding effect, even upon those who have invoked its authority or submitted to its decision." But any question of excess of jurisdiction by the court in awarding a homestead property of the present character to the innocent party for a fixed term of years, regardless of the death of such party prior to the expiration of the term, may be waived in this case. Indeed, grave difficulties arise the moment it is attempted by collateral attack to impeach a judgment of this kind upon the ground of excess or jurisdiction; for, viewed from a certain angle, it would seem that the validity of the judgment as transcending the limits of the court's authority is assailed by facts occurring subsequent to its rendition, to wit, the death of the party to whom the homestead property was awarded. The scope and effect of this decree necessarily must be limited to the life of Godfrey. It was a right assigned to him alone. It was purely personal in its nature, and when he died the right was gone. It was a personal right to a use assigned to Godfrey, the innocent party. The court had no power to assign it to any one else; and, it being a right to his own personal use, the necessity for it ceased with his death. The benign object and purpose of the statute had been satisfied when he died; and, construing the decree as being within the law, its mission also had been accomplished and fulfilled at that time. Godfrey had no further use for a homestead. His death marked the termination of the right under the law; and, reading the decree with the eyes of that law, we think it may be fairly said that a life limitation is inseparably connected with it. We do violence to no principle of construction in so holding. Unless the alleged unexpired term is an asset of Godfrey's estate, defendant has no standing in court; and that it is not such an asset we have no doubt. Godfrey had no interest under the decree that could be sold, none that could be levied upon by execution, none that could be inherited. If his estate has no interest, it follows that this administratrix, as such, has no legal standing here; and as his wife, regardless of her status as heir, she has no legal standing here. Her claim to the possession as a wife could only be based upon alleged rights passing to her under the decree in the nature of a homestead interest. But, manifestly, her claims in that direction are fruitless. The husband and wife were the only parties to the divorce litigation. The second wife, the defendant herein, was an unknown quantity at that time. The decree was not made in view of the possibility of a second marriage. She was not in the mind of the court. The decree was for the benefit of the husband alone, and it is not possible that the second marriage could deepen and broaden the effect of that decree. The fact of a subsequent marriage of the divorced husband, or that the husband was awarded the custody and care of his children by the decree, is necessarily immaterial. The court's powers came from the statute alone, and under the statute its power to award the property was limited to the innocent party alone. If it had attempted to award the property to others, the decree would have been absolutely void, as in excess of the power of the court. These things being true, it will not be presumed that the trial court intended to exceed its jurisdiction, and the terms of the decree will not be construed to that effect if any other construction is justified by its language and the law. A construction of the decree within the law may be fairly had;

and the award of the homestead property by the decree to Godfrey was for a term of 10 years, "but not exceeding his life." The judgment is reversed.

NUMSEN et al. v. LEVI et al. (No. 15,342.)

SALE—PURCHASE THROUGH BROKERS—REPUDIATION BY PURCHASER.

Where merchandise brokers present to purchasers a memorandum of the sale, or "bought note," which is accepted by them, the latter cannot repudiate the sale seven days after part of the goods are shipped, and two days after they received invoices of such shipment, because the sellers did not give a certain guaranty required by the purchasers' contract with the brokers.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; Eugene R. Garber, Judge.

Action by Numsen and others against Levi and others to recover the contract price of certain oysters sold and delivered by plaintiffs to defendants. From a judgment for plaintiffs, and from an order denying a motion for new trial, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Wal. J. Tuska, for appellants. Pierson & Mitchell, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. In November, 1891, Duval & Co., merchandise brokers at San Francisco, claiming to represent plaintiffs, who were doing business as oyster packers at Baltimore, Md., offered for sale to the appellants a lot of canned oysters at a shade off current rates. The offer was accepted upon condition that the packers should execute a written guaranty to appellants that the goods were as good in pack and quality as the goods of Farren & Co. or Fait & Weinbrenner, well-known oyster packers. A written order was given for 460 cases of "selects" and 670 cases of "standards;" the prices for both lots being fixed at $2,000. The oysters were to be delivered at Baltimore, in unlabeled cans,—the purchasers being allowed the cost of labeling,—as follows: "60 cases of selects, made up of 40 cases of 12 oz. and 20 of 6 oz. cans; and 90 cases of standards, made up of 25 cases of 10 oz., 20 of 5 oz., 25 of 8 oz., and 20 of 4 oz., cans,"—to be delivered at the cars in Baltimore, and sent to San Francisco by freight, the balance of the order by sailing vessel. Duval & Co. did not communicate with the packers, as they agreed to do, but took the written order given them by the appellants, and, without the knowledge of the latter, wired E. C. Shriner & Co., brokers at Baltimore, as follows: "Levi—selects, 340 12's, 126's; standards, 225 10's, 125's unlabeled; Numsen's labels, 124's, 222 8's, $1.45. Getz—200 selects, 12's unlabeled. Have sent shipping directions. Selects must fully equal best sample. Standards must be as good as the pool. Express us samples of both. Credit us overcharge on all 8's. W. M. Duval & Co." Upon receipt of this dispatch, Shriner filled the order by purchasing from the respondents 345 cases of standards,—225 cases of the 10 ounce, and 120 of the 5 ounce,—at the prices agreed upon by appellants and Duval & Co., and by purchasing from other parties the balance of the order, and delivered to the respondents a memorandum in writing (or "sold note," as it is called) for that portion of the order purchased from them. The note reads as follows: "Baltimore, Nov. 19, 1891. Bought of William Numsen & Sons, for account of H. Levi & Co., San Francisco, Cal. (description of the goods), terms 60 days or cash, less one and a half per cent. Hold for shipping directions. E. C. Shriner & Co." Thereupon Shriner wired to Duval & Co., to the effect that the respondents confirmed the sale to Levi & Co., upon receipt of which Duval & Co. made out a memorandum of sale, called a "bought note," and delivered it to Levi & Co., who have ever since kept it, and have never offered to return it. This bought note is in two parts,—the one covering the shipment by rail, and the other by sailing vessel. Copies of this bought note were mailed to Shriner & Co., and received by the former on November 25th; and on the last-named day they wrote to Duval & Co., confirming the sale, but no written guaranty was ever furnished. Duval & Co. had no correspondence with plaintiffs on the subject, and had no instructions from them. On December 2d, in accordance with instructions from Shriner & Co., the respondents delivered the rail shipment at Baltimore, and forwarded to appellants the invoice by mail; and on December 10th delivered the balance of the goods, and forwarded the invoice by mail. In about a week after the sale the appellants complained to Duval & Co. that the respondents had failed to confirm the terms of the sale in that they had not given the guaranty required by the contract. On December 7th the appellants for the first time disclaimed the sale. At that time the market for standards had gone down. Upon receipt of the invoices the appellants wrote to Duval & Co. that, as they had not received a guaranty from the Baltimore packers as promised, they should decline to receive any goods they might pack for them under the memorandum. Upon receipt of this letter (December 8th) Duval & Co. at once wired Shriner that appellants were trying to repudiate the contract, but nothing of this was known to respondents until December 15th, when they received from the appellants a letter dated at San Francisco, December 9th, saying that they were surprised at the shipment, as they entered into negotiations only with Duval & Co., which were not consummated; that they had not even received any invoice; and that they declined to receive the shipment, and requested respondents to make some arrangement by mail relative to the same. Other correspondence followed, in which the appellants insisted there was not a sale, and refused to pay for the oysters, whereupon this action was brought by respondents to recover the sum of $1,074.62. Findings and decree were entered in favor of plaintiffs, according to the prayer of their complaint, and from this judgment, and an order denying their motion for a new trial, the appellants have appealed.

Upon the facts stated we think that the judgment was right, and should be affirmed. It is a well-established rule that the broker is the agent for both parties. When the bought note of November 19th was furnished by Duval & Co., and accepted by the appellants, the sale could not thereafter be set aside except by mutual agreement of the vendors and vendees. In procuring the confirmation of the sale by respondents, Duval & Co. acted as their agents, and in delivering the same to the appellants they acted as the agent of the latter within the well-established rule and the custom of brokers. We think the note was a sufficient memorandum of the sale within the provisions of subdivision 4, § 1624, Civ. Code. The mere fact that the name of the vendor did not appear in the bought note did not render the latter void, it being clear that Duval & Co. were acting as brokers for the vendor. The sold note delivered by Shriner & Co. to the respondents contains the names of both the vendor and vendee, and is sufficient, under the custom of the trade, if the names of the contracting parties appear upon either one of the notes. There is no contention, as we understand it, that the oysters were not as good as Farren & Co.'s or Fait & Weinbrenner's. The appellants did not repudiate the sale until the invoices of the first shipment had reached them, five days after the shipment; and the letter of December 9th shows that they waited two days after the receipt of the invoices before they wrote to the respondents repudiating the sale. This was twenty days after they had received the memorandum from Duval & Co., reciting that the goods had been sold to H. Levi & Co., and which gave a description of the goods, and the terms of the sale. Under these circumstances we think the respondents are now estopped from denying the validity of the sale. Judgment and order affirmed.

FLETCHER v. PRATHER et al. (No. 15,667.)

Amendment of Statute — Effect—Sewer Construction—Injunction — Sufficiency of Contract.

1. Const. art. 4, § 24, provides that laws can only be amended by re-enactment at length. Pol. Code, § 325, provides that a statute amended in part is not repealed, but the unchanged portions are considered as having been the law from the date of enactment, and the amended portion as dating from the amendment. Held, that the amendment of a statute does not have the effect of repealing it, so that a subsequent amendment of the original statute, without referring to the first amendment, is inoperative.

2. The construction of a sewer under St. 1885, pp. 150–151, will not be enjoined, at the instance of one liable to assessment therefor, because the bidder to whom the contract was awarded failed to advance the incidental costs, as required by St. 1889, p. 162, § 5, where the persons to whom such costs would accrue waived them, in writing.

3. A contract for the construction of a sewer under St. 1885, p. 151, is not void, as failing to fix the time for the commencement of the work, when the superintendent of streets, at the time it was executed, and with the knowledge of the contractor, wrote, "The work to be commenced within 14 days from date of contract," at the end of the contract.

Commissioners' decision. In bank. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; J. C. B. Hebbard, Judge.

Fred. L. Button, for appellant. Davis & Hill, H. T. Creswell, and L. J. Welch, for respondents.

HAYNES, C. Under proceedings had by the board of supervisors of the city and county of San Francisco, a contract was let to the defendant Prather for the construction of a sewer constituting an outlet of a system of sewers in that part of the city known as the "Richmond District." The proposed sewer, or a considerable portion of it, is not to be constructed in a public street, but in private lands, the right of way for which has been granted by the owners. Fletcher, the appellant here, is the owner of lands within the assessment district, upon which the cost of constructing the sewer would be assessed, and brought this action to enjoin its construction. The several defendants demurred to the complaint, the demurrers were sustained, and, the plaintiff declining to amend his complaint, judgment was entered dismissing the action, and from that judgment he appeals.

The principal contention of appellant is that the statute under which the work was ordered is invalid. Section 24 of an act approved March 18, 1885, commonly known as the "Vrooman Act," authorized the construction of sewers "upon or in any street, lane, alley, court or place in such city," but did not enumerate, among the places in which sewers might be constructed, private property over which the right of way for a sewer had been secured. In 1889 the legislature passed an act entitled "An act to amend sections two, * * * twenty-four, * * * of an act entitled, 'An act to provide for work upon streets, * * * and for the construction of sewers within municipalities,' approved March 18, 1885." St. 1889, p. 157. The only change made by the amendment of 1889 in section 24 of the original act was made by inserting, in addition to sewers, culverts, etc., authorized to be constructed, the words "or cesspools." In 1893 another act was passed, entitled "An act to amend sections two, twenty-four and thirty-seven of an act entitled, 'An act to provide for work upon streets, lanes, alleys, courts, places and sidewalks, and for the construction of sewers within municipalities,' approved March 18, 1885." St. 1893, p. 172. In said section 24, as amended in 1893, the following clause was inserted: "And also for drainage purposes, over or through any right of way obtained or granted for such purposes, with necessary and proper outlet or outlets to the same." Appellant's contention is that, by the amendment of 1889, section 24 of the act of 1885 was repealed, and ceased to exist as such, and the act of 1893, which by its terms amended section 24 of the original act, was an attempt to amend a section which had ceased to exist; that, to accomplish the purpose intended, the act of 1893 should have amended "section 24 of the act of 1885 as amended by the act of 1889." It is perfectly clear that that which does not exist cannot be amended. If an entire act or an entire section is wiped out of existence by a repeal, there is nothing to amend. It is as though the act or the section had never been enacted. But it does not logically or necessarily follow that an amendment of a section of an entire act upon a particular subject has that effect. Whether by force of any provision of the constitution, or by settled rules of statutory construction, it has such effect, is the question to be considered.

The constitution provides as follows: "No law shall be revised or amended by reference to its title; but in such case the act revised or section amended shall be re-enacted and published at length as revised or amended." Article 4, § 24. In the absence of a constitutional provision of this character, a section of an act might be and often was amended in one or more of four ways: First, by striking out certain words; second, by striking out certain words and inserting others; third, by inserting certain words; and, fourth, by adding other provisions. This mode of amendment did not repeal or disturb the existence of the parts of the original section not stricken out; but the objection to this mode of amendment was that it tended to confusion and uncertainty, owing to the difficulty of correctly reading the original section with the amendments,—a difficulty which largely increased with each subsequent amendment. This uncertainty not only affected those who were called upon to interpret statutes thus amended, but it begat uncertain and confused legislation, since every legislator, before he could intelligently vote upon proposed amendments, must first know with certainty how the section, with all previous amendments, read, and what it meant. So far as the original provisions of the section remained unchanged, they were in force from the date of the original enactment; and, so far as they were changed, the new or changed provisions took effect from the date of the amendment. So far as this is concerned, no reason for any change in the operation of an amended statute is suggested in the provision of the constitution above quoted, nor is any reason for a change apparent. We therefore conclude that its whole purpose and effect are to avoid the evils resulting from the mode of amendment which might and did prevail in the absence of such provision, and that it was not intended that the section, as amended, should not take its place by its appropriate number in the original act. The provision in our first constitution in relation to amendment of statutes was the same as that contained in our present constitution; and in Billings v. Harvey, 6 Cal. 383, in commenting on this provision, it was said: "The re-enactment creates anew the rule of action, and, even if there was not the slightest difference in the phraseology of the two, the latter alone can be referred to as the law, and the former stands, to all intents, as if absolutely and expressly repealed." Section 325 of the Political Code, afterwards enacted, as it is said, to meet the foregoing decision, is as follows: "Where a section or part of a statute is amended, it is not to be considered as having been repealed and re-enacted in the amended form; but the portions which are not altered are to be considered as having been the law from the time when they were enacted, and the new provisions are to be considered as having been enacted at the time of the amendment." In Dillon v. Saloude, 68 Cal. 270, 9 Pac. 162, in speaking of section 3495, Pol. Code, which was amended in 1880 to conform to a provision of the constitution of 1879, after quoting the amendment, it was said: "The words quoted were added to the section, and 'are to be considered as having been enacted at the time of the amendment,' while 'the portions which are not altered are considered as having been the law from the time when they were enacted;'" citing the foregoing section of the Political Code. And, as if to emphasize the meaning of said section 325, section 330 of the same Code provides: "An act amending a section of an act repealed is void." Section 24 of the act in question, as amended in 1889, took the place of the original section 24 in the act of 1885; and though the reference to it in the act of 1893 would have been more specific if it had added, "as amended by the act of 1889," the intention of the legislature is evident, and the effect is to amend the amended section. This precise question arose in Com. v. Kenneson, 143 Mass. 418, 9 N. E. 761, where an act passed in 1886 purported to amend certain sections of the Public Statutes which had been amended in 1885, without any reference to the amendatory act of 1885. The argument there, as here, was that an amendment of a repealed statute is a nullity. It was held that the intention of the legislature was plain, and the amendment of 1886 was sustained. State v. Brewster, 39 Ohio St. 653, involved the same question. The syllabus upon this point correctly states the decision, as follows: "Where a section of the Revised Statutes is repealed, and re-enacted in a changed form, a subsequent statute, which, in terms, again repeals and re-enacts the original section in still another form, is, as a general rule, to be regarded as a repeal of the section in its amended form, and the section in its last form will take its place in the revision as part of the Revised Statutes." In Oshe v. State, 37 Ohio St. 501, section 6941 was amended March 9, 1880. After the amendment, Oshe was indicted for selling liquor "in violation of law, to wit, in violation of section 6941 of the Revised Statutes of Ohio," no reference being made to the amendment. The court said: "At the time of the passage of the amended section, it took the place of the original section of the revision, and was thereafter the only section 6941 of the Revised Statutes in force. The reference in the indictment, therefore, to that section of the Revised Statutes, must be understood as referring to the section then in force." See, also, Brigel v. Starbuck, 34 Ohio St. 280, and cases there cited. In State v. Warford, 84 Ala. 15, 3 South. 911, it was held that "a statute enacted in 1856 having been amended in 1868, and thereby repealed, under the constitutional provisions then in force, a subsequent statute, of 1885, amending the statute of 1856 by date and title, but not mentioning the former amendatory law, supersedes and repeals such amendatory law." Blake v. Brackett, 47 Me. 28, is also directly in point. In Kamerick v. Castleman, 21 Mo. App. 590, Phillips, P. J., said: "I understand the rule of construction, in this respect, to be that where a section of a statute is amended, and the amendment is in such terms that it takes the place of such section, the statute in which the original section stood, as to future acts, is to be regarded as if the amended section was incorporated therein. So much so is this the rule that if, by an act subsequent to the amendatory act, the section of the original statute be repealed, the amendment which stood in its stead is also repealed;" citing Greer v. State, 22 Tex. 588; McKibben v. Lester, 9 Ohio St. 627; Holbrook v. Nichol, 36 Ill. 162; and State v. Ranson, 73 Mo. 88. That the intention of the legislature was to amend the section as amended by the act of 1889 is apparent from the fact that the amendment of 1893 follows the language of the amendment of 1889 as to a provision not contained in the act of 1885, and changes it only by inserting a provision covering the construction of sewers over a right of way acquired over private property. I have cited a larger number of cases, and quoted more freely from them, than may be thought necessary, because the authorities are not uniform. Sutherland, in his work on Statutory Construction (section 132), takes the opposite view, and says: "An amendment of a section after it has been thus displaced [by amendment] is void." The cases he cites in support of this statement are, with one or two exceptions, from the Indiana Reports, and these cases are cited by appellant. The leading case in that state is Blakemore v. Dolan, 50 Ind. 194. The facts in that case were that in 1865 an act was passed requiring the common council or board of trustees of each incorporated town, at their first regular meeting in April of that year, and biennially thereafter, to elect three school trustees. In 1873 that act was amended, requiring the election, at the first regular meeting in April of that year, of three school trustees, who should hold their offices for one, two, and three years respectively, and thereafter one should be elected each year. In 1875 the act of 1873 was amended, requiring the common council or board of trustees, at their first regular meeting in June of that year, to elect three school trustees, who should hold their offices for one, two, and three years, respectively, and thereafter one should be elected each year. These amendments were regularly made, so far as the reference to the acts amended was concerned, in that respect being wholly different from the case at bar. It was there held that by the amendment "the original section is as effectually repealed and obliterated from the statute as if it had been repealed by express words; and it is upon this principle that it has been held that a section which had been once amended cannot be again the subject of amendment, but the section as amended must be amended." Goodno v. City of Oshkosh, 31 Wis. 127, cited by appellant, was correctly decided, but it involved another question. There a section of the Revised Statutes was "amended so as to read as follows," the amendment consisting of an addition constituting an exception to the general provisions of the section. It was held that the provisions of the original section became incorporated in the section as amended; that the repeal of the amended section went to the whole of it; and that, under the rule of construction adopted by statute in that state, a prior statute was not revived by the repeal of an act repealing such former statute. Upon this branch of the case, we conclude that the act of 1893, in question here, is a valid and constitutional enactment.

In view of the conclusion reached as to the validity of the statute, it becomes necessary to consider certain points made by appellant touching the regularity of the proceedings under the statute.

Appellant's next point is that, under section 5 of the Vrooman act, "before being entitled to a contract, the bidder to whom the award is made * * * must advance to the superintendent of streets for payment by him, the cost of publication of notices, resolutions, orders or other incidental expenses and matters required under the proceedings prescribed in this act." St. 1889, p. 162. The complaint shows that in this case "all persons entitled to payment of incidental expenses by the superintendent of streets, in writing, waived their right to have such expenses collected by the superintendent in advance from the contractor, as required by the section quoted." Every statute must have a reasonable construction, made in view of the purposes of the enactment. This provision was made for the benefit of those to whom such expenses were payable, and for the protection of the city, or the superintendent of streets. It is not a matter which can in any way affect appellant, or others whose property may be assessed for the construction of the sewer. It neither increases nor diminishes the amount of the assessment, whether these expenses are advanced by the contractor, or paid afterwards. Suppose the persons entitled to these incidental expenses had given the bidder receipts showing payment in full, and these receipts were exhibited to the superintendent of streets. Must he still require the bidder to pay to him the amount of these expenses already paid, and, if he fails or refuses to do so, decline to enter into the contract? Or would such direct payment by the bidder to these third persons, instead of the street superintendent, make the contract invalid if it should afterwards be entered into? If not, the written waiver above mentioned would not have the effect to invalidate the contract.

It is further urged by appellant that the contract signed by the superintendent of streets and the appellant does not fix any time for the commencement or completion of the work, unless a certain stipulation filed in court, as to certain papers annexed to the contract, shows a substantial compliance with this requirement. The stipulation referred to is intended to be considered as an amendment to the complaint, and shows that attached to the contract, at the time of its execution, was a printed copy of the specifications referred to in the body of the contract, in which it was stated that "the work must be done to the satisfaction of the superintendent of streets, highways, and squares, and must be completed within ninety days from the signing of the contract;" and at the end of said printed paper, below the signature of "John A. Russell, Clerk," the superintendent, at the time the contract was executed, and with the knowledge of Prather, the contractor, wrote the following: "The work to be commenced within fourteen days, and completed within ninety days, from the date of the contract," and signed the same with his official signature. The stipulation further states that this addition was made and signed with the knowledge of the contractor, and was understood by him to have been done for the purpose of fixing the time of commencing and completing the work. I think this was a compliance with the statute. Section 6 of the act "to provide for work upon streets," etc., "within municipalities," approved March 18, 1885 (St. 1885, p. 151), provides that the superintendent of streets "shall fix the time for the commencement, which shall not be more than fifteen days from the date of the contract, and for the completion of all contracts entered into by him, which work shall be prosecuted with diligence from day to day thereafter to completion, and he may extend the time so fixed from time to time, under the direction of the city council." Within the limits fixed by the statute, the superintendent of streets has the power expressly given him to fix the time for the commencement and completion of the work. It is not a matter left to be fixed by the agreement of the contractor and superintendent. The contractor makes his bid in view of the power given to the superintendent, and its limitations, and it is only necessary that it should be definitely fixed, with the knowledge of the contractor; and the time thus fixed then enters into, and becomes a part of, the contract. The time may be fixed either in the body of the contract, or, as here, indorsed upon it with the knowledge of the contractor, and authenticated by the official signature of the superintendent. There is nothing in Libbey v. Elsworth, 97 Cal. 316, 32 Pac. 228, or in Washburn v. Lyons, 97 Cal. 314, 32 Pac. 310, inconsistent with this view. The statute and the indorsement make it part of the contract, without the signature of the contractor to the indorsement.

In view of the conclusions reached, it is not necessary to consider whether the city and county of San Francisco was improperly joined as a party defendant. The judgment should be affirmed.

We concur: TEMPLE, C.; BELCHER, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, it is ordered that the judgment appealed from be affirmed.

PEOPLE v. DINSMORE. (No. 21,095.)

CRIMINAL LAW—TEMPORARY DISCHARGE OF JURY.

After the impaneling of the jury, and commencement of a trial, it was an abuse of discretion to discharge the jury for 63 days, on motion of the state, because one of its witnesses was unable to attend, where the nature of the offense charged was likely to create prejudice against the defendant in the community from which they were drawn.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Kern county; A. R. Conklin, Judge.

F. A. Dinsmore was convicted of rape, and appeals. Reversed.

Carroll Cook, Mahon & Laird, and S. N. Reed, for appellant. Atty. Gen. Hart and J. W. Ahern, for the People.

GAROUTTE, J. Appellant, Dinsmore, was convicted of the crime of rape, and appeals from the judgment and order denying his motion for a new trial. Many grounds are relied upon for a reversal of the judgment and the granting of a new trial, some of which we will proceed to notice.

We think the evidence sufficient to support the verdict. The course adopted in the impanelment of the jury was irregular, and not in line with the established practice (see People v. Russell, 46 Cal. 121); but it is not necessary to determine whether or not the irregularity occurring in the formation of the jury was prejudicial to the rights of appellant. We also think the information is sufficient to support the verdict and judgment. Many of the objections made thereto are technical in the extreme, and it is now too late to bring them to the attention of the court. The information appears to have been filed October 15, 1892, while it charges the offense to have been committed October 28, 1892. It is entirely apparent that a mistake has occurred in the stating of one of these two dates, and this mistake might well have been corrected by the trial court by some appropriate proceeding; but we think no such irregularity is here presented as to be fatal to the case. The information alleged, in terms, that the acts charged were committed prior to the day of its filing, and in the year 1892, thus bringing the offense without the bar of the statute of limitations. The particular date alleged in the information was not material to the sufficiency of the charge, and we see nothing in this point to justify a new trial of the action.

The remaining objection to which we shall direct our attention is more serious, and, we are satisfied, demands a new trial of the case. During the progress of the trial, and some days after the jury had been impaneled and evidence taken, a witness for the people, while upon the stand, became indisposed, and unable to proceed further in giving her evidence. At the suggestion of the court, physicians examined her condition, and reported that it would not be safe for her to again take the witness stand, for the purpose of continuing her testimony, within the next two months. Thereupon, against the objection of the defendant, the court made an order continuing the case for a period of 63 days; instructing the jurors to return into court at that time, and allowing them to return to their homes, and there remain until the expiration of the continuance. We cannot countenance the procedure here taken, and feel that the action of the court was such an abuse of the discretion reposed in it that another trial must be had. The prosecution was placed in a peculiar and embarrassing position by the sudden sickness of the witness, if her testimony was important. At the same time the conditions were occasioned by no fault or act of the defendant, and no right of his should be sacrificed, or even jeopardized, thereby. The offense of which the defendant was charged was a peculiarly aggravated one, and one which was well calculated to arouse the feelings and passions of the people of the surrounding country; and, while it will not ordinarily be presumed that jurors have been improperly influenced simply because an opportunity for the practice of improper influence has been presented, still this case is an exceptional case, and presents a most exceptional state of circumstances. The court is required to instruct the jury at every adjournment as to their duties, and especially as to their conduct during the time extending over an adjournment. The law is most jealous of these matters, in the interests of justice to all parties, and its care and anxiety to have a fair and impartial jury in every case is fully exemplified by the provisions of both constitution and statute. These 12 jurors, returning into the jury box after roaming at large throughout the county and state for a continuous period of 63 days, associating with their neighbors and friends and the world at large during all this time, and without the care and protection of the court for this long period, are not the jurors the law contemplates for the trial of a defendant charged with a serious offense. Conceding them to have been ideal jurors when the court declared the continuance, the chances largely preponderate that, under the circumstances here depicted, one or more of them did not return to the box at the expiration of the continuance in the same frame of mind as to the case as when he left it. It is highly improbable that all of them returned with minds uninfluenced by some circumstance occurring during their long vacation. While the question as to what constitutes a reasonable continuance for the purpose of securing the personal attendance of a sick or absent witness is one necessarily resting largely in the discretion of the court, and while we do not attempt, in this case, to establish any fixed rule—and, indeed, while it would be impossible to lay down any fixed rule—by which all cases presenting this question could be determined, still we are well satisfied that the course here adopted must not be allowed to pass into a precedent. It is ordered that the judgment and order be reversed, and the cause remanded.

PEOPLE v. FLOOD. (No. 21,057.)

CRIMINAL LAW—GRANT OF NEW TRIAL—REVIEW ON APPEAL.

1. On appeal from an order granting a new trial, general in its terms, it will not be assumed that it was granted on one particular ground when others were properly presented.

2. On appeal from an order granting a new trial, an opinion of the trial court, giving his reasons therefor, cannot be reviewed.

3. On appeal from an order granting a new trial, the action of the lower court will be affirmed, if there is any ground on which it can be sustained.

4. The grant of a new trial because the verdict was contrary to the evidence will not be disturbed on appeal, except for manifest abuse of discretion.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; J. M. Seawell, Judge.

One Flood was convicted of embezzlement, and, from an order granting him a new trial, the people appeal. Affirmed.

Atty. Gen. Hart (Galpin & Zeigler, of counsel), for the People. W. W. Foote, Wm. H. Chapman, Carroll Cook, and Knight & Haggerty, for respondent.

HARRISON, J. The defendant was convicted of the crime of embezzlement, and, before judgment was pronounced upon the verdict, moved for a new trial, upon several grounds, one of which was that the verdict was contrary to the evidence. This motion was argued before the court, and taken under advisement; and thereafter, on the 7th of July, 1893, the court made the following order: "In this cause, on this day, the defendant, his counsel being present in court, counsel for defendant having heretofore presented a motion for a new trial, and the same having been submitted to the court for consideration and decision; and now, the court having fully considered the same, being fully advised in the motion herein, it is ordered that the motion for a new trial be, and the same is hereby, granted." From this order an appeal was taken by the people, and thereafter a bill of exceptions was settled by the judge before whom the case was tried, which purports to contain the instructions of the court, and its rulings, during the trial, and all the testimony and evidence offered by either party, or admitted in evidence, upon the trial of the cause. In the bill of exceptions is also an opinion of the judge, given by him at the time of making the above order, in which he holds that he committed an error in a certain instruction given by him to the jury; and the argument on behalf of the people upon this appeal is chiefly directed to a discussion of the correctness of this instruction, and the matters to which it refers. We are not at liberty, however, to assume that the court granted a new trial merely because it was of the opinion that it had committed an error in this respect. The motion was made upon other grounds than this; and the order being general in its terms, and not specifying or limiting the grounds upon which it was made, in determining whether it is correct or erroneous we can only consider it in the form in which it was entered. The opinion of the judge in making the order is not a part of the order itself, but is merely his reason for making the order, and is not subject to judicial review. In Kauffman v. Maier, 94 Cal. 269, 29 Pac. 481, the court, in its order granting a new trial, specified certain grounds upon which it made the order, and denied the motion "on all other grounds embraced in said motion, save said ground aforesaid." We held that the court could not thus limit the party moving for a new trial to a review of the ground specified in the order, but that "upon an appeal from that order, this court will review the entire record upon which the order was based; and, if there be found any error in the record which would have justified the court in making the order, the order will be affirmed, upon the same principles that an order sustaining a demurrer to a defective complaint will be sustained, even though the ground upon which the trial court sustained it may be held untenable." In that case we also said: "This rule has a limitation in cases where one of the grounds upon which the new trial is sought is the insufficiency of the evidence to justify the verdict or decision. If, in such a case, the trial court in its order granting a new trial excludes this as a ground of its action, by direct language, and the record shows that there was a conflict of evidence, this court, upon the same principles that cause it to affirm an order granting or denying a new trial upon that ground, will accept the conclusion of the trial court, and not reexamine the evidence." From these propositions follows the corollary that if one of the grounds of the motion for a new trial is that it is contrary to evidence, and the order does not specify the ground upon which the new trial is granted, it must be held here that, if there is any ground upon which it can be sustained, it must be affirmed; and that, as the granting or denying a motion for a new trial upon the ground that the decision or verdict was contrary to evidence is largely within the discretion of the trial court, its action will not be reversed, unless its discretion in this respect has been abused, whether this be the only ground upon which the motion is made, or one of the several statutory grounds.

The Penal Code (section 1181, subd. 6) authorizes the court to grant a new trial when the verdict is contrary to law or evidence; and, whenever the trial court is of the opinion that the evidence upon which the conviction was had was insufficient to justify the verdict, it is its duty to grant a new trial, and its action in this respect will not be reversed in this court, unless it shall be shown that there was a manifest abuse of its discretion. People v. Baker, 39 Cal. 686; People v. Ashnauer, 47 Cal. 98; People v. Hotz, 73 Cal. 241, 14 Pac. 856; People v. Lum Yit, 83 Cal. 130, 23 Pac. 228. The appellant herein has not shown any violation of this rule, and an examination of the record does not enable us to say that the court was not justified in its action. The order is affirmed.

KRUMB v. CAMPBELL. (No. 15,220.)

ACTION ON CONTRACT.

Defendant agreed with certain heirs to look after their interests up to and including final settlement, for a per cent. of the amount received by them, and pay his own expenses, such commission to be paid as the proceeds were distributed. He then agreed to pay plaintiff for assistance two-fifths of the net amount received by him. Held, that plaintiff was not entitled to compensation until defendant had completed his contract with the heirs, and his action prior thereto, to enforce payment, was premature.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Santa Clara county; W. G. Lorigan, Judge.

Action by Louis Krumb aginst James H. Campbell. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed.

D. M. Delmas and Kittredge & Krafft, for appellant. Frs. E. Spencer, for respondent.

GAROUTTE, J. Appellant insists that this action is prematurely brought, and the conclusion reached by the court as to that contention is determinative of the litigation. The facts of the case may be briefly stated: On the 8th day of January, 1888, the appellant entered into an agreement with certain heirs of Charles Lux, deceased, whereby he engaged to give his services as an attorney to them throughout the administration of the estate of said deceased, and bear his own expenses in so doing, and, as compensation therefor, said heirs conveyed to him 3 per cent. of their interest in said estate. On the 14th day of January, 1888, the appellant and the respondent entered into an agreement whereby said respondent agreed to aid the appellant in carrying out his agreement with said heirs, and said appellant granted to him two-fifths of the amount realized by him under his agreement with the heirs, after defraying the actual disbursements of appellant in fulfilling his obligations under said agreement. The administration of the estate of Charles Lux, deceased, is still pending and unclosed, but, as the appellant has received certain sums of money aggregating about $18,000 under his agreement with said heirs, by virtue of partial distributions of the estate, respondent claims two-fifths thereof after deducting expenses incurred by appellant up to that time; and this action is brought to recover the said two-fifths, amounting to about $7,000.

For the purpose of determining whether or not respondent's (Krumb's) cause of action had accrued at the time he filed his complaint, it is necessary to consider the contracts entered into between these various parties, for it is upon the interpretation and construction of these contracts that plaintiff's right to a present cause of action is weighed and measured. If plaintiff's contract is an entirety, and he has bound himself thereby to give his services to defendant during the entire administration of the estate, it would seem that no recovery could be had upon the contract until he had rendered all the services stipulated to be performed. Defendant agreed with the Lux heirs, in consideration of 3-100 of their interest in the estate, that he would "perform any and all legal services necessary and proper to be performed in and about the said estate of Charles Lux, deceased, as the attorney of said parties of the first part, in representing them and their several interests therein, to and including the final settlement of said estate, and the final distribution thereof; and it is further agreed that said party of the second part shall faithfully perform his duty and all legal services for the benefit of said parties of the first part, * * * and that all his personal expenses and outlay in and about said services shall be borne by him individually, and at his own costs, without charge to the said parties of the first part." Under these provisions of the contract, it cannot be questioned but that the defendant bound himself to render his services to the Lux heirs as long as the estate remained in course of administration. The contract entered into between plaintiff and defendant was made a few days later. It refers in detail to the execution of the prior contract from which we have just quoted, and then proceeds: "Now, this indenture witnesseth that the said Louis Krumb hereby covenants with said J. H. Campbell that he will render all aid and assistance in his power, in such manner and ways as said party of the second part may direct, to facilitate the labors of the said party of the second part under the said agreement, and will do all acts and things lawful and proper to be done, which said party of the second part may require to further and aid the labors of said party of the second part in carrying out the terms of said agreement. In consideration of the foregoing covenants, and subject to the terms of said agreement, the party of the second part hereby grants and assigns to said party of the first part, his executors or administrators, two-fifths of the net amount of money and property realized by said party of the second part from the said estate of Charles Lux, deceased, under the terms of said agreement, after defraying the actual disbursements of said party of the second part in fulfilling his obligations under the said agreement, as the same shall hereafter be ascertained." The defendant, Campbell, having bound himself to render his services during the entire progress of the administration of the estate, we see no escape from the conclusion, in view of the plain provisions of this contract, that plaintiff also bound himself to render his services to defendant during the entire progress of the administration of the Lux estate, and that estate is now in progress of administration. Final distribution has not yet been had, and it does not appear from the record at what time in the future that event will occur. Reading the two contracts together, it must be held that the plaintiff's term of employment ends only when defendant's labors are no longer demanded by the Lux heirs under his contract with them.

Is plaintiff entitled to a partial payment as his term of service progresses? It must be borne in mind that the present action is not based upon a rescission of the contract. No default upon the part of defendant is alleged or proven. No act of his amounting to a prevention of performance is relied upon. No breach of any kind is claimed, but, upon the contrary, plaintiff stands upon the contract as the basis of his recovery. The compensation as fixed by its terms forms the measure of his prayer for judgment. Its present vitality is conceded and affirmed by the whole litigation. After a careful consideration of the various terms of these contracts, we are forced to the conclusion that the one to which plaintiff is a party must be considered as an entirety, and that plaintiff must carry out and perform all the covenants upon his part to be performed as a condition precedent to his right of recovery. It is apparent that defendant is entitled to his compensation as the administration progresses. His contract expressly so provides, but we look in vain for anything in the agreement indicating such a purpose as between these two parties litigant. It is not possible to see how the amount of plaintiff's compensation can be ascertained until the administration is closed. His compensation is a percentage of a net amount, and that net amount is impossible of ascertainment until the estate is finally settled and distribution had. This net amount is ascertained by deducting from defendant's compensation, in gross, the amount of his personal expenses incurred in the conduct of the business of his clients, the Lux heirs. The estate still being in the probate court, not fully administered, the amount of defendant's personal expenses is an unknown quantity, for only future events can determine what those expenses will be. We have no definite knowledge as to the true status of this estate. We know not what proportion of the estate has been administered upon, and passed from the jurisdiction of the probate court by its various decrees of distribution. Perchance the defendant has received practically his entire compensation under his contract, and at the same time his labors thereunder may have but fairly begun. His compensation may be fully paid, yet his disbursements upon his expense account may all be before him. His future expenses being a matter not susceptible of calculation, it cannot be said that plaintiff is entitled to recover two-fifths of the amount thus far received by defendant; nor even two-fifths of the present net amount received, for there can be no net amount, within the meaning of the contract, until all the labor is performed, and all defendant's expenses incurred. Not knowing what further compensation defendant may be entitled to, and not knowing the amount of expenses yet to be incurred, it is impossible to say that plaintiff, under his contract, is entitled to the amount sued for in his complaint. He might not be entitled to that amount upon the final settlement of the estate.

Again, plaintiff's services to defendant were to extend throughout the accomplishment of a certain undertaking, to wit, the administration of an estate. It does not appear to be contemplated by the contract that he was to receive his compensation in advance. The amount he here seeks to recover may form the bulk of his compensation, and yet the bulk of his labor may be before him. Upon a recovery here for services not yet performed, his future ardor for labor in the interests of his employer would probably be dulled, and possibly his further valuable services be lost entirely. Defendant could hardly be required to pay for services not yet performed, and then look to the courts for redress in case his employe should forsake his employement. We see no question of authority or precedent here involved. The whole matter appears to be entirely one of the true construction of the terms of this contract.

For the reasons stated, we think the contract, both as to the subject-matter and the consideration, is entire, and that the compensation that plaintiff is attempting to recover in this proceeding has not been earned, and will not be earned until he has fully performed all the labors required of him under his agreement. The action is prematurely brought, and the judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded.

PEOPLE v. GREENING. (No. 20,979.)

ARSON—INDICTMENT—EVIDENCE—ARGUMENT.

1. A building bought by N., who afterwards conveyed an undivided half of it to his partner, T., is sufficiently described as "a building belonging to the firm of N. & T., a partnership composed of N. and T."

2. When accused has made statements to the district attorney and sheriff, which the court reporter has taken down in shorthand, and written out, and has testified that his longhand transcript truly sets out accused's statements, it is not error for the district attorney in his argument to read from said transcript, though not introduced in evidence.

3. When a state's witness has testified that after defendant had been drinking in his house he went with him to burn the barn, and when defendant set fire to it witness fired a pistol, the concerted signal between him and the police, a cross-examination as to previous talks between witness and others with the police, to show that the officers knew that the fire would be set, and were near by to arrest accused, is immaterial, and its exclusion harmless, when defendant has admitted that he set the fire. Beatty, C. J., dissenting.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Sonoma county; S. K. Dougherty, Judge.

George Greening, convicted of arson in the second degree, appeals. Affirmed.

Barham & Bolton, for appellant. Atty. Gen. Hart, for the People.

HARRISON, J. The defendant was convicted of arson in the second degree, and has appealed from the judgment.

1. The property which he is charged with having burned is described in the information as "a building belonging to the firm of Noonan & Towey, a partnership composed of P. H. Noonan and Peter Towey." At the trial it was shown that Noonan & Towey were in partnership, engaged in business as butchers, and that the building was used by them in their business at the time it was burned; that the property had been bought by Noonan some years previously, and that he had afterwards conveyed an undivided half of it to Towey. This was sufficient to identify the property destroyed with that which was laid in the information. People v. Shainwold, 51 Cal. 468. It was immaterial, for the purposes of the trial, whether the building was held by Noonan & Towey as cotenants or as joint tenants. Real property may be owned by a partnership (Civ. Code, § 684), and the conveyance to the individual partners, in which they are styled as composing a firm, will be operative to vest in them the title according to the terms of the deed. McCauley v. Fulton, 44 Cal. 355.

2. While the defendant was in the county jail after his arrest, he made certain statements to the district attorney and sheriff, which were taken down in shorthand by a stenographer, and afterwards written out in longhand. The stenographer was called as a witness at the trial, and in his testimony gave these statements at length, refreshing his memory from his shorthand notes. He also had the longhand notes that he had written out, and stated that they were a true and correct statement of what the defendant had said. During the argument to the jury the district attorney proceeded to read to the jury from this statement written out in longhand, to which the defendant's counsel objected, upon the ground that the paper had never been introduced in evidence, whereupon the court said: "It appearing to the court that the paper which the district attorney holds in his hands is the paper the reporter of this court has testified to as being a copy of the statements made by the defendant as testified to by him, although the paper or copy is not in evidence, the objection is overruled." To this the defendant excepted. The record does not show what was read to the jury, or that the longhand statement was in any respect different from the testimony given by the stenographer, and, as he had testified that it was "a true and correct statement" of what the defendant had said, it does not appear that any error was committed.

3. The defendant visited the house of one Staley during the evening prior to the fire, and while there, after drinking a quantity of wine, proposed to Staley to burn the barn, to which Staley apparently assented, and accompanied him for that purpose along the railroad track to a place opposite the barn, when the defendant got over the fence, and set the building on fire. After this was done, Staley fired a pistol, which was a concerted signal between him and the officers, upon which they were to arrest the defendant. At the trial the defendant sought, in cross-examination of Staley and other witnesses for the prosecution, to show certain conversations between them and the officers prior to the burning of the building, to the effect that the officers had been informed that the fire was to occur, and that, in consequence of such information, they were near the place of the fire for the purpose of arresting the defendant. What took place between the officers and these witnesses could neither bind nor exculpate the defendant, and the fact that the defendant's intention to commit the offense was known to the officers beforehand would not palliate his crime. Even if it be conceded that the court committed a technical error in refusing to permit this cross-examination, we think that, in view of the undisputed evidence that the defendant admitted that he set fire to the building, this error did not affect any of his substantial rights. Pen. Code, § 1258.

The instructions to the jury were fully as favorable to the defendant as he could ask, and the exceptions thereto do not deserve further consideration. The judgment is affirmed.

We concur: GAROUTTE, J.; DE HAVEN, J.; FITZGERALD, J.; McFARLAND, J.

BEATTY, C. J. I dissent. The superior court erred, in my opinion, in preventing a full and free cross-examination of the witnesses for the people. Aside from certain admissions of the defendant, testified to by some of the witnesses, the evidence was quite as consistent with the theory that the fire was started by the principal witness for the prosecution, who, by his own admission, was "in the employ of the city to catch a fellow setting fire to a barn," as with the theory that the defendant started it. If the prosecution had deemed the evidence of defendant's admission sufficient in itself to insure his conviction, there was no occasion to put in other evidence. But the other evidence was put in, and, presumably, because it was deemed necessary to secure a verdict. This being so, the defendant had a right to cross-examine these witnesses as fully as if their evidence stood alone. He had a right to show upon cross-examination all the facts and circumstances of the preconcerted arrangement between the officers and the witness Staley, and to argue from such circumstances that there was a motive and an opportunity for Staley himself to commit the crime which was charged upon him; and the force of this observation is not diminished by the fact that Staley admitted that he had formerly been convicted of arson, and served a term in the state prison. When such a man is hired to detect some one setting fire to a barn, and when, as in this case, he invites another to his house, and there plies him with intoxicating liquors until his mind is seriously clouded, and then accompanies him to the building which is burned, and immediately after the fire is started fires a pistol, the prearranged signal to the officers to rush in and make the arrest,—when such, I say, is the testimony in chief, the utmost latitude of cross-examination should be allowed to the accused. If the testimony is true, such cross-examination can do no harm; if it is false, there is no other means of showing its falsity, and without it an innocent man may be made to suffer the penalty of another's crime. I think the defendant is entitled to a new trial.

HERTWICK v. NATIONAL CITY. (No. 19,221.)

LIMITATION OF ACTIONS—ACTIONS NOT ON WRITINGS.

Code Civ. Proc. § 339, requiring an action not founded on an instrument in writing, made in the state, to begin within two years, applies to an action for money paid to defendant city for a license for three months, and for damages for closing plaintiff's saloon and revoking his license after one month, though the license ordinance, the application, the trustee's action, the license, and the notice of its revocation, were written.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, San Diego county; E. S. Torrance, Judge.

Action by Charles F. Hertwick against National City for money had and received. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. Reversed.

Haines & Ward, for appellant. H. W. Talcott and E. W. Hendrick, for respondent.

HARRISON, J. The defendant passed an ordinance September 21, 1887, requiring persons engaged in the business of selling intoxicating liquors at retail to procure a license therefor before engaging in the business, fixing the amount of the license tax at $75 per month, and required that licenses should issue for a term of not less than three months. In March, 1888, the plaintiff applied for licenses to engage in said business in two different places within the corporate limits of the defendant, which were granted; and he paid therefor to the defendant the sum of $450, and received licenses in the following form: "Mr. Charles F. Hertwick, having paid into the city treasury the sum of $225, is hereby authorized to keep, conduct, and carry on the retail liquor business in said city, for the term of three months from March 28, 1888. Dated this 27th day of March, 1888. G. H. Hancock, City Clerk." The plaintiff continued to carry on the business under said licenses until April 27, 1888, when the same were revoked by the board of trustees of the defendant; and the plaintiff thereupon ceased to transact said business, and on the 9th of May demanded a return of the money paid for the licenses. This payment was refused, and March 4, 1891, the plaintiff commenced this action; setting forth the above facts, and also that he had sustained certain damages, resulting from the revocation of said licenses, and asking judgment against the defendant in the sum of $4,450. The defendant demurred to the complaint upon the ground that the action was barred by the statute of limitations, and, its demurrer having been overruled, answered the complaint. The case was tried by the court, and judgment rendered in favor of the plaintiff for the sum of $285, the proportion of the license money paid by the plaintiff for the unexpired term of his licenses. From the judgment entered thereon, the defendant has appealed.

The demurrer to the complaint should have been sustained. The action is for the recovery of money paid to the defendant, and for damages resulting from the alleged wrongful revocation of the licenses. The liability of the defendant, if any existed, was not founded upon an instrument of writing, and the provisions of subdivision 1 of section 339, Code Civ. Proc., are applicable. The facts, as averred in the complaint, that the ordinance fixing the amount of the license tax was in writing; that the application of the plaintiff for the licenses was in writing; that the action of the board of trustees with reference to the same was reduced to writing, and entered upon the records of the defendant; and that the license itself, and the notice of its revocation, were in writing,—do not constitute a written obligation, or an instrument of writing upon which the liability charged in the complaint is founded. The license was only a permission to the plaintiff to transact the business specified therein, and was in no respect a contract on the part of the defendant, nor did it create any pecuniary obligation or liability on its part. The acknowledgment therein of the money paid by the plaintiff was only evidence of its payment, and of no higher grade than a mere receipt, and did not create any obligation on the part of the defendant to repay the same, or any part thereof. Whatever rights the plaintiff had to its repayment arose from the violation by the defendant of its obligation, if such obligation existed, to permit him to transact the business, and arose by the act of the defendant in revoking the licenses. This obligation was entirely distinct from the receipt of the money, and for the enforcement of these rights the plaintiff should have commenced his action within two years after his right to recover the money accrued. The judgment is reversed.

FISKE v. CASEY. (No. 15,354.)

APPEAL—FINDING OUTSIDE OF THE ISSUES—SPECIFICATION OF ERROR.

1. Findings of fact on issues not made in the pleadings cannot be considered for the purpose of supporting the judgment.

2. On appeal, it is not necessary to specify that the evidence is insufficient to support a finding not embraced in the issues.

3. In an action to declare a deed absolute on its face a mortgage, and to foreclose same, a finding by the court that, prior to its maturity, plaintiff had claimed such mortgage to be an absolute conveyance, and refused performance of the obligation, and that such refusal stopped the running of interest after maturity, is error, when no such issue is presented.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; Walter H. Levy, Judge.

Action by Asa Fiske against E. J. Casey, administrator of Henry Shoulters, to foreclose a mortgage. From a judgment for $163.91, and for the foreclosure of the mortgage, and an order denying a new trial, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Daniel Titus, for appellant. Benjamin Healey and T. Z. Blakeman, for respondent.

HARRISON, J. September 14, 1881, Henry Shoulters made a promissory note to the appellant for the sum of $150, with interest payable at the rate of 3 per cent. per month in advance, and compounding monthly until paid. At the same time, he executed to the appellant, as security for its payment, a conveyance, absolute in form, of certain real property in San Francisco. Shoulters died at San Francisco in 1883, and in February, 1892, the respondent, Casey, was appointed administrator of his estate. March 23, 1892, the appellant presented his claim against the estate, upon the aforesaid note and conveyance, to the respondent, for allowance, and, it having been rejected by him, brought this action for the purpose of having said deed adjudged to be a mortgage upon the land described therein, and for the sale of said land to satisfy the amount of the said note. The defendant admits these allegations of the complaint, and sets up as a defense that in March, 1892, prior to the presentation of the claim to him, he had applied to the plaintiff to ascertain the amount due upon the note, for the purpose of paying the same, and having the property discharged from the lien of the mortgage, and that upon such application the plaintiff declared to him that the instrument of conveyance was not a mortgage, but was a deed absolute, and that he was the owner of the property, and that the plaintiff then refused to entertain any offer from the defendant to pay off and discharge the mortgage. The cause was tried by the court, and judgment rendered in favor of the plaintiff for the sum of $163.91, the amount of the promissory note, with interest up to the date of its maturity, and for the foreclosure and sale of the land described in the instrument. Plaintiff moved for a new trial, which was denied, and from that order, as well as from the judgment, he has appealed.

The court finds "that, prior to the maturity of the obligation created by the note and mortgage described in the complaint, the plaintiff claimed that said mortgage was a deed absolute, and that he was thereby the owner of the property therein described, and refused to accept performance of said obligation before any offer of performance was made, and did not, after such refusal, and before performance was due, give any notice of his willingness to accept performance." This finding is outside of any issue in the case, and cannot be considered for the purpose of supporting the judgment. The judgment itself depends upon this finding, as the theory upon which it was given is that the refusal therein found stopped the running of interest upon the note. It is unnecessary to determine whether this theory is correct, or whether the evidence in support of the averment of refusal in the answer would sustain such a finding, as the court has not made any finding upon this averment, and the finding which it has made is outside of any issues in the case. There is no averment in the complaint or answer that the plaintiff made any claim of ownership in the property, or refused to accept performance of the obligation in the note prior to its maturity, or prior to the date at which the defendant alleges that he sought to effect a release of the lands from the mortgage; and, even if it be assumed that the evidence before the court would sustain this averment in the answer, it would not authorize a finding that such claim or refusal had been made at any previous date. A claim by the plaintiff in March, 1892, that the deed was absolute, or a refusal by him at that time to accept payment upon the note, would not impair his right to recover the amount of the promissory note according to its terms up to that date.

Annexed to the note, and apparently upon the same piece of paper, was the following: "Please send, at my risk and request, by mail or otherwise, written or printed notice of when the annexed note falls due to me. Henry Shoulters." And the court finds that no notice was ever given by the plaintiff to Shoulters of the time when the note would fall due. It is urged by the respondent that the effect of these words is that the note did not mature until such notice was given, or at least did not mature until the presentation of the claim to the administrator. If this theory be correct, it would follow that the "maturity of the obligation" referred to in the above-quoted finding did not exist until such demand in 1892, and that the court erred in not allowing interest upon the note up to that date. We think, however, that this request annexed to the note did not have the effect to postpone the maturity of the note until the holder should elect to give such notice.

The objection by the respondent that the plaintiff has not sufficiently specified the particulars in which the evidence is insufficient to support the decision is unavailing. It is never necessary to specify that the evidence is insufficient to sustain a finding which is not embraced within the issues, as the finding itself is unauthorized, even though it be supported by evidence. We do not mean, however, to say that the specification in the present case is insufficient. It directed the attention of the defendant to the particular finding which it claimed was unsustained by the evidence. The judgment and order are reversed.

PEOPLE v. COLLINS. (No. 21,075.)

LIBEL—INDICTMENT—SUFFICIENCY.

Where the publication set forth in an indictment for libel is not libelous per se, and the indictment contains neither colloquium nor innuendo, the indictment is demurrable.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Fresno county.

One Collins was indicted for libel, and from a judgment sustaining a demurrer thereto the people appeal. Affirmed.

Atty. Gen. Hart, Firman Church, and C. C. Merriam, for the People. L. L. Cory and N. C. Coldwell, for respondent.

PATERSON, J. The defendant was indicted for libel. The court sustained a demurrer to the indictment, and the people have appealed.

We do not deem it necessary to set forth the allegations of the indictment. It is sufficient to say that the words of the publication alleged are not actionable per se, and that the indictment contains neither innuendo nor colloquium. This is an objection which can be taken by general demurrer, that the facts stated do not constitute a public offense. Where the publication is not a libel on its face, but it is claimed that the language used has a covert meaning, it is necessary, not only to allege and prove the slanderous or libelous sense in which the words were used by the defendant, but also that they were understood in the same sense by those to whom they were addressed. Edwards v. Society, 99 Cal. 431, 34 Pac. 128. This rule has been rigidly enforced here and elsewhere. Maynard v. Insurance Co., 34 Cal. 48, 47 Cal. 207; People v. Isaacs, 1 N. Y. Cr. R. 149; Bloss v. Tobey, 2 Pick. 320. We cannot determine from the allegations of the indictment what charge defendant made against Church, if he made any charge at all. It certainly does not charge him with violating any of his duties as a citizen, and the term "public prosecutor" does not necessarily mean district attorney or other prosecuting official; and, if it were otherwise, there is nothing in the indictment to show that the district attorney was charged with the violation of any official duty. Judgment affirmed.

Ex parte FOSS. (No. 21,113.)

INTERNATIONAL LAW—EXTRADITION TREATY—CONSTRUCTION.

1. The existence of an extradition treaty between the United States and the Hawaiian Islands does not prohibit the surrender by either of a person charged with a crime not enumerated in the treaty.

2. The setting aside on motion of an indictment against an extradited prisoner does not operate as an acquittal of the offense charged, nor bar his further prosecution for the same offense by indictment or information. McFarland, J., dissenting.

In bank.

Proceeding by one Foss on habeas corpus for discharge from imprisonment. Petitioner remanded.

C. E. McLaughlin, for petitioner. U. S. Webb, for respondent.

DE HAVEN, J. The petitioner, Foss, was indicted by the grand jury of the county of Plumas for the crime of embezzlement. At the date of the finding of this indictment the petitioner was in Honolulu, and there remained until February, 1894, when, upon the request of the American minister, and upon "a requisition to that effect" from the governor of the state of California, he was surrendered by the provisional government of the Hawaiian Islands to the agent appointed by the governor, to receive and convey him back to this state, there to be tried for the offense with which he was charged in the indictment referred to. The treaty between the United States and the government of the Hawaiian Islands in relation to the extradition of fugitives from the justice of either of such countries does not provide for the extradition of a person charged with the crime of embezzlement, and the warrant issued by the Hawaiian government for the arrest of the petitioner, and for his delivery to the agent appointed by the governor of this state to receive him into custody, does not refer to the treaty, but the proceedings preliminary to the issuance of such warrant were conducted in accordance with the rules prescribed by the treaty to effect the extradition of a person charged with either of the offenses for which extradition is there provided. The petitioner, upon his return to this state, was brought before the superior court of Plumas county, in which the said indictment against him was pending, and he then moved to set the indictment aside. The motion was granted, and he was discharged from custody, and within two hours thereafter a complaint was filed with a justice of the peace, charging him with the same embezzlement named in the indictment previously set aside, and he was again arrested, and, after examination, held to answer the charge before the superior court of Plumas county; and he is now in the custody of the sheriff of that county awaiting his trial.

The petitioner claims that his imprisonment under the circumstances here stated is illegal, and he seeks to be discharged therefrom under the writ of habeas corpus upon which he has been brought before this court. In support of this general contention he insists that his arrest in the foreign country, and enforced return to this state, and detention here for the purpose of being tried for the crime charged in the indictment, was and is in violation of his rights under the treaty between the United States and the government of the Hawaiian Islands. That treaty, in article 14, provides: "The contracting parties mutually agree to surrender, upon official requisition to the authorities of each, all persons who being charged with the crimes of murder, piracy, arson, robbery, forgery or the utterance of forged paper, committed within the jurisdiction of either, shall be found within the territories of the other, provided that this shall only be done upon such evidence of criminality as, according to the laws of the place where the person so charged shall be found, would justify his apprehension and commitment for trial, if the crime had there been committed." 9 Stat. p. 981. It is argued that the treaty, in thus enumerating the offenses for which fugitives who have sought an asylum in either country shall be delivered into the custody of the other upon demand of its government, in effect prohibits the surrender by either nation of a person charged with any other than one of the mentioned crimes; that the treaty is to be construed as containing an implied stipulation upon the part of the United States that a person committing any other crime against its laws than one of those named in the treaty, and who thereafter escapes to Hawaii, shall not be subject to arrest and return to the United States, there to be tried for such nonenumerated crime, even though the government of Hawaii should voluntarily surrender him for that purpose as a matter of comity. In our opinion, the language of this treaty will not bear such a construction. It is, of course, true that, when a treaty provides for the extradition of fugitives charged with particular crimes, the reciprocal duty of delivering up to the justice of the other persons charged with crime is confined to the particular cases for which the treaty has provided. Com. v. Hawes, 13 Bush, 708; U. S. v. Rauscher, 119 U. S. 411, 412, 7 Sup. Ct. 234. Thus in Com. v. Hawes, just cited, it is said: "The right of one government to demand and receive from another the custody of an offender who has sought asylum upon its soil depends upon the existence of treaty stipulations between them, and in all cases is derived from and is measured and restricted by the provisions, express and implied, of the treaty." But, while this is so, the existence of a treaty which provides for extradition for certain crimes does not deprive either nation of the power and right to exercise its own discretion in cases not coming within the terms of the treaty. It is only to the extent that the treaty imposes an obligation to surrender persons charged with particular offenses that there is any restriction placed upon the sovereign right of the nation in which the fugitive is found to either permit or refuse to permit his arrest and return to the country from which he has fled. In other words, in relation to persons charged with offenses not named in the treaty, each government, as an incident of its sovereignty, may either grant or deny to the fugitive an asylum within its jurisdiction. This conclusion is so obviously correct that no extended argument is necessary to sustain it, and the principle is thus stated in section 269 of volume 2 of Wharton's International Law Digest: "The rule, 'Expressio unius est exclusio alterius,' applies to extradition treaties, and under such treaties process can be sustained only for enumerated offenses. This, however, would not preclude in extraordinary cases, and an appeal, not on the basis of the treaty, but on the ground of comity, for surrender of a fugitive charged with a nonenumerated offense, when such offense is one which would justify such an extraordinary measure. * * * Thus, in 1796, the secretary of state [Mr. Pickering] 'expresses his concurrence with Mr. Liston [British minister at Washington] in the opinion that, while the reciprocal delivery of murderers and forgers is expressly stipulated in the twenty-seventh article of our treaty with Great Britain, the two governments are left at liberty to deliver other offenders, as propriety and mutual advantage shall direct. * * * The attorney general has just called, and thinks the opinion expressed to be correct.' Mr. Pickering to the president June 3, 1796. MSS. Dom. Let. In a letter of same date to the governor of Vermont, Mr. Pickering says: 'The reciprocal delivery of murderers and forgers is positively stipulated by the twenty-seventh article of the treaty. The conduct of the two governments with respect to other offenders is left, as before the treaty, to their mutual discretion; but this discretion will doubtless advise the delivery of culprits for offenses which affect the great interests of society.'" The crime with which the petitioner is charged, not being an extraditable offense under the treaty between the United States and the government of the Hawaiian Islands, it must be presumed that the surrender of the petitioner was made by the latter in the exercise of its own sovereign discretion, and as an act of comity. This violated no right secured to the petitioner by the treaty referred to, as that treaty does not in terms or by necessary implication deny to that government the right to surrender, or deprive the United States of the right upon such surrender to receive into its custody, fugitives charged with offenses not enumerated in the treaty. The cases of U. S. v. Rauscher, 119 U. S. 407, 7 Sup. Ct. 234; Com. v. Hawes, 13 Bush, 697; U. S. v. Watts, 8 Sawy. 370, 14 Fed. 130; Ex parte Hibbs, 26 Fed. 421,—cited and relied upon by petitioner, do not sustain his contention upon this point. Those cases simply declare that when a defendant has been surrendered in pursuance of a treaty for trial upon a specific charge named therein, he cannot be placed upon trial for any other than the particular offense named in the extradition proceeding. This rule is well settled, but it has no application whatever to the case presented by the petitioner here.

It is also contended in behalf of petitioner that he was only surrendered by the government of the Hawaiian Islands for trial upon the indictment referred to in the warrant issued by that government commanding his arrest and delivery into the custody of the agent authorized to convey him back to this state, and that, when this indictment was set aside, he had fully met its accusation, and was entitled to a reasonable time within which to return to the foreign asylum, and that he cannot be lawfully detained here to answer the complaint upon which he is now held for trial before the superior court. If it should be conceded that a fugitive from justice, surrendered by a foreign government on grounds of comity, has the same right to his discharge upon habeas corpus, when imprisoned upon a different charge than that for which he was delivered up, as if he had been extradited under the provisions of a treaty, and arrested and detained for trial upon another offense than that named in the extradition proceedings, in violation of the implied provisions of the treaty, still we do not think the petitioner here would be entitled to a discharge upon the facts appearing in this record. The order setting aside the indictment did not operate as an acquittal of the petitioner for the offense therein charged, and is not a bar to his further prosecution for the same offense by indictment or information; and, as he is now held by virtue of an order of commitment based upon a complaint charging him with the identical offense named in the indictment set aside, and to answer which he was surrendered by the Hawaiian government for trial by the state, the petitioner should be remanded. Petitioner remanded.

We concur: BEATTY, C. J.; HARRISON, J.; GAROUTTE, J.

McFARLAND, J. I dissent. The petitioner, Foss, was indicted by the grand jury of Plumas county, in this state, for the crime of embezzlement. At the time of the indictment he was in the Hawaiian Islands. A requisition was made upon the government of the islands for his extradition here to answer the charge preferred by said indictment, and under extradition proceedings he was returned to said Plumas county. He moved to set aside the indictment, and his motion was granted, and he was discharged from custody. Within two hours afterwards a complaint for embezzlement was made before a justice of the peace, and he was arrested upon a warrant issued by said justice. He now applies to this court under the proceeding of habeas corpus to be discharged. There is a treaty between the government of the Hawaiian Islands and the government of the United States for the return from one to the other country of persons charged with certain enumerated crimes; but the crime of embezzlement is not one of the crimes so enumerated. Said treaty is to be found in 7 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 606.

The first point made by petitioner is that he cannot be returned to this country and tried here for any crime not enumerated in the treaty. There are certain very strong authorities to sustain this point, particularly Com. v. Hawes, 13 Bush, 697; U. S. v. Watts, 8 Sawy. 370, 14 Fed. 130; Holmes' Case, 14 Pet. 593; U. S. v. Rauscher, 119 U. S. 407, 7 Sup. Ct. 234; Spear, Extradition, pp. 221, 205, et seq. The questions raised by this point need not, however, be here passed upon definitely, because we think that the petitioner should be discharged upon the second point made by his counsel, to wit, that, the indictment upon which the extradition was secured having been set aside, and the petitioner entirely discharged, he cannot afterwards be held upon a complaint before a justice of the peace, without having been given reasonable time to return to the country from whence he was brought. The treaty above mentioned provides that a person charged with crime shall be extradited only "upon such evidence of criminality as, according to the laws of the place where the person so charged shall be found, would justify his apprehension and commitment for trial if the crime had been committed there. It further provides that the person demanded shall be brought before a court of the country in which he is, "to the end that the evidence of criminality may be heard and considered;" and if, upon such hearing, the magistrate is satisfied that the evidence sustains the charge, he may issue a warrant for the surrender of the fugitive. Now, in the case at bar it appears that the judge at the Hawaiian Islands was presented with a certified copy of the indictment that had been found against the petitioner, with the affidavit of the foreman of the grand jury, and that he acted entirely upon the sufficiency of the evidence as afforded by said indictment. And the indictment upon which the authorities of the Hawaiian Islands acted, and which it may reasonably be supposed was considered as sufficient evidence for action there, having been set aside and held invalid by the court in Plumas county, and the prisoner having been discharged under said indictment upon which the extradition papers were based, he could not be held upon a complaint before a magistrate and proceedings which were entirely unknown to the authorities of the Hawaiian Islands, and upon which their order for the arrest of the fugitive was not in any way based. As was said in Com. v. Hawes, supra: "By providing the terms and conditions upon which a warrant for the arrest of the alleged fugitive may be issued, and confining the duty of making the surrender to cases in which the evidence of criminality is sufficient, according to the laws of the place where such fugitive is found, to justify his commitment for trial, the right of the demanding government to decide finally as to the propriety of the demand and as to the evidences of guilt is as plainly excluded as if that right had been denied by express language. It would scarcely be regarded an abuse of the rules of construction, from these manifest restrictions, unaided by extraneous considerations, to deduce the conclusion that it was not contemplated by the contracting parties that an extradited prisoner should, under any circumstances, be compelled to defend himself against a charge other than one upon which he is surrendered, much less against one for which his extradition could not be demanded." And I think the right under the treaty is one which the petitioner himself may assert. The petitioner, in my opinion, should be discharged from custody.

BRENOT v. BRENOT. (No. 19,359.)

DIVORCE—RECRIMINATION — DISMISSAL—CUSTODY OF CHILD—NEW TRIAL.

1. In an action by a husband for divorce on the ground of his wife's adultery, where the wife files a cross complaint charging plaintiff with extreme cruelty, and both charges are sustained by the evidence, the court may properly dismiss the action.

2. Where a divorce is refused because both parties are in fault, it is not error to refuse to make any order as to the custody of a child.

3. On a motion for a new trial, a specification that "the evidence introduced in this action fails to show that the defendant, at the time stated, was guilty of adultery with" a person named, is not objectionable as failing to specify the particulars in which the evidence was insufficient.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Orange county; J. W. Towner, Judge.

Action for divorce by E. L. Brenot against Jennie E. Brenot. Defendant filed a cross complaint. From a judgment dismissing the action, and an order denying a new trial, defendant appeals. Judgment affirmed, and order reversed.

Chas. S. McKelvey and H. W. Chynoweth, for appellant. Victor Montgomery and R. Y. Williams, for respondent.

GAROUTTE, J. This is an action for divorce, charging defendant with adultery. She denied the allegations of the complaint, and filed a cross complaint, charging extreme cruelty. Upon hearing the evidence the court filed its findings of fact, wherein it found the charges of both parties to be true, and denied all relief, dismissing the action. Defendant appeals from the judgment and order denying a motion for a new trial.

The allegations of the complaint charging the acts of adultery are sufficiently made as against a general demurrer. There is also no question but what a court of equity is authorized to enter a judgment dismissing an action of divorce, where both parties are seeking a decree, and the evidence discloses them to be equally guilty of the misconduct alleged.

It is claimed that the custody of the minor child was a material issue in the case, and should have been passed upon by the judgment of the court. The action was an action of divorce, and the question as to the proper custody of the child was an element of the case entirely incidental to the main relief sought, and dependent alone upon the divorce proceedings; and when a decree of divorce was denied either of the parties the court was not required to make any order as to the care and custody of the minor child. The question of costs in an equitable action is a matter resting in the discretion of the trial court. Abram v. Stuart, 96 Cal. 235, 31 Pac. 44

Defendant made a motion for a new trial, upon the ground, among others, that the evidence failed to support the finding as to the acts of adultery. Upon the hearing of the motion, counsel for plaintiff objected that the statement did not sufficiently specify the particulars wherein the evidence was insufficient. The court thereupon sustained the objection, disregarded the specification, and denied the motion for a new trial. We think the court committed an error in refusing to consider defendant's specification as to the insufficiency of the evidence. Plaintiff's action was based upon a charge of adultery. As to that allegation of the complaint the court made the following finding of fact: "That on or about August 1, 1892, and on or about September 1, 1892, the defendant did commit adultery by having carnal, sexual, and adulterous intercourse on each of the said dates with one Jeff Harlan." Defendant assailed this finding of fact as not supported in the evidence, by the following specification: "The evidence introduced in this action fails to show that the defendant, at the times stated, was guilty of adultery with one Jeff Harlan." The object of the statute requiring specifications of insufficient evidence is for the purpose of bringing directly before the mind of the court the particular point the aggrieved party desires to be reviewed, and also to give notice to the adverse party of the point of attack, and thereby enable him to produce any additional evidence found in the record which may tend to support the finding of fact assailed by the specification. In the present case we think the specification sufficiently full to meet the purposes of the law, and, in the face of the specification, after the opposing party had enjoyed the opportunity of placing in the record whatever evidence he desired bearing upon this point, the court should have passed upon the sufficiency of the evidence tending to show the said acts of adultery. The evidence upon this question upon the part of the plaintiff consists in the main of the testimony of one Jeff Harlan, who appears, according to his own statement, to be living upon the bounty of the plaintiff, and who is not only the principal witness for the plaintiff against the woman, but states under oath that he is the party with whom she committed the acts of adultery. While the court considered the evidence upon making its findings of fact, still we think it should again be carefully reviewed by the court upon the hearing of the motion for a new trial. It is of such a startling character, coming from the source it does, as to demand a most careful review whenever and wherever it is presented before a court of justice. For the foregoing reasons, the judgment is affirmed, and the order denying a new trial is reversed, with directions to the trial court to pass upon the sufficiency of the evidence suggested by the specification considered in this opinion, and to thereupon pass upon the motion for a new trial.

CROSS v. CALIFORNIA ST. CABLE RY. CO. (No. 15,190.)

NEGLIGENCE—PROXIMATE CAUSE—INJURY CAUSED BY STREET-RAILROAD COMPANY.

1. In an action for personal injuries, it appeared that plaintiff was driving a heavily-laden wagon down a steep street; that the lock chain put to hold the wagon back broke near the top of the hill, but plaintiff continued, zigzagging in and out between the sidewalk and defendant's street-car track; that defendant's car came down the hill, struck the wagon, and injured plaintiff. Held, that the absence of the lock chain was not, as a matter of law, the proximate cause of the injury, and a motion for nonsuit was properly denied.

2. Where there is evidence that plaintiff looked before going on the track, but saw no car, though he had a view of the track for 100 feet, his presence on the track at the time of the accident will not be held negligence per se.

3. Even if plaintiff saw the car approaching at a distance of over 100 feet, he will not be held negligent, as a matter of law, in driving on the track.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; John F. Finn, Judge.

Action by John Cross against California Street Cable-Railway Company. Verdict and judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Garber, Boalt & Bishop, for appellant. Henry H. Davis and P. F. Dunne, for respondent.

GAROUTTE, J. This is an action for damages for personal injuries. The verdict of the jury was favorable to the plaintiff, and defendant appeals. The plaintiff, a teamster by occupation, and in full possession of his faculties, was engaged in hauling a heavy load of boards down a steep grade on California street, in San Francisco. He put on his lock chain in order to hold back his wagon, while he walked and drove the horse. When two or three rods down the hill, the lock chain broke. Defendant's car tracks are situated upon this street. Plaintiff did not stop, or attempt to fix his lock chain, but proceeded with the load down the hill, zigzagging in and out within the narrow space between the sidewalk and the car track. This mode of travel, under the circumstances, in order to bring plaintiff and his team in safety to the bottom of the hill, required great care and attention. Defendant's car approached from the top of the hill, struck the hind wheel of plaintiff's wagon, swung it around, and squeezed plaintiff between a portion of the dummy and his own wagon. Injuries were received by him, and this litigation resulted. It is insisted that the motion for a nonsuit should have been granted upon the ground that plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence: "(1) In this, that he continued down the steep grade with a heavy load after his lock chain was broken, and the evidence shows that the breaking of the lock chain contributed directly to the alleged injury; (2) that, at the time of the accident, plaintiff had placed himself upon defendant's car tracks without first looking to see if a car was coming upon him."

The nonsuit was properly denied. Upon the first point relied on to support the motion, we are not prepared to say that the absence of the lock chain was the proximate cause of the injury, even conceding the plaintiff to have been guilty of negligence in traveling down the grade without such an appliance. Contributory negligence, sufficient in law to defeat a recovery, must be such negligence as directly contributes to the accident. Aside from this consideration, it cannot be said that it would be negligence in law to attempt to descend the hill without the lock chain. The plaintiff testified that the descent could be made safely without the chain, and the descent was safely continued by the team after the collision occurred. When the chain broke, near the top of the hill, it then essentially became a question of fact, for the jury to determine, as to what course the driver of the team should pursue. It was for the jury to say whether the driver, as an ordinarily prudent and careful man, was justified in attempting to make the descent under the circumstances that the attempt was made.

Neither do we think the party injured guilty of negligence, in law, in being upon the track at the moment of the accident. Viewing his evidence favorable to himself, which we are justified in doing upon the consideration of a question of this character, it appears that he could see the track for a distance of 100 feet, and saw no car. Owing to a steep grade and a wet track, the evidence disclosed that the car could not be stopped within a distance of 100 feet, after an alarm, and this fact most probably formed an important element contributing to the accident. The case was properly submitted to the jury.

It is insisted that the jury disregarded the following instructions of the court: "(1) If you find that the plaintiff, Cross, was negligent in continuing down the hill after his lock chain broke, and that such negligence contributed to the accident, you must find a verdict for the defendant, even if you also find from the evidence that the defendant was also negligent. (2) A man with good eyesight is bound to use it, in crossing a street-railroad track. If you find that the plaintiff failed to look up the hill, to see whether or not a car was coming, before driving upon or close to the car track, and that his failure so to do contributed to the accident, then he was guilty of contributory negligence; and your verdict must be for the defendant, even though the gripman was also negligent." All just complaint to the principle involved in the first instruction is disposed of upon the consideration of the order denying the motion of nonsuit. The jury evidently decided, in view of this instruction (if we interpret their conduct by their verdict), that the plaintiff, Cross, was either not guilty of negligence in attempting to descend the hill as he did, or that his negligence in that respect did not contribute to the accident; and, by upholding the action of the trial court upon the question of nonsuit, it is said, in effect, that the jury were justified, under this instruction, in finding the verdict rendered. There is no sound objection to the treatment by the jury of the remaining instruction. It cannot be said that it was disregarded by the jurors. As we have seen, immediately prior to the accident the plaintiff saw the track for a distance of 100 feet, and at that time it was unobstructed. Neither can it be said, as matter of law or fact, that if plaintiff had looked, and seen the approaching car at a distance of more than 100 feet, he would not have driven his team as he did drive it. Under those circumstances, he, as a reasonable man, may have thought that he would be able to leave the track before the car would be actually upon him. Hence, conceding his failure to look, under such circumstances, it cannot be said that such failure necessarily contributed to the accident. For the foregoing reasons, it is ordered that the judgment and order be affirmed.

ARMSTRONG v. LUCO. (No. 15,081.)

SURFACE WATER—DEFECTIVE DRAINAGE—QUESTION FOR JURY.

1. Though a landowner has no knowledge of defects in the pipes which drain the water from his roof, and the waste water from his building, yet, if he has means of knowledge, he is liable for injury done to his neighbor's land by reason of such defects.

2. In an action to recover for such injury, the amount of damages is a question for the jury.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; John F. Finn, Judge.

Action by Lucy A. Armstrong against Juan M. Luco. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

I. N. Thorne, for appellant. J. M. Nongues, for respondent.

GAROUTTE, J. Armstrong and Luco own adjoining lots and houses on Washington street, San Francisco. The street has a steep grade, and plaintiff's (Armstrong's) lot is the lower lot. Defendant's (Luco's) lot, adjacent to his house, is covered with planking. It is claimed by plaintiff that owing to the defective manner in which this planking was laid, and the defective drainage pipes used in carrying away the water from the roof of the building, and also used in carrying away the waste water coming from the building, the foundation of her building has been weakened and destroyed, and thereby she has been damaged in the sum of $3,000. Upon issue joined, trial was had; and, by the verdict of a jury, plaintiff was awarded $800 damages. This appeal is from the judgment and order denying a motion for a new trial. The following instructions of the court seem to fairly cover the law applicable to the facts of the case. The appellant makes no serious complaint as to the soundness of the legal principles stated. Neither do we see valid objection to be urged against them: "(1) If you should find that the damage was done, and that it was occasioned by the instrumentality of these alleged defective drains and pipes, then I ask you to pass on, and determine, from the evidence, whether the defendant had actual knowledge of the defective condition of his premises that resulted in the injury to the plaintiff, if any. If you find that he did not have actual knowledge, I will ask you then to find whether he had the fair means of knowledge,—that is, were the circumstances of the case such that a person situated as the defendant was could not, with reasonable care and observation, have escaped the knowledge of these defects; for if defendant had no knowledge, and no fair means of knowledge, he is not responsible. But the question of whether he had knowledge, or the means of knowledge, I leave to you, as a fact to be determined in the case. (2) The water upon each lot in a city, arising from rain, or from any cause originating on the lot, such as a spring, or cause of that kind, should be conducted by the owner thereof, if he wishes to have it removed, directly from it to a sewer, or other place appropriate for the receipt and discharge of the same, and not be turned or led on to an adjoining lot without the consent of the owner. No person has the right to relieve his own land from standing water, or prevent its accumulation thereon, by discharging it upon the land of his neighbor. When the owner of premises collects the water which naturally falls upon the same into a place, and conducts it from there by a pipe to his drain, he undertakes that his pipe shall be both sufficient, and shall continue so, as to the adjoining owner." Appellant's main insistence is that the evidence is insufficient to support the verdict. It is claimed that the evidence does not sufficiently indicate that water from defendant's lot did the injury to plaintiff's building, and it is also claimed that the amount of damages assessed by the jury was not proven by the evidence. Both of these elements of the case were matters of fact eminently proper for a jury to pass upon. The jury did pass upon them, and we are not disposed to disturb the verdict in these regards. It is evident that the water did injury to plaintiff's property, and we cannot say from the evidence that the damages are excessive.

It is further insisted that defendant had no knowledge of the existence of any defect in his drainage and sewer pipes that might result in injury to plaintiff's property. Conceding defendant had no actual knowledge of the defects, still the court properly instructed the jury that, if he had fair means of knowledge of such defects, then he was equally liable for the injury done. The question as to his fair means of knowledge was a matter of fact, which the jury determined against him, and we think justly so determined. For the foregoing reasons, it is ordered that the judgment and order be affirmed.

MERRILL v. MERRILL. (No. 19,319.)

VENDOR AND PURCHASER—RESCISSION—RECOVERY BACK OF PURCHASE MONEY.

Where a default by a vendor of land amounts to a rescission of the contract, giving the vendee a right to recover the amount paid of the price, the vendee need not allege or prove that he was ready and willing to carry out the contract.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; William P. Wade, Judge.

Action by Mattie Merrill against F. H. Merrill. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

W. F. Henning, R. Dunnigan, and J. M. Voss, for appellant. John D. Pope, for respondent.

GAROUTTE, J. This is an action by the respondent, vendee, to recover back a sum of money paid to the appellant, vendor, as a partial payment upon the purchase price of a certain tract of realty under a contract of sale. Respondent made no tender of the balance due, and demanded no deed, but alleged in her complaint that defendant rescinded the contract, and she bases her right of recovery upon the alleged acts constituting the rescission. She recovered judgment in the trial court, and this appeal is taken from that order, and from the order denying a motion for a new trial.

This case has once been before the court (95 Cal. 334, 30 Pac. 542) upon an appeal involving the sufficiency of the complaint in stating a cause of action. In the decision of the court in that case it was decided that, while the complaint was not perfect as an example of correct pleading, still sufficient was stated therein to constitute a cause of action for the recovery of the money paid the defendant, and this view was taken by the court upon the ground that the conduct of defendant was such as to put him in default under the contract, and that such default gave plaintiff an immediate right of action to recover the money paid. It was, in effect, held that the acts alleged in the complaint constituted a rescission of the contract upon the part of the defendant. The complaint now stands exactly as it stood when before the court upon the prior appeal, and it necessarily follows that the law of the case is established to the effect that a cause of action is stated therein. Upon the trial the court made the following finding of fact: "On the 8th day of March, 1888, the defendant elected to rescind said contract, and did rescind the same, by reason of the failure of plaintiff and of the said Froelich, her agent, to make the third payment under said contract; and defendant on said day notified said Froelich in writing that he had rescinded said contract." This finding of the court is in line with that allegation of the complaint considered upon the previous appeal, and, if it has support in the evidence, would seem to establish a right of recovery. Without making a detailed review of the evidence found in the record bearing upon this question, it is enough to say that the two letters written by defendant to Hopkins and Froelich are sufficient in themselves to justify the aforesaid finding of fact. Whether or not there was a rescission of the contract was the contested and fundamental point in the case. It was a question of fact. It was the ultimate fact in the case, and its determination inevitably pointed the judgment.

It is claimed that certain allegations of the complaint are not found upon by the court. Conceding such to be the fact, the allegations referred to pertain to probative facts entirely, and findings upon those issues become immaterial in view of the finding that there was a recission of the contract. Windhaus v. Bootz, 92 Cal. 622, 28 Pac. 557. Appellant insists that, in order to entitle respondent to recover, the complaint should have stated that she was ready, able, and willing to carry out the terms of the contract, and that she should have introduced evidence at the trial to support such an allegation. The law of the case is to the contrary, and the past decisions of this court oppose this contention. See Shively v. Water Co., 99 Cal. 257, 33 Pac. 848, and cases there cited. We see nothing sufficiently contradictory between the allegations of the complaint and the findings, or between the findings themselves, to justify another trial of this action. For the foregoing reasons it is ordered that the judgment and order be affirmed.

FELTON v. WEST et al. (No. 15,456.)

FORECLOSURE OF MORTGAGE—SECOND ACTION ON NOTE FOR DEFICIENCY.

Code Civ. Proc. § 726, provides that there can be but one action for the recovery of any debt secured by mortgage upon land, that the judgment may direct a sale of the property, and that, if the proceeds are insufficient, a judgment may be docketed for any balance. Held to apply only to actions to recover debts secured by mortgage on land situated in California; and where the holder of a note executed by a resident of California, and secured by mortgage on land in another state, forecloses the mortgage by publication, and bids in the property for only a part of the debt, he may afterwards bring a personal action in California against the maker of the note for the balance due thereon.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; A. A. Sanderson, Judge.

Action by C. N. Felton against E. A. West and others. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Reddy, Campbell & Metson, for appellants. H. G. Platt, for respondent.

GAROUTTE, J. The appellants on May 16, 1893, executed and delivered to the respondent their promissory note for the sum of $90,860.26. This note was dated, delivered, and made payable in San Francisco. It was secured by a mortgage upon lands situated in the state of Oregon. The appellants made two payments thereon, and then defaulted. Respondent thereupon began suit in the proper court in Oregon to foreclose the said mortgage. He was unable to, and did not, obtain personal service of the summons in such action upon appellants, as they were residents of California, and could not be found in the state of Oregon. Service was therefore had upon them by publication only. This mode of service appeared upon the face of the record in said suit, and a judgment in the usual form of foreclosure was made and entered therein, decreeing a sale of the mortgaged property to satisfy the indebtedness. Under this judgment the property was sold for about $32,000, and the amount was credited upon the note. There was no judgment for a deficiency. The respondent then began this action in the state of California upon the note for the balance due, to wit, the sum of about $44,000. This is an appeal from a judgment rendered in favor of plaintiff, Felton.

There is no dispute but that this is an action for the recovery of a debt secured by mortgage, nor is there any dispute about the fact of there having been a former action in the courts of Oregon to recover for this identical debt; and under section 726 of the Code of Civil Procedure appellants contend that the action cannot be maintained unless the plain and unambiguous language of that section of the Code is disregarded. Respondent insists, notwithstanding said section, that under certain circumstances there can be two or more actions brought to recover a debt secured by mortgage. It will thus appear that the sole and only question presented upon this appeal is: Under the circumstances above set forth, may a second action be maintained on the note which was secured by the mortgage? And this interrogatory necessitates a consideration of the aforesaid section of the Code of Civil Procedure upon which appellants rest the merits of their appeal. The section reads as follows: "There can be but one action for the recovery of any debt, or the enforcement of any right secured by mortgage upon real estate or personal property, which action must be in accordance with the provisions of this chapter. In such action the court may by its judgment direct a sale of the incumbered property (or so much thereof as may be necessary), and the application of the proceeds of the sale to the payment of the costs of the court and the expenses of the sale, and the amount due to the plaintiff; and if it appear from the sheriff's return that the proceeds are insufficient, and a balance still remains due, judgment can then be docketed for such balance against the defendant or defendants personally liable for the debt, and it becomes a lien on the real estate of such judgment debtor, as in other cases in which execution may be issued." Formerly, the law allowed an action upon a promissory note, and also a suit in equity to foreclose the mortgage given to secure the note. The mischief in such a practice lay in the multiplicity of suits, and the harassing of the debtor by two actions, when the creditor could readily enforce all his rights in one. A remedy for this evil was provided by section 726 of the Code, whereby the creditor was allowed to foreclose his mortgage and have a personal judgment for any deficiency in the same action. This court has construed this law so as to suppress the mischief and advance the remedy by compelling the creditor to exhaust his security before proceeding personally against the debtor. But we think it evident, from an examination of the statute, that the section quoted has no application to the case at bar. To deprive this respondent of a right of action, under such a construction of the statute, would be to permit and justify a grave injustice. This we are not prepared to do, if the statute is reasonably susceptible of any other construction. The rule is well settled in this state, and most probably in all other states, that if a statute is ambiguous or doubtful or susceptible of different constructions or interpretations, then such liberality of construction is justified as, within a fair interpretation of its language, will effect its apparent object and promote justice. Appellants' construction of the statute would not promote justice, but injustice. Neither would the statute's apparent object be effected thereby. Such a construction would result in the gravest injustice, for respondent, a resident of California, would thus have no remedy in a California court against a defendant also a resident of California, upon a matured promissory note made and payable in this state. He could not bring an action here to foreclose the mortgage, for the security is situated in another state. He could not bring a personal action at law upon the note only, for our courts would not allow him to waive his security. Neither could the object and intent of the legislature in enacting this statute be effected in this case by such a construction, for one action, either in Oregon or California, could not be made sufficient to secure all of respondent's rights.

The circumstances of this case take it completely without the purview of the section. This section only refers to actions for the recovery of a debt secured by a mortgage upon property situated in the state of California. The context clearly evidences that fact. All the provisions of the section entirely negative the idea of any other construction. We cannot assume that the authors of this legislation attempted to establish a procedure for the foreclosure of mortgages upon realty situated in other states. The action referred to in this section is an action of foreclosure upon real or personal property which of necessity would have to be situated in the state of California, for an action of foreclosure could be brought in no other place. This action must be brought "in accordance with the provisions" of a certain chapter of the Code of Civil Procedure. The section contemplates and provides for the docketing of a deficiency judgment, and declares that such deficiency judgment becomes a lien upon the defendant's real estate. The succeeding sections of the chapter enter more fully into details as to the results and consequences flowing from the judgment rendered in such an action. It is hardly necessary to say that the action for the foreclosure of this mortgage, brought in the state of Oregon, was not the action referred to in this section of the Code of Civil Procedure, nor was that action brought under any of the provisions of our Code. This section refers to actions brought in the courts of California for the purpose of foreclosing mortgages upon property situated in the state of California.

It is claimed that the case of Ould v. Stoddart, 54 Cal. 614, is opposed to the foregoing views. If it be opposed to those views, it has been supplanted as an authority by the recent case of Blumberg v. Birch, 99 Cal. 416, 34 Pac. 102,—a case which seems completely to dispose of appellants' contention as to the true construction of section 726 of the Code. But in order for this court to affirm the present judgment it is not necessary to overrule Ould v. Stoddart. In that case plaintiff brought his action in the state of Ohio to recover a personal judgment upon the note. Having recovered his judgment, he was unable to realize upon it, and thereupon brought an action in the state of California to foreclose his mortgage. It might, in good reason, be held by a court in this state, under the practice laid down in the Code, that, having a choice of actions,—one in Ohio, and one in California,—by making his choice of a personal action in Ohio he thereby waived his right of action to foreclose in this state. But this plaintiff occupied no such happy position. In bringing his action he was not free to choose between Oregon and California. He had no standing whatever in the courts of California. He was compelled to go to Oregon to bring his action. By bringing his action in the only place where he could possibly bring it, it cannot be said that such act resulted in a waiver of any rights upon his part. Upon the authority of Blumberg v. Birch we think the judgment rendered in this case should stand, and, in the absence of authority, sound reason and common justice demand an affirmance of the judgment. It is so ordered.

PEOPLE v. FEHRENBACH. (No. 21,019.)

Larceny — Testimony of Co-Conspirator — Obtaining Money by Fraud.

1. On a trial for larceny it appeared that defendant conducted an employment agency, and C., in response to his advertisement for a collector, was taken by him to the office of another (jointly indicted with him), by whom he was employed for three months, and required to deposit $100 as security for his good conduct. A few days thereafter defendant informed C. that his employer did not need his services any longer, and tried to get possession of the note given for the deposit, while at the same time he attempted to get another person to take C.'s place, and deposit $150. A part of these negotiations between such person and C. were made in defendant's presence. Held sufficient evidence of a conspiracy between defendant and the person employing C. to render the declarations of the latter admissible against defendant.

2. The testimony of another, who had responded to defendant's advertisement, that defendant tried to get him to take the position held by C. on the same terms, except that a deposit of $150 was required, and that his offer to give ample security instead of a cash deposit was refused, was admissible.

3. In such case it was not error to instruct that, where two are jointly concerned in a transaction, one is chargeable with statements of the other concerning it, made out of his presence, when the jury were further instructed that before they should consider statements against defendant, made by another out of his presence, they must find that defendant and such person were jointly interested in the transaction concerning which the statements were made.

4. The declarations of a co-conspirator are not inadmissible because he was not indicted.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; William T. Wallace, Judge.

George Fehrenbach was convicted of grand larceny, and appeals. Affirmed.

Robert Ferral and Wilson & Burt, for appellant. Wm. S. Barnes, Dist. Atty., and Atty. Gen. Hart, for the People.

SEARLS, C. The defendant, George Fehrenbach, was informed against, with one R. E. McBurnie, for the crime of grand larceny, charged to have been committed on the 1st of December, 1892, at the city and county of San Francisco, by feloniously stealing the sum of $100 in lawful money of the United States, the personal property of one Earl L. Cook. Upon a trial, defendant was convicted and adjudged to punishment by confinement for eight years in the state prison. The appeal is from the judgment, and from an order denying a motion for a new trial. Defendant kept what was denominated as the "Pacific Coast Clerks' Employment Bureau," at 1118 Market street, San Francisco. McBurnie, who is informed against with him, either by himself or with others, was located at 1122 Market street, and engaged in what defendant specifies as "the real-estate and business chance." Whether McBurnie was alone in the real-estate business, and a man named Griffith was proprietor of the business chance branch conducted in the same office, is not clear, or indeed important. On the 1st day of December, 1892, Earl L. Cook had seen a notice of defendant, published in a public newspaper, that a collector was wanted at 1118 Market street, and called upon defendant to make inquiry, and was infromed by defendant that he had a couple of places which he thought Cook could fill; that one of them was that of collector in a real-estate office, but that security was required to the extent of $150, and witness was asked if he could give it. Finding that Cook could furnish but $100 in cash, defendant undertook to arrange it for him, pursuant to which he was taken by the defendant to McBurnie, at 1122 Market street, where, after some negotiating, Cook was employed as a collector at $60 per month for a term of three months, Cook depositing $100 in cash with McBurnie as security for good conduct, for which he received a note signed by McBurnie, payable at 90 days.

The important question in the case is this: Was there sufficient evidence of a conspiracy between defendant and McBurnie, or between defendant, McBurnie, and others, to fraudulently obtain possession of the money of the prosecuting witness, Earl L. Cook, to justify the admission in evidence of the declarations and acts of McBurnie, made and performed without the presence and hearing of defendant. The general rule is thus stated by Wharton at section 698 of his work on Criminal Evidence (9th Ed.): "In cases of crime perpetrated by several persons, when once the conspiracy or combination is established, the act or declaration of one conspirator or accomplice in the prosecution of the enterprise is considered the declaration of all, and therefore imputable to all. All are deemed to assent to or command what is said or done by any one in furtherance of the common object. A foundation, however, must first be laid aliunde, by proof sufficient, in the opinion of the court, to establish, prima facie, the fact of conspiracy between the parties, the question of such conspiracy being ultimately for the jury." It will sometimes, however, occur that the facts from which the conspiracy is to be inferred are so intimately blended with other facts going to constitute the crime that it is difficult to separate them, and first present to the jury the evidence on which the theory of a conspiracy is founded. There are other cases which might be mentioned in which this general rule may well be departed from. As the jury, in all cases of this kind, are the ultimate arbiters of the question of conspiracy or no conspiracy, the question of the order of proofs may be left with safety to the discretion of the trial court. Wharton, at section 698a, says: "As it sometimes may interfere with the proper development of the case to require the trial to begin with proof of the conspiracy, in such case the prosecution may, on the trial, prove the declarations and acts of one, made and done in the absence of the others, before proving the conspiracy between the defendants, though such proof will be treated as nugatory unless the conspiracy be afterwards independently established."

The present case presents a fair example of the propriety of what may be termed the exceptional course in the order of proofs. The conduct of the parties was largely of a character such as may be properly resorted to as a matter of precaution and security in the employment of subordinates. The claim of the prosecution was that this plan was resorted to, not in good faith and for a legitimate purpose, but as a means to inveigle the prosecuting witness, and with the felonious intent of obtaining and converting his money. The testimony tending to show defendant a conspirator consisted not only in his procuring the prosecuting witness, taking him to his codefendant, and participating in the agreement with him, whereby he was induced to part with his money, but in his subsequent conduct at intervals, whenever and wherever it would seem to do most good, in endeavoring to get rid of such witness, and procuring possession of the note which the latter held. He it was who, at the end of three or four days after Cook was employed first, informed Cook that McBurnie did not need him and had no work for him, and endeavored to induce him to seek other employment, and at about the same time sought to engage the witness Ingalls to take the same place with McBurnie, and deposit $150, as he had already induced Sutherland to do. All this evidence came in in the orderly sequence of time and events, and, so far from being improper, the course adopted by the court was apparently the only one calculated to present the case fairly to the jury, as a consistent whole.

The instructions of the court to the jury upon the question of the necessity of the conspiracy being proven before the defendant could be bound by the declarations of others were all that the defendant asked, and all that the law requires. W. C. Ingalls was called as a witness for the prosecution, and testified, in substance, that, on the same day that Cook went to the office of defendant, he (the witness) also visited the same office, registered, and paid defendant therefor $1, and was told to come back in the afternoon, which he did, and was then told by defendant that he had a position as clerk in an office, doing outside work, collecting, etc., and that they required $150. Witness could not give that much, but told him he could give $60 or $70. Defendant then took witness to McBurnie at 1122 Market street, and introduced him. A man named Tyler was also in the room, and was consulted by McBurnie, after which witness was informed the amount he could deposit was not sufficient. Fehrenbach was present, and suggested that witness deposit $80, and then draw money on account of his wages to live upon. The witness was not willing to do this, and he and defendant left together. The witness informed defendant he was expecting some more money from the east, and would probably receive it in about a week, and was then told to come again when he received it. At the end of, say, a week, the witness went again to defendant's office, and, in answer to an inquiry, told the latter he was prepared. Defendant then introduced witness to either McBurnie or Griffith, who was in the room with defendant, and who defendant said was his clerk, and told the clerk to take witness "up to that office where they wanted a clerk." The witness is taken to the McBurnie office, introduced to Tyler, who asks him if the gentleman explained the business to him, whereupon they have a conversation on the subject of the employment, the witness proposing to deposit his money in a bank and give security, but Tyler will consent to nothing but a deposit of the money with him as security for the faithful performance by witness of his duties as a clerk. McBurnie or Griffith (the witness was not sure which it was) was present at this interview. Tyler was the party who witnessed the contract between Cook and McBurnie, and whether he was a partner with the latter, or a clerk, does not clearly appear. Defendant spoke of the occupants of McBurnie's office as a firm; said the firm was thoroughly responsible in every way. McBurnie, Griffith, and Tyler had an office together, and defendant took another witness in for a like purpose, and vouched for the reliability of the firm; said the "firm was all right," etc. To this testimony of said Ingalls objection was made, and overruled by the court, and thereafter counsel for defendant moved to strike out the testimony as to the conversation between the witness and Tyler upon the ground that it was not had in the presence of defendant, and with which the defendant had nothing to do. The objection was overruled, an exception noted, and the ruling is assigned as error. We think the testimony was admissible for the purpose for which it was offered. It must be borne in mind that it did not go to the direct guilt of defendant in feloniously taking the money of Cook, but was introduced merely for the purpose of showing guilty knowledge on the part of defendant in other and similar transactions, with a view of determining the motive in the transaction in issue. The negotiations commenced between defendant and the witness. Defendant stated the precise terms upon which the witness would be employed. That he took him to McBurnie, and they talked the matter over, Tyler being present, and the bargain was not consummated because witness did not possess the requisite $150. That when he called again at the office of defendant, and signified his readiness to comply with the terms proposed, defendant sent either McBurnie or Griffith with him to the McBurnie office, where they found Tyler, and carried on the negotiation upon the precise lines indicated by defendant. There is some evidence that McBurnie was present. There is also evidence in the record from which it may be inferred that Griffith, McBurnie, Tyler, and defendant filled the various relations of partner, principal, agent, clerk, and independent operators, at different times, and there was some testimony tending to show that Tyler was a conspirator with the others. This being so, the fact that he was not prosecuted with defendant and McBurnie is of no moment. The declarations of a co-conspirator who is not prosecuted are equally admissible with those of one under indictment and prosecution. Again, the declarations of Tyler were of no importance beyond the fact that he adhered to the terms indicated by McBurnie and defendant as the basis upon which the witness would be employed, viz. upon the deposit of $150 in cash. In any point of view which we take of the case, the error assigned does not call for a reversal of the judgment. Like considerations apply to the other objections made to testimony of other witnesses.

Appellant takes excerpts from the charge of the judge to the jury, and objects to them as violative of law. The following is a fair sample: "We all know that one man cannot be charged with what another man, disconnected from him, and out of his presence and hearing, does, nor with what he says; but, if the two are jointly concerned in the enterprise, then it is admissible, contrary to the usual rule, and I have admitted here divers and sundry conversations and acts done by McBurnie out of the immediate presence of Fehrenbach; but it is proper to understand that they were admitted because the charge on the part of the prosecution is that they were both concerned in this act." The argument of appellant is that this instruction was the equivalent that a bare suggestion by the prosecution of a defendant's guilt can take the place of proof of a charge, etc. The learned counsel seems to overlook the fact that this was preliminary to the instruction which was given by the court, as follows: "While I have admitted the testimony,—this testimony of what McBurnie said and did out of the immediate presence of the defendant, Fehrenbach,—while I have admitted it because of the claim of the prosecution that the two were jointly concerned, if you don't believe, and are not satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt, that they were both concerned and confederated in the alleged crime, you must not consider that testimony as against Fehrenbach. It is put before you only because it is a question also before you whether or not these men were jointly concerned. If you think they were, —if you are satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt that they were,—then the testimony of McBurnie's acts and declarations, without the immediate presence of Fehrenbach, is testimony to be considered. Unless you be so satisfied, it is to be put out of the case by you." The instruction thus taken as a whole contains a clear statement of the law properly applicable to the case, and is not subject to just criticism. The same may be said of the strictures indulged in as to other parts of the charge. They are too lengthy to quote in refutation of the objections. The instruction as to the weight to be given to the testimony of the defendant, who was a witness in his own behalf, was in line with like instructions which have been approved by this court in repeated instances. People v. O'Brien, 96 Cal. 173, 31 Pac. 45; People v. O'Neal, 67 Cal. 378, 7 Pac. 790; People v. Cronin, 34 Cal. 195; People v. Morrow, 60 Cal. 147; People v. Wheeler, 65 Cal. 77, 2 Pac. 892. The evidence was sufficient to support the verdict, and there was no abuse of discretion by the court below in refusing to postpone the trial. The judgment and order appealed from should be affirmed.

DUNLOP et al. v. KENNEDY et al. (No. 15,112.)

Mechanic's Lien—Filing Contract.

A contract for the erection of a building costing more than $1,000, "in conformity with plans, drawings, and specifications," is void where such plans and specifications are not filed with the contract in the recorder's office, and cannot limit the extent of mechanics' liens on such building.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; William T. Wallace, Judge.

Action by Charles Dunlop and others against Alice Kennedy and others to enforce mechanics' liens. From a judgment for plaintiffs, and an order denying a new trial, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Wm. H. H. Hart and Nowlin & Fassett, for appellants. Parker & Eells, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. This action was brought to enforce mechanics' liens. Plaintiffs recovered judgment, and defendants Alice Kennedy and John F. Kennedy now appeal from the judgment and from an order denying a new trial.

The contract was in writing, and in it Grey Stover contracted with Alice Kennedy, who is the wife of defendant John F. Kennedy, and was the reputed owner of the premises described, to construct a three-story dwelling house, and to furnish materials for the same. The contract price was $6,600. It was provided that partial payments were to be made in amounts equal to 75 per cent. of the value of the work done and materials furnished at the time of the payments, provided that, when each installment became due, a certificate should be obtained from the architect of the amount due; and it was made the duty of the architect at said times to deliver such certificate, or to state what defect had to be remedied to entitle the contractor to it. If the architect failed to deliver the certificate or give a reason for three days after demand, then the contractor should be entitled to the payment. The contractors abandoned the work when, as the trial court found, three-fourths of the work called for had been done. At that time the cost of the work performed and materials furnished was $6,941.86, a sum exceeding the full contract price. If this sum is only 75 per cent. of what would be required to complete the contract, as the court found, it would be estimated at contract rates as worth $4,950, which would be the value of the work and materials which had then been furnished, estimated as directed in section 1200, Code Civ. Proc. The court found that there had been paid on the contract only $3,000, which, deducted from the estimated value of the materials furnished and work performed, would leave $1,950 to be applied to the payment of liens. This would furnish ample means with which to pay the liens of plaintiffs in full, since other claimants filed no liens. But appellants claim that the evidence shows that there was more than $3,000 paid; that there was due defendant John F. Kennedy $1,000 for lumber furnished, and that it was agreed that the owner should have credit for that. The specification of the insufficiency of the evidence to sustain the finding that only $3,000 had been paid is, in effect, that the evidence shows that, considering the materials on hand, there was sufficient work done to warrant the payment of $4,000, when it was agreed that the owner was entitled to a credit for that sum. But this specification is not sufficient. It does not appear that there was a certificate of the architect to the effect that the contractors were entitled to the payment, nor does it appear that circumstances existed which would entitle the contractors to the payment without such certificate. But this view is not presented by appellants, nor is it necessary to rely upon it to sustain the judgment. The contract was not filed in the recorder's office, and the memorandum filed was fatally defective, in that it contained no sufficient statement of the general character of the work to be done. That part of the memorandum is as follows: "Third. The general character of the work to be done under said contract is as follows, to wit: The said Grey Stover, as contractor, agrees with the said Mrs. Alice Kennedy, as owner, to furnish the necessary labor and materials, including tools, implements, and appliances required in the execution of the carpenter, painting, plumbing, and cement works,—in fact, all work specified in the specifications furnished by the within-named architect. The cement work consists of all work in connection with the new building, such as sidewalk; walkway at westerly side of new building and in the lower rear yard; also, sidewalk in front of lot adjoining, running easterly forty-two (42) feet, and all walkways and yards in connection with said lot, said walkways to be curbed and put in as directed by the owner (said lot runs from Austin street through to Pine street) in a workmanlike manner, in conformity with the plans, drawings, and specifications for the same made by Jas. E. Wolfe, the authorized architect employed by the owner, and which are signed by the parties hereto, and are to be kept and remain in the office of said architect, subject to the inspection of the parties hereto, and others concerned in said erection." This is manifestly as defective as was the memorandum in Willamette Steam Mills Lumbering & Manuf'g Co. v. Los Angeles College Co., 94 Cal. 229, 29 Pac. 629, or in the more recent case of Greig v. Riordan (Cal.) 33 Pac. 913. In these two cases the policy of the law is elaborately discussed, and it is unnecessary to repeat the reasoning here. The contract being void, the lienors were entitled to recover the full value of the materials furnished, irrespective of the contract price. The other points raised are based upon the supposed contract, which being void, there is no foundation for the contention of defendants. The judgment and order are affirmed.

NOYES v. WOOD et al. (No. 15,374.)

NEGLIGENCE OF FELLOW SERVANT—GRADE OF EMPLOYMENT—FOREMAN.

A master is not liable to an employe injured through the negligence of his foreman in erecting a defective scaffold for him to work upon, as such foreman is a fellow servant.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Alameda county; F. W. Henshaw, Judge.

Action by William D. Noyes against Al. Wood and Charles Wood to recover damages for personal injuries. There was a verdict and judgment for plaintiff, and, from an order granting a new trial, plaintiff appeals. Order affirmed.

Edw. C. Robinson and Edward A. Holman, for appellant. C. T. Johns and J. C. Martin, for respondents.

TEMPLE, C. This is an action to recover damages for personal injuries received by plaintiff while in the employ of defendants. It is charged in the complaint that defendants employed plaintiff as a journeyman painter, to assist in painting a barn which defendants had contracted with the owner, Mr. Pierce, to paint; that it became the duty of defendants, as his employers, to furnish ladders to be used in the work, and that they furnished ladders which were too short to enable him to perform the work, and therefore defendants erected a scaffold, and placed a short ladder upon it; that, through the negligence of the defendants, the scaffold was defective, insufficient, and insecure, whereby plaintiff was injured. Verdict and judgment were entered for plaintiff, and thereupon defendants moved for a new trial, specifying many respects in which they claimed that the evidence was insufficient, as also several alleged errors occurring on the trial. A new trial was granted, and, from the order, plaintiff appeals.

In the order granting a new trial, the judge stated that the motion was granted "on the sole ground that the evidence does not show that said Wayne was a foreman or vice principal, but does show that said Wayne was a fellow servant with plaintiff, in the same general business; upon all other grounds of said motion for a new trial the court finds for plaintiff against defendants." Plaintiff testified that Wayne was foreman and in charge of the work for defendants, and, as such, put up the scaffold and ladder which fell with plaintiff. It is therefore claimed that the negligence of Wayne was the negligence of his principals (the defendants). Upon this theory the case was tried, and is argued here by appellant. Of course, under repeated decisions of this court, the grade of work of employes is an immaterial circumstance. Defendants would not have been liable to the plaintiff for the negligence of Wayne, even if he had had entire charge and control of the work, with full power to hire and discharge the men. Daves v. Southern Pac. Co., 98 Cal. 19, 32 Pac. 708; Congrave v. Railroad Co., 88 Cal. 360, 26 Pac. 175; Burns v. Sennett, 99 Cal. 363, 33 Pac. 916; Stevens v. Railroad Co. (Cal.) 35 Pac. 165. He was still but a fellow servant with plaintiff, and, as his competency is not questioned, defendants are not liable for his negligence. No doubt it was for this reason that the court granted a new trial. But, on this appeal, the court is not confined to a consideration of the point upon which a new trial was granted, but the order will be affirmed if upon the whole record it appears that a new trial should be had. Nally v. McDonald, 77 Cal. 284, 19 Pac. 418.

The second specification, as to the insufficiency of the evidence to sustain the finding that there was no evidence tending to show that the defendants were responsible for the act of Wayne in making the scaffold, is manifestly well founded, and this of itself necessitates a new trial. If, as appellant contends, the defendants furnished no ladders, that did not authorize plaintiff and his fellow servant to construct an insecure scaffold and hold defendants responsible for their own negligence. Upon this point Burns v. Sennett, supra, is instructive. That plaintiff and Wayne were fellow workmen is manifest from plaintiff's testimony. It was shown that, under the circumstances, the workmen generally construct their own scaffolds, and adjust their appliances to enable them to reach their work, and, in the nature of things, the skill requisite to do so is a necessary qualification to a journeyman painter. If the ladders had been long enough, scaffolds would not have been required. But there will generally be a choice of means open to workmen. It is not claimed that a scaffold could not have been made which would have been safe; if it was not, it was the fault of the plaintiff or his fellow workman. The order should be affirmed.

We concur: BELCHER, C.; HAYNES, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the order appealed from is affirmed.

LAKE COUNTY v. ALLMAN. (No. 18,271.)

CONDEMNATION PROCEEDINGS—WHO MAY MAINTAIN.

Condemnation proceedings to open a private way over land may, under Pol. Code, § 2692, be maintained in the name of the county.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Lake county; R. W. Crump, Judge.

Proceedings by the county of Lake against John Allman. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

D. C. MacDougal and Mr. Sheridan, for appellant. J. M. Hamilton (Hudson & Sayre, of counsel), for respondent.

PER CURIAM. This is an appeal from the judgment by defendant upon the judgment roll, without any bill of exceptions, from a judgment against him in a condemnation proceeding brought to open a private road over certain land of defendant. The point that the proceeding cannot be maintained in the name of the county is, we think, not well taken. Under section 2690, Pol. Code, it may be brought by the county in the matter of opening a public road; and by section 2692 the same provisions apply to what are called "private or by-roads." The statement in the complaint of the land sought to be taken, together with the name filed, constitute a sufficient description of such land. The findings, we think, are sufficient. They show that "the public interests demand and require" that the road be established; and the damages are also found with sufficient particularity. They are not defective in any material matter. We see no reversible error. Judgment affirmed.

WOLFF v. WOLFF. (Nos. 15,327 and 15,389.)[1]

DIVORCE—GROUNDS—EVIDENCE—CORROBORATION—CONDONATION—WHAT IS—BILL OF EXCEPTIONS—REDUNDANT MATTER.

1. In an action for divorce, where plaintiff's testimony as to certain acts of defendant is corroborated, and such acts constitute extreme cruelty, it is not necessary that her testimony be corroborated as to all other acts of cruelty testified to by her.

2. A mere voluntary promise, by a wife having a cause for divorce, to return to, and live with, her husband, is not a "condonation," within Civ. Code, §§ 115, 116, defining it as a conditional forgiveness, and making essential thereto reconciliation, and remission of the offense by the injured party, and restoration of all marital rights.

3. A complaint alleged that defendant had property worth $150,000, and a gross income of $10,000 a year. The answer alleged that nearly all of defendant's realty was mortgaged for over half its value, that his expenses had equaled his income, and that he was worth no greater sum than about $30,000, cash values. Held, that a finding that the complaint was true, though plaintiff admitted the allegations of the answer, was not inconsistent with plaintiff's admissions, as the answer contained no averment necessarily inconsistent with the allegations of the complaint.

4. The insertion of useless and redundant matter in the bill of exceptions by appellee is not ground for reversal.

In bank. Appeal from superior court of city and county of San Francisco; Charles W. Slack, Judge.

Action by Lillie Wolff against Henry Wolff. From a decree for plaintiff, and from an order denying a new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Fox & Kellogg (W. W. Foote, of counsel), for appellant. W. H. L. Barnes, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. When these appeals were in department, the following opinion was prepared by Commissioner VANCLIEF:

"Action for divorce on the ground of extreme cruelty, in which the judgment was in favor of the plaintiff, decreeing a divorce, and also that defendant pay to plaintiff, from his separate property, $150 per month for the permanent support of herself and infant daughter of the marriage, born December, 1891, whose custody was awarded to plaintiff, besides $600 for counsel fees in this action. There are two appeals,—one from the final decree, including the allowance of alimony, which is numbered 15,327; and the other from an order denying the defendant's motion for a new trial, numbered 15,389. The first is founded upon a bill of exceptions as to both law and facts, and was taken within sixty days after the rendition of the judgment. The second is upon a statement made and used on the motion for a new trial. The bill of exceptions, and the statement on motion for new trial, are substantially, and almost literally, identical. Counsel have argued the two appeals together, and they will be so considered.

"Appellant complains that, in several respects, the findings of fact are not justified by the evidence. But, with one exception, hereafter to be considered, I think the evidence sufficient. It is amply sufficient to justify the finding of extreme cruelty, and all other facts requisite to entitle plaintiff to the divorce. It is not questioned that plaintiff testified to all the acts of cruelty alleged in her complaint, but it is contended that her testimony was not sufficiently corroborated. This contention, however, seems to rest solely upon the alleged ground that the testimony of the other witnesses did not tend to prove all the acts of cruelty alleged in the complaint, and testified to by plaintiff. But the testimony of other witnesses positively tended to prove all the principal acts of cruelty charged, except that none of them saw the defendant beat or strike the plaintiff; yet, in my opinion, circumstantially corroborated plaintiff's testimony, even as to this. But the court found that the allegation that defendant beat and struck the plaintiff is not true. The findings of the facts of cruelty are as follows: 'That since said marriage the defendant has treated the plaintiff in a cruel and inhuman manner, and in particular as follows: That, almost ever since the commencement of the married life of said parties, the defendant has been in the habit of grossly abusing the plaintiff, and of applying to her, and to members of her family, and relatives, vile, profane, and obscene language, the particulars whereof are stated at length in the complaint on file in this action. And the court finds, as facts, that such language was used by the defendant as and when and in the manner alleged by the plaintiff; that almost immediately after said marriage the plaintiff became and was pregnant, and that during the term of her pregnancy she was highly nervous, and in a delicate state of health, and defendant used towards her, during said period, vile, abusive, and indecent language, and which language and treatment of defendant caused the plaintiff physical pain, and greatly aggravated the physical sufferings undergone by her during said period, and that the harsh and abusive treatment and language of defendant towards plaintiff caused her physical suffering, affected her health, and also inflicted upon her grievous mental suffering; and that plaintiff has not condoned said offenses,'—and, as a conclusion of law, found that defendant 'has been guilty of extreme cruelty towards the plaintiff.' The testimony of plaintiff, as to the facts thus found, having been sufficiently corroborated, and these being sufficient to constitute extreme cruelty, even according to the case of Waldron v. Waldron, 85 Cal. 251, 24 Pac. 649, 858, and surely so according to the decision in Barnes v. Barnes, 95 Cal. 171, 30 Pac. 298, it was not material nor necessary that her testimony should have been corroborated as to all other distinct acts of cruelty alleged in her complaint.

"(2) It is contended that the finding 'that the plaintiff has not condoned the offenses' is not justified by the evidence. It was pleaded by defendant, as a defense to the action, that on April 12, 1892, after the commencement of the action, all the causes of action were condoned, etc.; but defendant offered no evidence of any condonation, except the testimony of Mr. Judis, to the effect that during the pending of this suit he had an interview with plaintiff, in which he thought she said 'she had made up with her husband, and then changed her mind; * * * that they parted friendly, and immediately she changed her mind, and thought she could not live with him.' The defendant, however, though he testified at considerable length as to all other matters, said nothing about the alleged condonation. It is agreed that the place of the alleged condonation was her mother's house, and the time the 12th day of April, 1892. That the defendant, there and then, earnestly solicited his wife to condone his offenses, and return to his home, was proved by the testimony of plaintiff's mother and sister, who testified that they, or one of them, was present with plaintiff and defendant, and heard all the conversation between them on April 12th, and did not hear plaintiff promise to forgive him, nor to return to his home, but did hear plaintiff refuse to return, or to live with him again, and that even on that occasion he was violent, abusive, and profane, calling his wife a 'damned liar.' The plaintiff testified to the same effect, except that she admitted that she had told him on that day, for the purpose of getting rid of him, and because she 'was in bodily fear of him, that she would return to him,' and that on the next day defendant returned, and asked to see her, when she refused to meet him again, and he was denied admittance into her mother's house. Conceding that she voluntarily promised to return to and live with him, such promise alone was not 'condonation,' as defined by Civil Code, §§ 115, 116,[1] since it neither remitted his offenses, nor restored him to marital rights.

"(3) The complaint contains the following: 'And plaintiff further says that prior to the marriage of plaintiff and defendant, and ever since their marriage, the defendant has been engaged in a large and lucrative business at 120 Sutter street, in the city and county of San Francisco; that she is informed and believes that his estate consists of real and personal property, and is of the value of from hundred and twenty to one hundred and fifty thousand dollars; and that his income from his business and property is not less than ten thousand dollars a year.' This was answered by the defendant, as follows: 'Defendant denies that he is engaged in a large and lucrative business at 120 Sutter street, San Francisco, or elsewhere, and avers that for two years last past the said business has been conducted without profit, and has been running behind in the matter of expense compared with profits; that for more than two years last past the defendant has not made any net profits in said business, and conducts, and has conducted, the same in hopes of a better future, and for the purpose of keeping together his customers and stock in trade, and the good will of the business. Defendant denies that he is worth from one hundred and twenty to one hundred and fifty thousand dollars, or that he is worth any larger or greater sum, over and above his just debts and liabilities, than about thirty thousand dollars, cash values, including all the property and business, and denies that his income is ten thousand dollars a year, or that his income from his business has been, during the past two years, any sum of net profit, or is any sum of net profit, and avers that the net income from his real estate does not exceed the interest which he is obliged to pay upon the mortgages thereof, and the taxes and repairs. Defendant avers, further, that nearly all his real estate which has any value is mortgaged in the aggregate fully one-half the value thereof, if not more.' During the trial, plaintiff's attorney made the following statement to the court: 'Plaintiff's attorney here stated to the court, in open court, and admitted as a fact in the case, that the allegations, statements, and denials in the defendant's answer on file herein, as to his property, assets, and income, are admitted and accepted as true and correct, and shall be accepted by the court as true and correct, in making its decisions and findings in this case.' Yet the court found, as facts, 'that all the allegations contained in the complaint herein are true, except that it is not true that the defendant beat and struck the plaintiff, as alleged in the complaint.' The effect of this finding is that the defendant owned real and personal property of the value of at least $120,000, and that his income from his business and property is not less than $10,000, as alleged in the complaint. The appellant contends that this finding is not justified by the evidence, and is inconsistent with the above statement and admissions made by plaintiff's attorney at the trial. I think, however, that the finding is justified by the pleadings, and is not inconsistent with the admissions made by plaintiff's attorney at the trial. The answer of the defendant contains no denial of the allegations that his real and personal property is of the value of $120,000, and that his income from his business and property is $10,000 a year, nor does it contain any affirmative averment necessarily inconsistent with either of those allegations of the complaint. The comparative value of his real property with that of his personal property is not stated, and cannot be deduced from the answer, and therefore may be only as one to ten. That nearly all of his real property was mortgaged for a sum equal to half its value neither lessened its value, nor deprived him of its ownership. That his expenses for the last two years, necessary and unnecessary, had been equal to his income, so that he had realized no profits or net income, is not inconsistent with a gross income of $10,000 a year, as alleged in the complaint. That he was worth no greater sum, 'over and above his just debts and liabilities, than about thirty thousand dollars, cash values,' is not inconsistent with his ownership of property of the value of $120,000, nor with an income of $10,000 a year. The answer is clearly evasive of the allegations of the complaint as to defendant's income and the value of his property, and seems to have been so intended. Nevertheless, the affirmative allegations of the answer, having been expressly admitted by plaintiff's attorney, were material probative facts, bearing upon the issue as to the proper amount to be allowed for the support of the defendant and her child; and, for the purpose of estimating and determining what was a 'suitable allowance' for such support, the court should have considered these admitted facts, as required by section 139 of the Civil Code, and it must be presumed that the court duly considered them for that purpose. They were not relevant to any other issue.

[1] Section 115 defines "condonation" as the conditional forgiveness of a matrimonial offense constituting a cause of divorce. Under section 116, the following requirements are necessary to condonation: (1) A knowledge on the part of the condoner of the facts constituting the cause of divorce; (2) reconciliation, and remission of the offense by the injured party; (3) restoration of the offending party to all marital rights.

"(4) Plaintiff's attorney proposed to amend the bill of exception, as drafted by defendant's counsel, by inserting therein certain affidavits of the parties and others, which had been filed in the case on plaintiff's motion for alimony and attorney's fees pendente lite. Portions of some of these affidavits had been read on the trial, in connection with the examination and cross-examination of witnesses who had made them. Defendant's counsel objected to the insertion of such affidavits, or any parts thereof, not put in evidence on the trial. The court overruled the objection, and allowed said affidavits to be inserted in the bill of exception, to which the defendant excepted. Appellant contends that this ruling was error, for which the judgment should be reversed. Section 650 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides that, in settling a bill of exceptions, 'it is the duty of the judge or referee to strike out of it all redundant and useless matter, so that the exceptions may be presented as briefly as possible.' And section 652 of the same Code provides: 'If the judge in any case refuse to allow an exception in accordance with the facts, the party desiring the bill settled may apply by petition to the supreme court to prove the same,' under such regulations as that court may prescribe. It may be conceded that such affidavits as do not appear to have been read at the trial for any purpose, and such parts of them as were not so read nor necessary to explain the parts thereof which were read, were 'redundant and useless matter,' which should not have been inserted in the bill, yet the judgment should not be reversed for the error of inserting them; otherwise, at least one-half of the judgments tested, on appeal, by bills of exceptions and statements on motion for new trials, would be reversible on the same ground, since a majority of the statements and bills of exceptions contained in the records on appeal are found to contain more or less redundant and useless matter. All matter in a bill of exceptions which does not appear to be relevant to the questions raised by the bill, nor useful in the solution of such questions, is redundant and useless, and, as such, will be disregarded by the appellate court; and this is the only remedy for the error, except that the appellate court may tax the costs of redundant matter to the party that caused its insertion. Subject to these checks, the action of the trial judge in settling bills of exception and statements on motion for new trials is final and conclusive. Counsel for appellant further contend that the court erred in admitting and excluding evidence. Their numerous specifications of such alleged errors have been carefully examined, and are found to be either groundless or harmless, and of so little importance as not to require special consideration. I think the order and judgment appealed from should be affirmed."

Upon further consideration of the appeals in bank, we are satisfied with the foregoing opinion, and the conclusions there reached. It may be further said, with respect to the allowance of alimony, that, upon the whole case, it does not appear that the court abused its discretion in fixing the amount. Of course, it will always be within the power and discretion of the court to modify the allowance of alimony in the future, if just cause appear for such modification. The judgment and order denying a new trial are affirmed.

PEOPLE v. YOUNG. (No. 21,063.)

CRIMINAL LAW — INTOXICATION OF DEFENDANT—INSTRUCTIONS—WITNESS — COMMENTS OF COUNSEL.

1. No act committed by one voluntarily intoxicated is less criminal because of such intoxication; but, when intent is a necessary element to constitute a particular species or degree of crime, the jury may consider the fact of defendant's intoxication to aid them in determining the intent with which he committed the act.

2. Evidence showing that deceased was defendant's mistress is competent.

3. A witness in a criminal case need not be absolutely certain in his testimony as to the identification of defendant, to render such testimony competent.

4. Comment by counsel for the state on the absence of a witness for defendant is no ground for reversing a conviction.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; B. N. Smith, Judge.

William H. Young was convicted of manslaughter, and appeals. Affirmed.

On a trial for killing an inmate of a house of ill fame, a prostitute occupying a room adjoining that of deceased testified that she heard defendant and deceased quarreling; that there was a crash of broken glass; that deceased came out with her clothes on fire from a broken lamp; and that defendant rushed from the room, telling witness he would kill her, too, if she had him arrested. Another witness testified that he saw a man, who he thought was defendant, running away from the premises immediately after the alleged crime. The officer who arrested defendant testified that, when first arrested, defendant admitted being there, but said the burning happened by accident, and that the next morning he denied being there altogether. Deceased, who lived for two days after the injury, maintained that it was an accident caused by her knocking the table over. Counsel for the state, in alluding to a witness for defendant, said: "He is not here, and I will ask you, when you return to your jury room, to answer the absence of this pregnant fact; and I will tell you the echo will follow you, and answer, 'Where is Joe Chambers?' [witness]." The court instructed as follows on insanity: "No act committed by a person in a state of voluntary intoxication is less criminal by reason of his having been in such condition; but whenever the actual existence of any particular purpose, motion, or intent is a necessary element to constitute any particular species or degree of crime, the jury may take into consideration the fact that the accused was intoxicated at the time, in order to aid them in determining the purpose, motive, or intent with which he committed the act."

Zue G. Peck and R. A. Ling, for appellant. W. H. H. Hart, Atty. Gen., for the People.

McFARLAND, J. The information charged the defendant with the crime of murder, consisting in the killing of one Irene O'Brien, alias Irene Mansfield, and he was convicted of manslaughter. He appeals from the judgment, and from an order denying his motion for a new trial. We see no reason for disturbing the judgment, or for granting a new trial.

The point that there was not sufficient evidence to sustain the verdict is not tenable. There was clearly evidence enough to warrant the conclusion reached by the jury.

We see no error committed by the court in its instructions to the jury. The instruction of the court upon the subject of intoxication correctly stated the law upon that subject; and, although there was not much evidence to the point of appellant's intoxication at the time of the alleged commission of the crime, still we think that he suffered no prejudice from said instruction. The instruction as to how the jury should view the testimony, and that they "should consider his relation to the case," etc., while criticised several times by this court, seems to be a favorite subject for instruction in lower courts, and has been too often held to be not erroneous to be now overturned.

There are no other instructions necessary to be noted.

A number of exceptions were taken to the rulings of the court admitting evidence which showed, to some extent, the relation, existing between appellant and the woman killed, of man and mistress. It is contended that this evidence was inadmissible because the effect of it was to bring the appellant into disrepute, and affect his good standing before the jury. The evidence, however, necessarily appeared in the disclosure of facts pertaining to the case; and we do not think that any error was committed in that regard, or that appellant was unjustly prejudiced thereby. Neither do we think that appellant was subjected to any unwarrantable cross-examination.

No error was committed in admitting the testimony of the witness Grant. A witness is not required to be absolutely certain in his testimony as to the identification of another person.

There was no error in admitting the evidence of the witness Bosqui. What the appellant said to him was not a confession; and there was nothing in the circumstances under which appellant made the statement to him which would exclude such statement from being introduced in evidence.

There was nothing in what the district attorney said to the jury that would warrant any interference with the verdict.

There are no other points in the case necessary to be specially noticed. Judgment and order affirmed.

CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO v. BURR et al. (No. 15,326.)[1]

DEDICATION OF LAND FOR PUBLIC STREET — FILING PLAT — DEFENDANTS SUED BY FICTITIOUS NAMES.

1. Where a plat of land is recorded, and land appears thereon not numbered as a lot, nor corresponding in size or shape to one, but bounded by lines clearly intended to represent the lines of a street, and lots are sold as being bounded on such street, such land is dedicated for a public street, though not named as such on the plat.

2. A judgment against persons sued by fictitious names, where the complaint is never amended, as required by Code Civ. Proc. § 474, by inserting their true names, will be reversed on appeal.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; J. C. B. Hebbard, Judge.

Action by the city and county of San Francisco against E. W. Burr and others to abate a nuisance consisting of maintaining a fence across a public highway. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Reversed as to defendants sued by fictitious names, and as to all others affirmed.

J. C. Bates, for appellants. H. T. Creswell, for respondent.

DE HAVEN, J. 1. The finding of the court that the land described in the complaint was dedicated as a public street is fully justified by the evidence set out in the bill of exceptions. It appears therefrom that the city of San Francisco was the original owner of said land, as successor of the former pueblo of Yerba Buena, and of the lots adjacent thereto, and that such adjacent lots were sold by it with reference to the map found in "Book B. D. R., Alcalde Grants of 100-Vara Lots in the Laguna Survey," upon which map, as well as upon the subsequent official maps of the city, known as the "Eddy Maps of 1850 and 1851," the land in controversy is sufficiently represented as a public way. It is true it is not named as a street on either of these maps, but, to use the language of the court in City of Indianapolis v. Kingsbury, 101 Ind. 209, "its shape, situation, and dimensions," as laid out on each, "show it to be a way of some kind." It is not numbered as a lot, nor does it correspond in form or size to the lots appearing on the maps; and the lines which mark its boundaries, as shown by each map, clearly indicate that they were intended to represent the lines of a street, and certainly, when the adjacent lots were sold by the city as bounded on the street thus represented on the map, the dedication by the city of such land for public use as a street was complete.

2. The defendants Domario, Devignenze, Hatman, Ferro, and Martha W. Wood were sued by fictitious names, and duly served in the action, but the complaint was never amended by inserting their true names, as required by section 474 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and all of them, with the exception of Martha W. Wood, made default. The judgment against these defendants cannot be sustained, as there is nothing in the complaint to show that the plaintiff is entitled to any judgment against them, or that they are the persons guilty of maintaining the nuisance complained of. A judgment against a person whose name is not mentioned in the complaint must, upon appeal therefrom, be reversed as to such person. McKinlay v. Tuttle, 42 Cal. 571; Campbell v. Adams, 50 Cal. 205; Baldwin v. Morgan, Id. 585; Farris v. Merritt, 63 Cal. 118.

The judgment against the defendants Domario, Devignenze, Hatman, Ferro, and Martha W. Wood is reversed, and as to all the other defendants the judgment is affirmed.

MILLS v. OREGON RY. & NAV. CO. (No. 15,033.)

New Trial—Verdict not Sustained by Evidence.

1. An order for new trial specified as grounds that plaintiff's evidence failed to prove the contract sued on, and that the court erred in admitting proof of admissions by defendant's agent. Held, that the supreme court could not review such discretionary order on the ground that the admissions, if competent, proved plaintiff's case.

2. The trial court's discretion in granting a new trial for lack of evidence to sustain the verdict cannot be reviewed.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; John Hunt, Judge.

Action by E. T. B. Mills against the Oregon Railway & Navigation Company for damages in delay in transporting wheat. Verdict for plaintiff, and new trial granted. Plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

John H. Dickinson, Pillsbury & Blanding, and P. L. Benjamin, for appellant. A. R. Cotton, for respondent.

HARRISON, J. The plaintiff brought this action to recover damages from the defendant for failure to transport certain wheat from eastern Oregon to San Francisco. The complaint is in two counts, the first alleging that in July, 1885, the defendant made a contract in writing with the plaintiff, whereby it undertook and promised him to transport, quickly and promptly, from any point on its line east of the Cascade mountains, to San Francisco, all such quantities of wheat as he might thereafter deliver to it, and to deliver the same quickly and promptly to him at San Francisco; that in pursuance of said contract the plaintiff delivered to the defendant 8,326 tons of wheat to be transported to San Francisco, and that the defendant willfully delayed the transportation of the wheat so that it did not arrive at San Francisco until more than three months after it could have arrived there; and that by reason thereof the plaintiff was damaged in the sum of $35,000. The second count of the complaint sets forth the same contract, and alleges that in reliance thereon the plaintiff tendered to the defendant, in Oregon, for transportation to San Francisco, 9,000 tons of wheat, which the defendant refused to accept or to transport, and that by reason of such refusal the plaintiff suffered damage in the further sum of $35,000. The cause was tried by a jury, which rendered a verdict in favor of the plaintiff for the sum of $40,000. The defendant moved for a new trial upon various grounds,—among others, errors in law occurring at the trial, and excepted to by the defendant, and that the evidence was insufficient to justify the verdict, and, in the bill of exceptions thereafter settled, specified various errors of law, and also certain particulars in which the evidence was insufficient to justify the verdict. The court granted the motion for a new trial, and made its order in the following terms: "In this action, the motion for a new trial having been heretofore submitted to the court for consideration and decision, and now the court being fully advised in the premises, it is ordered that said motion be, and the same is hereby, granted, upon the following grounds: First, that the evidence introduced on behalf of plaintiff on the trial of this action fails to establish the contract sued upon by plaintiff; second, that the court erred in the said trial in admitting evidence of admissions made by defendant's agent Muir, when conversing with plaintiff's agent Cavanagh; and, third, that the evidence on behalf of plaintiff failed to sustain the second count." From this order the plaintiff has appealed.

The effect of limiting in the order the grounds upon which a new trial was granted was discussed by this court in Kauffman v. Maier, 94 Cal. 269, 29 Pac. 481, where the court limited its order to a single error of law, and made no mention of the sufficiency of the evidence to justify the verdict, and in People v. Flood (recently decided) 36 Pac. 663, where the motion for a new trial was made upon various grounds, and the order granting the new trial was general in its terms, in which we held that, as the court did not exclude this ground, we were justified in holding that this was one of the grounds upon which it made the order. In the present case, however, the court has expressly specified in its order the insufficiency of evidence as one of the grounds upon which it grants a new trial. If this had been the sole ground upon which the motion for a new trial had been asked, and the order had been made in general terms, or if the motion had been made upon all of the statutory grounds, and the order had specified insufficiency of evidence as the sole ground upon which it was made, under the well-established rule, we should be compelled to accept the conclusion of the trial court as definitive of this question. This rule is not changed by reason of the fact that the court specifies in its order, in addition to this ground, one or more of the other grounds upon which the motion was made, as a reason for making the order. The statute has authorized the trial court to grant a new trial if, in its opinion, the evidence before the jury was insufficient to justify its verdict. For this purpose, that court has a revisory power over the action of the jury, and, in the exercise of that power, is intrusted with a large discretion. The judge before whom the trial was had has heard all the evidence in the case, has seen the witnesses, has noted the conduct of the trial on behalf of the respective parties, and observed the attention and capacity of the several jurors during the trial; and if, in his opinion, the verdict of the jury is inconsistent with the evidence before it, it is his duty to set it aside, and grant a new trial. This discretion which he is called upon to exercise under the sanction of his judicial position is not subject to review in this court, and, whenever exercised, is to be regarded as final, unless it is made to appear that his action was arbitrary, rather than discretionary, or was made in a case where no opportunity was presented for the exercise of discretion. Domico v. Cassassa, 35 Pac. 1024.

Counsel for the appellant urges that the several grounds upon which the court granted the new trial in the present case are resolvable into one, and all depend upon the second one named in the order; that, if the evidence thought by the court to have been erroneously admitted was properly before the jury, the court would have deemed it sufficient to justify the verdict. We cannot, however, assent to this proposition. Not only would such a construction of the order be in violation of its own terms, but, if the court had intended this result, it would naturally have limited its order to the error in admitting the evidence, and expressed itself satisfied that the evidence, as it stood in the case, was sufficient to justify the verdict. The statement in the order that the evidence "introduced on behalf of plaintiff on the trial" fails to establish the contract sued upon by plaintiff necessarily imports all the evidence introduced by the plaintiff, as well that of the admissions referred to in the second ground named in the order as the other evidence introduced on his behalf, while the third ground given in the order refers to all the evidence on behalf of the plaintiff in support of the second count,—the contract, the breach, and the damage sustained therefrom.

It only remains to consider whether there was any opportunity for the court to exercise a discretion in reviewing the action of the jury; for, if there was any conflict of evidence, or if the facts upon which the verdict rested were undisputed, the court could not be called upon to exercise such discretion. Whether there was a contract between the plaintiff and the defendant was one of the main issues in the case; and the plaintiff sought to show the existence of this contract, not only by documentary evidence, but also by oral testimony, and by proof of the conduct of the respective parties in reference thereto, as well as by evidence of admissions made on behalf of the defendant. These were matters which, in a peculiar way, called for the exercise of judgment, and required a proper consideration of the weight and importance to be given to the several species of evidence brought out at the trial. It would not be proper for us to indicate any opinion in reference thereto, but it is sufficient to call attention to the fact that they were before the jury, and that they were proper to be considered by the court upon the motion for a new trial, and also that they are of such a character as to present a case suitable for the exercise of the judicial discretion of the court in its re-examination of the verdict, and of the sufficiency of the evidence for its support. The court does not, in its order, specify the particular evidence of the admissions of Muir which it deems to have been erroneously admitted; and as counsel for respondent maintains that none of these admissions could be received, while appellant's counsel contends that, even if a portion of the evidence was subject to objection, the defendant did not, at the trial, make its objection to this evidence in such form as to justify its exclusion, we do not deem it necessary to review the entire evidence, and the several rulings of the court thereon. Upon another trial the parties will be able to present their evidence in such form, and under such objections, as will enable the court, in its rulings, to preserve their respective rights. The order is affirmed.

2. When a city officer makes affidavit that he posted a notice of a resolution on September 12th, and the same day caused a like notice to be published for one insertion in a certain weekly newspaper, such publication is not disproved by production of all the numbers of the paper of that year except that of September 17th,—the first issue after the notice was posted,—and showing that it is not in such numbers.

C. T. Bird, for appellant. W. A. Kearney, for respondent.

BELCHER, C. This is an action to recover the sum of $500, and the appeal is from a judgment of nonsuit and an order denying a motion for new trial. The facts alleged in the complaint, and not denied by the answer, are in substance as follows: The defendant was a municipal corporation of the sixth class, and on September 8, 1890, its board of trustees, acting under the authority of an act of the legislature commonly called the "Vrooman Act" (St. 1885, p. 147), as amended in 1889 (St. 1889, p. 157), passed a resolution declaring its intention to improve Laurel avenue in said city from East street to Alder street, and designating the Pacific Grove Review, a weekly newspaper published and circulated in said city, as the newspaper in which said resolution of intention should be published. On September 12, 1890, the superintendent of streets posted notices of the passage of said resolution of intention along the line of the work mentioned therein, as required by law, and on the same day delivered to the publisher of the said weekly newspaper a notice, similar in substance, for publication by one insertion therein. On November 14, 1890, the board of trustees passed a resolution whereby it ordered the work described in the resolution of intention to be done pursuant to plans and specifications adopted therefor, and on January 5, 1891, it passed a resolution directing the clerk of the city to cause a notice with specifications to be posted, inviting proposals or bids for doing the work, and also directing the clerk to publish in said weekly newspaper a notice that proposals or bids for said work would be received by him up to the first Monday of February, 1891. On January 10, 1891, the clerk posted, and caused to be published, notices with specifications, etc., as directed. On February 2, 1891, N. Vincent & Co. delivered to the said clerk their proposal to do the said work for the sum of $4,977.50, and accompanied the same with a bank check for the sum of $500, payable to the order of the president of said board; and on the same day the board awarded the contract to them, as the lowest bidder, for the price or sum named in their bid. Afterwards, N. Vincent & Co., upon the ground that they had discovered that the proceedings were invalid, refused to enter into any contract with the street superintendent to do the said work; and on March 5th they demanded of the said board of trustees, in writing, that it order the said bank check returned to them. The board refused to make such order, and on the same day passed a resolution declaring the check forfeited to the city, and ordering the chairman of the board to collect the same and pay the money into the city treasury, which was done. Thereafter N. Vincent & Co. assigned all their right, title, and interest in and to the said check and the said $500 to the plaintiff, who commenced this action, averring that the said sum was so placed and received into the treasury of defendant to his use, and that he had a right to recover the same, with interest. The complaint further alleged that no official grade for Laurel avenue had been established at the time of the passage of said resolution of intention, and also that neither the resolution of intention, passed September 8th, nor the notice of the passage of said resolution, posted by the street superintendent September 12th, nor the resolution ordering the work to be done, passed November 14th, was ever published as required by law, and hence that the proceedings were without authority of law, and void. The answer specifically denied each of these allegations, and averred that on September 8, 1890, the board of trustees, by an order duly made and entered, established an official grade for the said avenue, which ever since has been, and now is, the official grade thereof, and that the resolution of intention, the notice of the passage of said resolution, and the resolution ordering the work to be done were each posted and published in all respects as required by law. Appellant contends that the decision upon each of these contested issues should have been in his favor, and that the court, therefore, erred in granting the motion for nonsuit.

1. The resolution of intention declared that it was the intention of the board of trustees "to order Laurel avenue, from the east line of First street to the west line of Alder street, graded to the official grade thereof, as established by resolution of said board, adopted at a meeting thereof held September 8, 1890, and now on file at the office of the city clerk of said city of Pacific Grove." The notice posted by the street superintendent and the resolution ordering the work done also contained the same statements. No proof was offered by the plaintiff showing that a grade was not established at the time and in the manner indicated, and the statement that it was must therefore be accepted as true.

2. To show that the resolution of intention was never properly published, plaintiff introduced in evidence a copy thereof as printed in the newspaper. At the foot of the resolution as passed were these words: "Passed in board of trustees this 8th day of September, 1890, by the following vote," etc. As published, the year was printed "1880" instead of "1890," and this constitutes the only objection to the sufficiency of the publication. The error complained of was, in our opinion, wholly immaterial. The date of its passage was not a part of the resolution, and was not required to be published. The statute required only that the resolution be published.

3. The plaintiff introduced in evidence the street superintendent's notice of the passage of the resolution of intention, framed in all respects as required by law, and the affidavit of the superintendent stating that he posted the same on September 12, 1890, as required, and also that "on the same day he caused a notice similar in substance to be published for one insertion in the Pacific Grove Review, a weekly newspaper published and circulated in said city, designated by the board of city trustees of said city of Pacific Grove as the paper in which said notice should be published." To show that this notice was never published, plaintiff then introduced in evidence copies of every issue of the Pacific Grove Review from January 12, 1890, to April 15, 1891, "excepting the issue of said paper for the date of September 17, 1890." The notice was not published in any of the papers introduced, and it is therefore claimed that it was never published at all. But the issue of September 17th was the first issue after the notice was posted, and the one in which it should have been published. Under this showing, the claim that the notice was never published cannot be sustained.

4. To show that the resolution ordering the work to be done was never properly published, plaintiff introduced in evidence a copy of it, at the foot of which were the words: "Passed this 14th day of November, 1890, by the following vote," etc.; and also a copy of it as published, in which the year of its passage was printed "1860" instead of "1890," as in the original. This was an error of the same character as that which occurred in the publication of the resolution of intention, and may be disposed of in the same way. It was harmless, and did not invalidate the publication.

5. At the conclusion of the plaintiff's evidence the defendant moved for a nonsuit, and the motion was denied pro forma. The defendant declined to offer any evidence, and thereupon the cause was submitted upon briefs to be filed, the plaintiff being allowed 30 days to present his opening brief, the defendant 20 days to present its brief, and the plaintiff 10 days to reply. The plaintiff filed his opening brief and the defendant its brief, but, before the expiration of the time for presenting the reply brief, the court, without the plaintiff's consent, entered an order granting a nonsuit and dismissing the action. It is claimed that this action of the court was premature and erroneous, and therefore cause for reversal. But conceding that the court should have suspended its action until the time for presenting the reply brief had expired, still its failure to do so was a harmless error if, upon the case made, the plaintiff was not entitled to recover. That the plaintiff here was not entitled to recover upon the case made by him is clear. The statute required all proposals or bids to be accompanied by a certified check for not less than 10 per cent. of the aggregate of the proposal, etc.; and it provided that the contract should be awarded to the lowest responsible bidder, and "if said bidder fails, neglects, or refuses to enter into the contract to perform said work or improvement, as hereinafter provided, then the certified check accompanying his bid, and the amount therein mentioned, shall be declared forfeited to said city, and shall be collected by it, and paid into its fund for repairs of streets." The provisions of the statute seem to have been substantially complied with by the defendant and its servants in all the proceedings here under review, and the plaintiff's check was therefore properly declared forfeited to the city. The judgment and order appealed from should be affirmed.

We concur: TEMPLE, C.; SEARLS, C.

ESHLEMAN v. HENRIETTA VINEYARD CO. et al. (No. 3,180.) SAME v. MALTER et al. (No. 3,593.) HENRIETTA VINEYARD CO. v. ESHLEMAN et al. (No. 3,653.)

(No. 18,018.)

SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE—PAROL CONTRACT RELATING TO LAND—PART PERFORMANCE—WHAT CONSTITUTES—LACHES.

1. In an action brought in 1890 for specific performance of an oral contract to convey land, made in 1886, the court found that plaintiff was in possession, and took crops off the land, during 1886 and 1887, with defendant's knowledge, and that during such time, and ever since, plaintiff claimed title under the contract; but it was not alleged or found that plaintiff continued in possession after 1887. She never paid anything on the contract price, though she tendered the whole of it "prior to the commencement of this action." Held, that there was no such part performance as would take the contract out of the statute of frauds.

2. Where a vendee of land delays more than four years after she accepts a deed, before suing to compel a conveyance of land which she alleges was wrongfully reserved in the deed to the grantor, she is not entitled to relief, though she did not discover the error until within three years of the suit, in the absence of fraud or deception which prevented her from sooner discovering it.

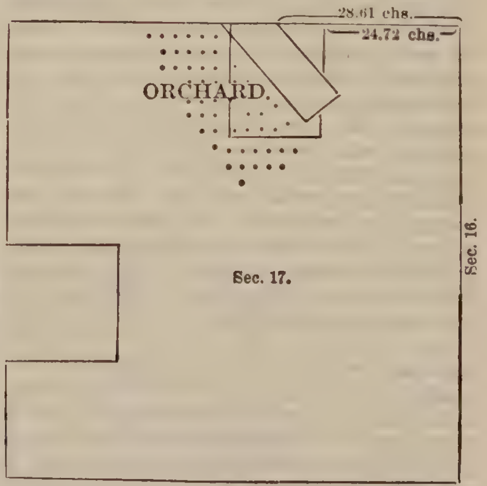
3. Where it is not found that plaintiff did not discover the error 35 months before the commencement of such action, and before she tendered payment and demanded a deed, she is not entitled to specific performance, even if her negligence in not discovering the error sooner than she did was excusable.

In bank. Commissioners' decision. Appeal from superior court, Fresno county; M. K. Harris, Judge.

Three actions,—one by M. D. Eshleman against the Henrietta Vineyard Company and G. H. Malter, one by the same plaintiff against G. H. Malter and others, and one by the Henrietta Vineyard Company against I. S. Eshleman and others. From a judgment for defendants in each of the actions, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Edward Lynch, for appellants. Tupper & Tupper, for respondents.

VANCLIEF, C. These three causes, together, are designated in this court by the number 18,018. In the lower court, they were numbered, respectively, 3,180, 3,593, and 3,653, as above. All the parties to the three causes, being represented here by the same attorneys, have stipulated that the decision of this court in the first in order, 3,180, shall control the judgment in the other two. That is, if the judgment of the lower court is affirmed in the first, it shall be affirmed in the other two; but, if reversed or modified in the first, it shall be reversed or modified likewise in the other two. Therefore, only the appeal in the first (Eshleman v. Henrietta Vineyard Company and Malter) need be considered. It is an action to enforce specific performance of a contract to sell to plaintiff certain tracts of land situated in the county of Fresno, originally executed in writing. The written contract was between the defendant Malter, of the first part (vendor), and I. S. Eshleman, of the second part (vendee). At the time the contract was executed (January 11, 1886), the title to the land which was the subject of the contract was in the defendant Henrietta Vineyard Company, a corporation, whose directors are alleged and found to have been under the control of Malter, by virtue of his ownership of all the stock, except a few shares held by the directors. I. S. Eshleman made the contract for the benefit of the plaintiff, and assigned it to plaintiff before the commencement of this action. The land to be conveyed consisted of certain described legal subdivisions of sections 16 and 17, containing about 720 acres, and included the northeast quarter of section 17, except a small parcel thereof, called the "Winery Tract," on which was a winery. This Winery tract was reserved from the sale by the following description in the contract: "A tract of from ten to, and not exceeding, twenty acres, on which the winery of the party of the first part now stands, bounded on the north by the north line of said section, to lie in a compact and square shape, with its northwest corner at the point on said north line, which is now the northeast corner of the orchard on the northwest quarter of the northeast quarter of said section, and with its northeast corner on said line, at a point thirty feet west of the head gates of the ditches which irrigate said lands, and with its south line not exceeding two hundred feet south of said winery." The contract price to be paid for the land was expressed to be "at the rate of $41.66⅔ per acre." It is alleged in the complaint, and found by the court, that on January 20, 1886, nine days after the date of the contract, Malter procured a conveyance from the Henrietta Vineyard Company to plaintiff of all the several tracts of land described in the contract; reserving, however, from the northeast quarter of section 17, 14.46 acres as the Winery tract, plainly described in the deed to plaintiff, in connection with the description of the north line of said northeast quarter of section 17, as follows: "And also that part of the northeast quarter of section seventeen (17) bounded and particularly described as follows, to wit: Beginning at the northeast corner thereof, running thence west on its north line twenty-four and 72 hundredths chains; thence, at right angles, south, thirteen and 15 hundredths chains (13.15); thence west eleven (11) chains; thence, at right angles, north, thirteen and 15 hundredths chains (13.15), to said north line thereof; thence west, along said north line, to the northwest corner of said section;" and thence runs south, west, and north, around the quarter section, to the place of beginning. The italicized part of the description shows the exclusion of the 14.46 acres, as the Winery tract, "in a compact square form." The plaintiff accepted the deed with this description without objection, and paid for the land conveyed, and no more, at the contract price per acre; and defendants contend that this was full performance of the contract on their part. On the next day after the conveyance to plaintiff, the Henrietta Vineyard Company conveyed the reserved Winery tract to the defendant Malter and E. B. Rogers. It is claimed by plaintiff that the tract reserved for the winery is not in conformity with the contract as understood by the parties, either as to quantity of land, or the form in which it is located; that it contains too much land, by eight acres; and that the lines bounding the east and west sides thereof, instead of running from the north line of the section directly south, at right angles therewith, should have run south, 40 degrees and 43 minutes east. Counsel for appellant has attached to his brief a little map, which, he says, correctly represents the difference between the tract reserved and the tract which should have been reserved, as follows:



This map will sufficiently represent the difference, as understood by counsel, without reference to the coloring.

It is alleged in the complaint, and the court found, that the Winery tract referred to in said agreement was at the date of said agreement, and still is, "a well-marked and defined body of land, of square shape, bounded on the north by the section line of section 17 * * * and a fence; on the west by a straight row of large trees * * * and a fence; on the east by a straight row of large trees;" and "that it was agreed and understood between the parties to said agreement and plaintiff, at its execution, that the Winery tract to be reserved by the terms of said agreement was the body of land last above described, and said tract was pointed out on the ground to said I. S. Eshleman and plaintiff, at the date of said agreement by said Malter and his agent, as the Winery tract referred to in said agreement." It should be noted, in passing, that this is not very definite as to what was pointed out. No boundary for the southeast end is mentioned. Nor is it said that any fences or rows of trees were pointed out as boundaries. It is further alleged and found that during the years 1886 and 1887 the plaintiff was in possession of the two parcels of land in question, and that she cultivated the same, with the knowledge of the defendants. These two parcels, of which a conveyance is sought to be enforced, are separated from each other by the parcel which plaintiff claims should have been reserved as shown on the above map, and together contain about eight acres. It is also found that prior to the commencement of this action (how long before is not found) the plaintiff tendered to each of said defendants, and to said E. B. Rogers, the contract price of said two parcels of land, and demanded from each a conveyance of their title thereto; that the defendants refused to convey, but that Rogers, on April 1, 1891, conveyed to plaintiff all his right, title, and interest in the whole tract of 14.46 acres reserved in the deed, his interest being an undivided half thereof, for which plaintiff paid him the contract price per acre. So that plaintiff seeks by this action to enforce a conveyance from defendants of only an undivided half of the two small, separate tracts, containing 8.06 acres, in which it is found that the corporation defendant has no interest whatever, having conveyed the whole tract of 14.46 acres reserved in the deed to Malter and Rogers on January 21, 1886. The court found, as a conclusion of law, that plaintiff was not entitled to a decree for specific performance of the agreement, and rendered judgment accordingly. The plaintiff appeals from the judgment, on the judgment roll, and contends only that, upon the findings of fact, the judgment should have been for plaintiff, decreeing specific performance of the contract,—not as written, however, but according to a contemporaneous understanding and agreement between the parties, which was not reduced to writing, and which is palpably inconsistent with the written contract, or any possible construction of it. Therefore, to the extent that the verbal differs from the written agreement, the action must be deemed an action for specific performance of a verbal agreement, and treated accordingly, and so it seems to be regarded by counsel for appellant; and, since the findings warrant no relief independent of the verbal agreement, the judgment should be affirmed, unless they are sufficient to support a decree for specific performance of a verbal agreement.

1. In the first place, a part performance of the agreement by the plaintiff was essential to the support of such a decree, but this fact is not found. It is found, however, that during the years 1886 and 1887 the plaintiff was in actual, exclusive, and peaceable possession of the two tracts of land in question, and that she cultivated and took crops off the same with the knowledge of the defendants, and that during said years plaintiff claimed, and has ever since claimed, title to each of said tracts of land under the agreement. But it is not found, even by implication, that the defendants consented to such possession, nor that they had notice that plaintiff claimed title at any time before she tendered payment to Malter and Rogers, and demanded of them a deed, which tender and demand are alleged and found to have been made "prior to the commencement of this action;" but how long prior to the commencement of the action is not alleged nor found. It is found, however, that defendants had knowledge that plaintiff cultivated and took crops off the land in question; but this mere knowledge of defendants does not imply their consent, although such knowledge, without objection, would imply consent, under some circumstances. The mere knowledge of defendants that plaintiff cultivated and took crops from the land during the years 1886 and 1887 is not, under the circumstances disclosed by the findings, inconsistent with the fact that the cultivation and taking of crops were without defendants' consent, and even against their express protest, and therefore does not imply their consent. Why is it neither alleged nor found that plaintiff continued in possession after 1887, and up to the commencement of the action,—April 8, 1890? The probable reason that there is no finding as to such possession during the years 1888 and 1889 is that there was no allegation of possession during these two years; and, as against the pleader, it is fair to presume that there was no such allegation because there was no such possession. There is no pretense that plaintiff improved the land, and it appears that she never paid a dollar on the contract price since she tendered the whole contract price "prior to the commencement of this action." All the money paid had been applied to payment for the land deeded to her on January 20, 1886, at the contract price of $41.66⅔ per acre. Nor is there any pretense that the land in question is of greater average value per acre than the land conveyed, nor that the cultivation and cropping of the land in 1886 and 1887 were unprofitable, nor that defendants were benefited thereby. Since the plaintiff has suffered no injury, and the defendants have gained no advantage, from plaintiff's possession and cultivation of the land, it follows that such possession and cultivation did not constitute such part performance as will exempt the verbal agreement from the effect of the statute of frauds. The essential constituents of such part performance as will take a verbal contract for the sale of land out of the statute of frauds are concisely stated by Mr. Pomeroy, in his book on Contracts (section 104), as follows: "The foundation of the doctrine is fraud; not necessarily an antecedent fraud, consciously intended by the party in making the contract, but a fraud inhering in the consequence of thus setting up the statute. When a verbal contract has been made, and one party has knowingly aided or permitted the other to go on and do acts in part performance of the agreement, acts done in full reliance upon such agreement as a valid and binding contract, and which would not have been done without the agreement, and which are of such a nature as to change the relations of the parties, and to prevent a restoration to their former condition and an adequate compensation for the loss by a legal judgment for damages, then it would be a virtual fraud in the first party to interpose the statute of frauds as a bar to the completion of the contract, and thus to secure for himself all the benefits of the acts already done in part performance, while the other party would not only lose all advantage from the bargain, but would be left without adequate remedy for its failure or compensation for what he had done in pursuance of it. To prevent the success of such a palpable fraud, equity interposes under these circumstances, and compels an entire completion of the contract, by decreeing its specific execution." To the same effect is the case of Foster v. Maginnis, 89 Cal. 264, 26 Pac. 828.

2. Plaintiff's delay of more than four years after having accepted the deed of January 20, 1886, as full performance of the agreement on the part of defendants, was so unreasonable, under the circumstances, as to justify the denial of the relief sought. It is true the court found that plaintiff did not discover the alleged error in the description of the land until within three years before the commencement of the action, but did not find when, within three years, plaintiff first discovered the error. But, in the absence of fraud or deception on the part of defendants, the failure of plaintiff to discover that the plain and definite description of the land in the deed which she accepted was not in accordance with the verbal agreement must have been the result of her own inexcusable negligence, from the consequence of which a court of equity will not ordinarily grant the kind of relief sought in this case. Pom. Cont. § 444. But, conceding that the negligence was excusable, it is not found that plaintiff did not discover the error 2 years and 11 months before the commencement of the action, and before she tendered payment and demanded a deed for the two parcels sued for; and, as the burden of excusing her delay devolved upon plaintiff, it may be presumed that she discovered the error barely within 3 years before she made any complaint whatever. In Fowler v. Sutherland, 68 Cal. 415, 9 Pac. 674, a delay of 2 years and 3 months was held to be unreasonable. In Green v. Covillaud, 10 Cal. 317, a delay of 22 months was held to be a defense to an action for specific performance. See, also, O'Donnell v. Jackson, 69 Cal. 622, 11 Pac. 251; Burnett v. Kullak, 76 Cal. 535, 18 Pac. 401; and Requa v. Snow, 76 Cal. 591, 18 Pac. 862. I think the findings of fact support the judgment, and, under the stipulation, that the judgment in each of the above-entitled causes, numbered, respectively, in the court below, 3,180, 3,593, and 3,653, should be affirmed.

We concur: TEMPLE, C.; BELCHER, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, it is ordered that the judgment in each of the above-entitled causes, numbered, respectively, in the court below, 3,180, 3,593, and 3,653, be affirmed.

BLUM et al. v. WESTON et al. (No. 15,376.)

EASEMENTS—WAYS OF NECESSITY.

1. Where land of cotenants is allotted in partition, there is an implied grant of a "way of necessity" over other land allotted to the county road, if that is the only way to reach the highway.

2. The fact that the person seeking to have his title quieted to such way was not a party to the partition proceedings is immaterial if he claims under one who was.

3. Where a way of necessity once existed it will be presumed to exist until some fact is shown establishing nonexistence.

Action by S. Blum and others against F. F. Weston and others. From a judgment for plaintiffs, defendants appeal. Reversed.

R. M. Fitzgerald, for appellants. Latimer & Brown, for respondents.

HAYNES, C. Respondents are the owners of a certain parcel of land in Contra Costa county, which is bounded on the west by a county road, and on the east by lands of appellant Weston, and this action is brought against Weston and his tenant, White, to recover damages for alleged trespasses committed by crossing respondents' land to the county road. The defendants (appellants here), in defense of the action, alleged a way of necessity across plaintiffs' land to reach the county road, and that in the use and enjoyment of said easement, which is appurtenant to their land, they traveled across plaintiffs' land over a roadway designated for such use by plaintiff Simon Blum. Defendant Weston also filed a cross complaint seeking to quiet his title to said easement. Demurrers were interposed to the answers and cross complaint, which were overruled, and no question is made here as to the sufficiency of these pleadings. The cause was tried by the court without a jury, and resulted in findings and judgment for plaintiffs, from which the defendants appeal upon the judgment roll. The findings of fact are very full, and specify with great particularity the whole course of the title of both parcels from the patent granted by the United States down to the parties to this action. Briefly stated, the facts found are as follows: In 1866 the United States patented the San Miguel rancho to 13 persons as tenants in common, both parcels here involved being part of said rancho. These patentees sold their interests to divers persons, and in 1868 about 50 persons owned the rancho as tenants in common; and in that year the ranch was partitioned among the owners by the district court, the hill land and valley land being separately divided. S. Blum, one of the plaintiffs, received an undivided two-thirds interest in lot 8 of "hill land," and the same interest in lot 8 of the "valley land," and M. S. Chase, defendants' remote grantor, received an undivided one-third in each of said lots. The title to Blum's interest in lot 8, hill land, by mesne conveyances, became vested in W. E. Davis; and, Chase having died, the lot last mentioned was, in 1876, partitioned by the court between Swain, his administrator, and Davis, part A, containing 425 acres, being awarded to Davis, and part B, containing 213 acres, to Swain, as administrator. Part B, so partioned to Chase's administrator, through several mesne conveyances became vested in one C. K. Breeze, and in 1889 was sold under execution to satisfy a judgment against Breeze; and the purchaser at execution sale sold and conveyed the same parcel to defendant Weston in July, 1890. In 1871, lot 8, valley land, was also partitioned by the court between Chase's administrator and the plaintiffs in this action, the lot being divided into two parts, designated as divisons 1 and 2, division 1 being allotted to plaintiffs, and being the same parcel described in the complaint in this action. Some other findings were made, which will be noticed hereafter.

So far as the situation of defendants' land is concerned, no question is made but he is entitled to a way of necessity. For a general discussion of this class of easements, and a statement of the law as to several of the elements thereof, see Kripp v. Curtis, 71 Cal. 62, 11 Pac. 879. The substance of respondents' contention is that "a way of necessity" lies in grant, though it is not necessary that it be an express grant; that "the deed of a grantor creates the way when it is one of necessity as much as it does when it is created by an express grant;" but that here there was no grant, the original tract which embraced both parcels being owned by many persons as tenants in common; and that the several ownership of the different parcels was accomplished by proceedings under the statute for partition; and that no grant can be implied in such case. But this contention cannot be sustained, either upon principle or authority. I can perceive no difference in the effect of an allotment by order of the court in a proceeding for partition and an allotment by deed from all the other tenants in common. The effect in each case is to vest the title of all in a particular parcel in one, the decree operating as such conveyance. In Viall v. Carpenter, 14 Gray, 127, it was said: "The court do not doubt that by the division of the real estate of Thomas Carpenter, deceased, in the probate court, his heirs, to whom specific portions of that estate were assigned, acquired a right of way to those portions over other lands which had been their ancestors'; and whether they acquired this right solely as of necessity, without any provision therefor in the language of the division, or by the effect of the language used by the committee in making the record of the division, seems to us unimportant. * * * The reservation, in terms, of a way of necessity, would confer no further right than would be conferred by operation of law, without those words." In Ellis v. Bassett, 128 Ind. 118, 27 N. E. 344, a part of the land belonging to an estate fronting on the highway was set off to the widow, and the remainder was sold by order of court. It was held that the purchaser had a way of necessity over the widow's land. The court in that case went so far as to say that "a right of way, upon a severance of the estate by partition between heirs, sometimes arises when it would not exist in case of a conveyance of one portion of the premises." In Pernam v. Wead, 2 Mass. 203, it was held that where a judgment creditor levied on part of the debtor's land, leaving the latter no passage from the remaining portion to the highway, the debtor has necessarily a right of way over the land levied upon. See, also, Taylor v. Townsend, 8 Mass. 411; Smyles v. Hastings, 22 N. Y. 217.

It does not affect Weston's right that he was not a party to the partition. The easement, resulting by operation of law from the fact that the parcel of land he now owns was cut off from the country road by other subdivisions of the original tract, attached to that parcel as an appurtenance, and passed with each successive transfer of title, whether such transfer was by deed executed by the party or by sale under execution. That it is such appurtenance, and passes to each successive owner, was held in Taylor v. Warnaky, 55 Cal. 350. The Civil Code makes no distinction as to the mode of transfer, but provides generally that "a transfer of real property passes all easements attached thereto." Civil Code, § 1104. Respondents also cite several cases to the effect that partition suits do not create new or additional titles in the respective parties; that they only sever the unity of possession. But those cases did not involve the question of an easement appurtenant to the land allotted to each, but related to the title by which the tenants in common held the land itself. It is further argued that no grant from Chase could convey any title as against Blum, his cotenant. If by this is meant that Chase could not grant a right of way, other than a way of necessity, across land in which Blum was a cotenant, the statement is correct; but Chase and Blum, as cotenants of lot 8, hill land, had a right of way of necessity over lot 8, valley land, which was also owned by them; and when lot 8, hill land, was again partitioned, the way was not lost, because Chase and Blum still owned the valley land as cotenants; or, if the valley land were first partitioned such partition could not destroy the easement which belonged to the hill land.

It is further argued that the judgment in these partition suits did not provide a right of way for the hill land, and that these judgments are final. But we have seen that it is not material whether in these judgments a way was reserved or not; that the law itself creates it. Viall v. Carpenter, supra. Respondents further contend that such way not having been used or claimed from about 1871 to the time when Martin (defendants' grantor) made the agreement with plaintiffs, in 1890, the court should not presume anything in defendants' favor, but should hold that any way they may have had has lapsed by their failure to use or claim it.

The seventh finding is as follows: "That plaintiffs' land is adjacent to and contiguous on the west side of defendant Weston's land, and the county road running from Ygnacio valley to Pine canyon bounds plaintiffs' land on the west, and no county road runs through, adjacent or contiguous to, defendant Weston's land; that defendants' grantors had no means of egress or ingress to and from said defendants' land to the county road except a road from plaintiffs' land traveled by defendants' grantors by a special agreement with plaintiffs." This finding contains facts showing, when taken in connection with the facts hereinbefore stated, all that is necessary to create a way of necessity. It is true that it is found that Weston's grantors used a road across plaintiffs' land by a special agreement; but what that agreement was, or when made, is not stated. The answer to defendants' cross complaint alleges that J. West Martin (Weston's grantor) used it for a short time in 1890, under an agreement with the plaintiffs. It is not found, nor is it claimed by counsel, that it created a way or easement of a different character from a way of necessity, which became appurtenant to the land now owned by Weston. If it did, it is apparent that plaintiffs could not maintain trespass for using it; while, if it did not, I fail to perceive how it could affect the existence of a way of necessity which, upon the partition, became appurtenant to the land. Besides, the facts found having shown that a way of necessity once existed, it must be presumed to continue until some fact found by the court shows that the right no longer exists. For all that appears from this finding, the "special agreement" may have been solely confined to the location of the way, or some like particular, consistent with and appropriate to the existence of the way of necessity. The way, having been created by the necessity for its use, cannot be extinguished so long as the necessity exists. The necessity, of course, ceases when another way has been acquired, or when, by the acquisition of other lands, the owner can reach the public road without traversing the land of others. That defendant could have a way by condemnation under the statute does not affect his right. Pernam v. Wead, supra; Collins v. Prentice, 15 Conn. 44. The findings that defendants have no right of way of necessity or otherwise, that they have not used the way except as trespassers, that plaintiffs have not designated any road, and that Weston does not deraign title from Blum, "except as hereinbefore stated," are conclusions of law from the facts found. It is immaterial whether plaintiffs or their grantors designated a road or way; as, if they did not, the owners of the dominant estate could designate it. Kripp v. Curtis, 71 Cal. 65, 11 Pac. 879.

As all the facts necessary to support a judgment for the defendants have been found, the judgment should be reversed, with directions to the court below to enter judgment upon the findings for defendants with costs.

We concur: SEARLS, C.; BELCHER, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, it is ordered that the judgment appealed from be reversed, with directions to the court below to enter judgment for defendants according to the prayer of the cross complaint.

SPLIVALO v. BRYAN et al. (No. 15,505.)

POWERS OF COUNTY SUPERVISORS—STREET SPRINKLING.

Under Pol. Code, § 2645, subd. 1, as amended in 1893, providing that the board of supervisors shall employ necessary watering carts to do the sprinkling in their district, where such work is not let by contract, they may employ one to do sprinkling without advertising for bids, under Id. § 2643, subd. 11, providing that they may in their discretion advertise for bids for sprinkling, the contract for which must be let to the lowest bidder.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, San Mateo county; G. H. Buck, Judge.

Application by C. R. Splivalo for a writ of mandamus to compel Jacob Bryan and others, supervisors of San Mateo county, to advertise for bids for sprinkling. From a judgment denying a peremptory writ, petitioner appeals. Affirmed.

Ben. Morgan, for appellant. Henry W. Walker, Dist. Atty., for respondents.

VANCLIEF, C. This was an application to the superior court of the county of San Mateo for a writ of mandate to the members of the board of supervisors of that county, commanding them "to advertise for bids for the sprinkling of the roads in the second road district" in that county. An alternative writ was issued on the affidavit of plaintiff. The defendant, by answer, showed cause why a peremptory writ should not be granted. The cause was submitted for judgment on the affidavit of the plaintiff and the answer of the defendants thereto, it being admitted that both were true. A peremptory writ was denied, and paintiff brings this appeal from the judgment.

The material facts disclosed by the affidavit of plaintiff are substantially as follows: That the board of supervisors, through one of its members, William B. Lawrence, "employed one John Rowell to sprinkle the roads in the said second road district, at $4.50 per day," without having advertised for bids to do said work. That petitioner and residents of said road district, being taxpayers of said county, demanded of said board, at a regular meeting of the same, that the contract for the sprinkling of said roads should be made by advertising for bids to do such work, and letting the contract to the lowest bidder, and not otherwise. And that the defendants, constituting said board, have refused to comply with said demand and persist in the employment of said Rowell as aforesaid. The petition also states what petitioner deems to be the law requiring the sprinkling contract to be let as demanded, namely: The eleventh subdivision of section 2643 of the Political Code, as amended in 1893. St. 1893, p. 114. The following is the particular part of the section on which appellant relies: "11. In their discretion, they (the supervisors) may advertise for bids to grade, turnpike, gravel, or sprinkle any road or roads in any road district, which contract shall be let to the lowest responsible bidder; provided the board may reject any or all bids, whenever it shall appear to them that the same are too high." Read in connection with other sections of the Political Code, in pari materia, as amended at the same session of the legislature, I think the meaning of the passage above quoted is that the advertising for bids is in the discretion of the supervisors; but when, in their discretion, they advertise for bids, the contract shall be let to the lowest responsible bidder, etc. Section 2641, Pol. Code, as amended in 1893, provides: "The board of supervisors of the several counties shall divide their respective counties into suitable road districts, and may change the boundaries thereof, and each supervisor shall be ex-officio road commissioner in his supervisor district." Section 2645, as amended at the same session, provides: "Road commissioners, under the direction and supervision and pursuant to the order of the board of supervisors, must: '(1) Take charge of the highways within their respective districts, and shall employ all men, teams, watering carts, and all help necessary to do the work in their respective districts, where the same is not let by contract.'" I think the court below correctly construed the statute in question; and, since it is well settled that the exercise of discretionary power cannot be controlled by writ of mandate, the judgment should be affirmed.

We concur: TEMPLE, C.; BELCHER, C.

TAPI v. SUPERIOR COURT OF CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO.

(No. 15,523.)

(Supreme Court of California. May 4, 1894.)

In bank. Certiorari proceedings by one Tapi against the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco.

Timothy J. Lyons, for petitioner. Dunne & McPike, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. Upon looking into the papers in this case, we discover that no proper return to the writ of certiorari has ever been made, and that there is no record here which we can review. This being so, the order of submission of the cause heretofore made was premature, and must be set aside, and a direction issued to the clerk of the superior court to make a proper return. Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1070–1075. The order submitting the cause is set aside, and the clerk of the superior court is ordered to return the writ of certiorari, with a transcript of the record of the matter to be reviewed.

NIXON v. SELBY SMELTING & LEAD CO.

(No. 15,204.)

MASTER AND SERVANT—NEGLIGENCE—DANGEROUS APPLIANCES—FELLOW SERVANT—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE.

1. A smelting company is liable to an employe injured by the parting of a rubber hose containing hot acids through the negligence of its foreman in splicing two pieces of old hose to make it, though such foreman was the fellow servant of the employe in so far as he served in the places or with the machinery or appliances furnished by the company; since, it being the foreman's duty to select and prepare the appliances to be used by the employes for conducting such acids, he represented the company in this respect.

2. Where, in an action for such injury, no witness testifies that the insufficiency of the hose "was patent to an ordinary observer," and plaintiff testifies that it was not, it does not appear that he was guilty of contributory negligence.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Contra Costa county; John P. Jones, Judge.

Action by Robert Nixon against the Selby Smelting & Lead Company, a corporation, for personal injuries caused by defendant's negligence while plaintiff was in its employ. From a judgment for plaintiff, and from an order denying its motion for a new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

VANCLIEF, C. Action to recover damages for a personal injury alleged to have been suffered by plaintiff while in the employ of defendant, in consequence of the neglect and failure of defendant to provide proper and safe instruments and appliances with which plaintiff was employed to work. The trial was by jury, and the verdict and judgment was in favor of the plaintiff for the sum of $3,816. The plaintiff was employed to work, and at the time he was injured was working, in a room called the "silver room," in which silver is separated from lead and gold by dissolving it in hot diluted sulphuric acid, and then precipitating it from the solution. In this process the solution passed through three adjoining tanks, in the last of which the silver is precipitated, and from which, after the precipitation, the hot diluted acid is pumped through a rubber hose into what is called the "waste tank." While the plaintiff was using this hose in the usual manner, it parted at a point between the tanks, and the hot acid was thereby discharged upon the plaintiff's shoulder and back, and scalded him severely. There were four sets of tanks in the silver room, the waste acid from all of which was pumped into the same waste tank; but only three of the sets were ordinarily used at the same time. On the day of the accident, however, all were used, and the waste acid from all four was to be pumped into the waste tank at the same time; but there were only three hose in the silver room through which to pump it. Under these circumstances, Mr. Helm, the foreman of the silver room, extemporized a fourth hose by connecting two pieces of old hose that had been lying in the silver room for a long time, after having been used for conducting steam into the tanks, for which purpose only short hose was necessary. The two pieces of old hose were connected by slipping one end of each over a piece of lead pipe about eight inches long, so that the two ends met near the middle of the piece of pipe, but were not tied or otherwise fastened to the pipe except by their elastic force, which depended partly upon their quality and partly upon the comparative size of the pipe and the orifice in the hose. About 10 or 15 minutes after plaintiff had commenced to use this hose, one of the connected pieces slipped from the lead pipe, with the result above stated. It appears that these pieces of old hose were much worn and eaten by the acid in which they had been formerly used, and it is admitted by appellant that, without having been tightly bound to the lead pipe by a wrapping of wire or twine, they were unfit for the use to which Mr. Helm put them. The evidence is quite sufficient to justify a finding by the jury that the plaintiff had no notice that this hose, as constructed and adjusted to the tanks by Mr. Helm, was defective, or that he exposed himself to any danger by using it. He was not present while Mr. Helm was connecting the two pieces, though Mr. Helm had told him that the hose to be used by him would be made by connecting the two pieces of old hose, and he knew when he commenced using it that it had been so made. He had not been regularly employed in the silver room, but only occasionally, during the year preceding the accident. He had never before used, nor seen used, a spliced hose, but had implicit confidence that the hose prepared and furnished by Mr. Helm was sufficient for the use intended, and could be safely used. Mr. Roff was general superintendent of the smelting works, and employed and discharged all the men. Under him Mr. Bee was superintendent of the silver room; but Mr. Helm was foreman of all the men employed upon the tanks in the process of dissolving and precipitating silver, and was given power, not only to direct the men employed in those processes, but to determine what implements and appliances should be used, especially for pumping the acids. As to this, Mr. Bee, on the part of the defendant, testified as follows: "All requisitions for materials and supplies in the silver room come to me. Mr. Helm makes all requisitions to me, including rubber hose. Mr. Helm is the foreman in charge of those tanks,—in the immediate supervision of them. All requisitions for rubber hose that he has made to me have been filled immediately. * * * Mr. Helm is the man who has that matter in charge. * * * When the tanks are to be drawn off, I don't generally superintend. That he does. That matter is always intrusted to him. The matter of drawing off the tanks is a matter he controls by his judgment."

1. It is not questioned that the injury to plaintiff was caused by the negligence of Helm, but appellant contends that Helm was a fellow servant of plaintiff, and therefore that the negligence of Helm was the negligence of a fellow servant merely, and not that of the defendant corporation. It must be admitted that, according to the firmly-settled rule of law in this state, Helm, notwithstanding the higher grade of service in which he was employed, was a fellow servant with plaintiff in so far as he served in the places or with the machinery or appliances prepared and furnished by the defendant; and, for the consequences to fellow servants of his negligence in the performance of such services in the places or with machinery or appliances thus prepared and furnished, the defendant is not responsible; but in so far as Helm was authorized and employed to prepare the places in which other servants were to work, or to furnish the machinery or appliances with which they were to work, he represented the corporate defendant, and his negligence in the performance of these services was the negligence of the defendant, for the injurious consequences of which to other servants, without their fault, it is responsible to the same extent it would have been if such places, machinery, and appliances had been prepared and furnished through the immediate agency of Mr. Roff, the general superintendent, or by Mr. Bee, the special superintendent, of the silver room. The reason of this is that it is the duty of employers to provide and furnish suitable and safe appliances (such as rubber hose in this case) with which their employes are required to work; and the law does not permit employers to transfer or shift their responsibility for the performance of this duty to any agent or servant. Of course, they may employ agents or servants to perform this duty, but, in case they do so, all negligence in the performance thereof is nevertheless deemed their negligence, for which they are responsible to a servant or employe thereby injured without contributory negligence on his part. In cases of this kind the agents of the employer who construct or furnish machinery or appliances to be used by employes are not, quoad hoc, fellow servants, although at the same time they may be fellow servants in the performance of other services. Perhaps the observance of this dual relation may reconcile some of the apparent inconsistencies of the cases in this state; but, however this may be, the principles and distinctions, as above stated, are expressly recognized in the later cases, and are consistent with all the cases in this state, except perhaps the cases of McKune v. Railroad Co., 66 Cal. 302, 5 Pac. 482, and Brown v. Sennett, 68 Cal. 225, 9 Pac. 74, which have been criticised and doubted, if not overruled. In Daves v. Southern Pac. Co., 98 Cal. 20, 32 Pac. 708, one Bresnehan was the foreman of a gang of men, including James Daves, employed in repairing a section of defendant's railroad; and, while thus engaged, Daves was killed, in consequence of the negligence of Bresnehan; and the question was whether such negligence was to be deemed the negligence of the defendant, or only that of a fellow servant. Speaking for the court in bank, Mr. Justice Fitzgerald said: "This must be determined, not from the grade or rank of the section foreman, but from the character of the act performed by him. If the act was one which it was the duty of the employer to perform towards its servants, and one of them negligently performed it, to the injury of another servant in the same common employment, then the offending servant, in the performance of such duty, acted as the representative or agent of his employer, for which the employer is responsible. If it was not, then they were fellow servants, and the fellow servant is alone responsible. The duties which a railroad corporation owes to its servants, and which it is required to perform, are to furnish suitable machinery and appliances by which the service is to be performed, and to keep them in repair and order; to exercise ordinary care in the selection and retention of sufficient and competent servants to properly conduct the business in which the servant is employed; and to make such provision for the safety of employes as will reasonably protect them against the dangers incident to their employment. The performance of these duties cannot be shifted by it to a servant so as to avoid responsibility for the injury caused to another servant by its omission; nor is their negligent performance one of the ordinary risks of the service, impliedly assumed by the employe by his contract of employment." A similar question arose in department 2 of this court in the case of Burns v. Sennett, 99 Cal. 363, 33 Pac. 916, in which the alleged negligence was that of failing properly to construct and adjust a strap used as a part of the machinery in connection with which plaintiff was working at the time he was injured; and the question was whether the defendants were liable for such negligence. "And this," said Mr. Justice McFarland, "can be correctly answered only by determining whether or not the proper placing and maintaining of the strap was a positive duty which the appellants personally owed to respondent. Daves v. Southern Pac. Co., 98 Cal. 19, 32 Pac. 708; Railroad Co. v. Baugh, 149 U. S. 369, 13 Sup. Ct. 914. * * * And if, in the case at bar, the adjustment and maintenance of the said strap was not a duty which appellants owed personally to respondent, then all the gang of men employed by appellants in loading the ship were fellow servants, and respondent could not recover of appellants for injuries caused by the negligence of one or more of said fellow servants in constructing, parceling, etc., the strap. There is another general rule, however, under which alone, upon the facts so far appearing, respondent can maintain this action, if he can maintain it at all, and that general rule is that an employer must furnish machinery and appliances reasonably suitable and safe for the employe to do his work. In such a case the employer is, of course, not bound to insure the employe against any defect in such appliances, but he is bound to use reasonable care in their selection or construction; and, where that rule applies, the duty to furnish such machinery and appliances is one which the employer owes personally to the employed, and he cannot escape that duty by trusting it to an employe who negligently performs it." The learned justice further says that this general rule "does not apply to a case where several persons are employed to do certain work, and by the contract of employment, either express or implied, the employes are to adjust the appliances by which the work is to be done." In Elledge v. Railway Co. (Cal.) 34 Pac. 720, the defendant was held liable, under this rule, for the negligence of its foreman on a mine in putting plaintiff in an unsafe place in which to do his work. See, also, Sanborn v. Trading Co., 70 Cal. 261, 11 Pac. 710, and Bowen v. Railway Co., 95 Mo. 269, 8 S. W. 230.

2. As to appellant's contention that plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence, little need be added to what has already been said. The only ground upon which it is claimed that plaintiff was negligent is that the insufficiency of the hose used by him "was patent to an ordinary observer." But no witness so testified; and plaintiff testified to the contrary, as above stated, and, if the jury believed his testimony, they were justified in finding that he was not guilty of contributory negligence. The most that appellant can justly claim is that the evidence on this issue was conflicting.

3. It is contended that the verdict is contrary to the instructions of the court, and therefore is against the law. This point is founded upon a construction of certain isolated instructions, given at request of defendant, which I do not think they will bear when read in connection with all other instructions given. It is not claimed here that any part of the instructions is erroneous, or inconsistent with any other part; and, after a careful examination and comparison of the eight printed pages of the instructions given, I am unable to perceive that, as a whole, they are inconsistent with the verdict. I think the order and judgment should be affirmed.

LYNCH v. BUTTE COUNTY. (No. 18,166.)

COUNTY ASSESSOR—PAY OF DEPUTIES.

The county government act of 1883, prescribing the salaries of all county officers, and declaring that the salaries and fees provided therein shall be in full compensation for all services rendered by the officers or their deputies, and that all deputies shall be paid out of such salaries, but that the assessor shall retain for his own use a certain per cent. on all taxes collected by him, repeals Pol. Code, §§ 3894, 3895, requiring the board of supervisors to allow the assessor enough deputies to complete the assessment within the prescribed time, and to fix their salaries, and providing that these shall be paid out of the county treasury.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Butte county; John C. Gray, Judge.

Action by W. P. Lynch, ex-assessor, against the county of Butte, to recover money paid to deputies employed by him to assist in making up the assessment roll of Butte county. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

H. V. Reardan, for appellant. Lewis Freer, for respondent.

BEATTY, C. J. In this case the defendant demurred to the complaint for want of facts. The demurrer was sustained, and, plaintiff declining to amend, final judgment was entered in favor of the defendant, from which the plaintiff appeals.

The only question to be decided is whether the complaint states a cause of action. Its material allegations are that in the year 1892 the plaintiff was assessor of Butte county; that it was his duty, as assessor, to make and complete the assessment roll of said county between the first Monday of March and the first Monday of July; that for such purpose the assistance of deputies was necessary; that the board of supervisors failed to authorize their appointment; that plaintiff appointed four deputies, whose services were reasonably worth $5 per diem, and amounted for the time they were necessarily employed to $2,400, which sum he paid them; that he afterwards presented to the board of supervisors a demand, properly itemized and verified, for said sum, which was rejected. Upon these facts the appellant contends that he was entitled to judgment against the county for $2,400, and he bases his claim upon the provisions of sections 3894 and 3895 of the Political Code, which read as follows: "3894. The board of supervisors of each county in this state must allow the assessor thereof such a number of deputies, to be appointed by him in addition to the number now fixed, or where no deputies are now allowed, so many deputies as will, in the judgment of the board, enable the assessor to complete the assessment within the time prescribed by law. 3895. The board must fix the compensation of the deputies so allowed; and such compensation must be paid out of the general fund in the county treasury. The compensation must not exceed five dollars per day for each deputy for the time actually engaged; nor must any allowance be made but for work done between the first Monday in March and the first Monday in July of each year." If these sections were still in force, they do not apply to the case made by the complaint. Upon any reasonable construction of their terms they require an application to the board to fix the number of deputies to be appointed, and the rate of their compensation, which thereupon becomes a claim in their favor, payable out of the general fund of the county. If, upon such application, the supervisors fail or refuse to make the proper order, a specific remedy is provided in section 3704 of the same Code, as follows: "3704. If the board of supervisors of any county fails or refuses to either, (1) to allow the assessor to appoint a sufficient number of deputies to make the assessment; or, (2) to furnish the proper books or blanks for his use; or, (3) to furnish the assessor necessary office rooms; then the state board of equalization may, upon application of the assessor, make the allowance, or furnish the proper books, blanks or office room; and all the expense incurred in carrying into effect the provisions of this section must, by the secretary of the board, be certified to the controller, who must, in his next settlement with the county treasurer of any such county, require such treasurer to pay the amount out of any funds belonging to such county."

This statutory remedy for the failure to perform a statutory duty was, we think, intended to be exclusive, as it is clearly sufficient. The plaintiff, however, seems to have entirely disregarded it, as well as the reasonable construction of the sections upon which he bases his claim. But these sections of the Political Code were not in force in 1892. They were a part of the Code as originally adopted, and were superseded as to Butte county by special or local acts passed in 1874 and 1876 (St. 1873–74, p. 734; St. 1875–76, p. 753). By the passage of the county government act in 1883 they were repealed altogether. By that act the salaries of all county officers, including assessors, their deputies and their assistants, were fully regulated; and by section 164[1] thereof it was provided, in effect, if not in express terms, that they should have no other compensation. St. 1883, p. 361. These provisions, being inconsistent with the provisions of the Political Code relied on by the appellant, necessarily repealed them. That this was the actual intent of the legislature, especially with reference to Butte county, is amply demonstrated by the liberal provision made for the compensation of the assessor in counties of the ninth class, which included Butte county, and no other. And that the legislature itself has always construed the county government act as repealing sections 3894, 3895 of the Political Code is clearly evinced by the fact that in every revision of that act special provisions for the appointment of deputies applicable to certain classes of counties have been inserted,—a proceeding altogether unnecessary if those sections of the Political Code remained in force. The judgment of the superior court is affirmed.

LONG v. SUPERIOR COURT et al. (No. 15,642.)

BANKS AND BANKING—LIQUIDATION—PROCEDURE.

Act March 30, 1878, § 11, as amended by acts 1886–87, p. 90, authorizing the bank commissioners to obtain an injunction to restrain the doing of business by a bank which is insolvent or cannot safely do business, requires the business of such bank to be settled within four years after it is declared insolvent, unless a majority of the commissioners consent to its longer continuance in liquidation. The act also provides that banks in liquidation shall make semiannual reports of their condition to the bank commissioners, and that the commissioners shall examine their condition, and "shall have a general supervisory control" of them, and shall designate the number of officers and employes necessary to close up the business and fix their salaries. Held, that the act does not authorize the commissioners to supersede the officers of the bank in the control of the bank's property during its progress towards final liquidation.

In bank.

Application by S. F. Long for a writ of prohibition against the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco and the board of bank commissioners. Writ granted.

Frank M. Stone and Reel B. Terry (A. Barnard, Dunne & McPike, and Martin Stevens, of counsel), for petitioner. W. T. Baggett, for respondents.

GAROUTTE, J. This is an original application for a writ of prohibition against the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco, state of California, department No. 4, J. C. B. Hebbard, judge thereof, and the board of bank commissioners. The proceedings which have furnished the occasion for the application for the writ may be briefly stated as follows: An action was brought in the name of the people of the state of California upon complaint of the board of bank commissioners, and upon the information of the attorney general, against the Pacific Bank and its directors. The complaint alleged that the board of directors had willfully mismanaged the business of the corporation (giving instances of such mismanagement in detail); stated that it was unsafe for the parties interested in said corporation for it to continue to transact a banking business; that the corporation was insolvent; and prayed that the court enjoin and prohibit it from transacting any further business. The foregoing complaint was filed under the provisions of the bank act, found in the Statutes of 1877–78 (page 740), and the amendments thereto, found in the Statutes of 1886–87 (page 90); and there is no question but that ample authority is found in section 11 of that act to inaugurate the proceeding here outlined.

The defendant, by its board of directors, filed an answer, wherein the allegations of the complaint as to mismanagement of its business were denied, but it was expressly admitted in said answer that the corporation was insolvent, and it was unsafe for parties interested in the corporation that it should continue to transact business. The issues raised as to the mismanagement of the business of the corporation were not tried and adjudicated upon, but a decree termed an "interlocutory decree" was entered by the court upon the admitted facts, wherein it was adjudged and decreed: (1) "That the said corporation is insolvent, and that it is unsafe for the parties interested in said corporation for it to continue to trans act business; and it is ordered, adjudged, and decreed by the court that said corporation, said Pacific Bank, be, and is hereby, enjoined and prohibited from the transaction of any further business, and it is ordered, adjudged, and decreed that a writ of injunction issue in this action enjoining and prohibiting said corporation, said Pacific Bank, its officers and agents, from the transaction of any further business." (2) "And it is further ordered, adjudged, and decreed by the court that the affairs of said corporation shall be closed; that the business thereof shall be settled and liquidated under the control of the bank commissioners of this state, subject to the direction and jurisdiction of this court; and that for the purpose of such liquidation, the receiver heretofore appointed in this action, Harry I. Willey, is hereby ordered and directed to deliver over to said bank commissioners all the property and assets of every kind and nature of the said corporation, and all the books, records, and papers belonging to said bank. It is further ordered and adjudged that said bank commissioners shall from time to time make report to this court of their acts and doings in the liquidation of the business of said corporation, and that they shall make such report whenever directed by this court to do so; and it is ordered that the said bank commissioners, in settling and liquidating the affairs and business of said corporation, shall be subject to the supervision and control of this court, and that all the property and assets of said bank, and all its books and papers, shall continue and remain in the custody of this court while the business of said bank is being settled by said bank commissioners. It is further ordered that the said bank commissioners take such proceedings against such corporation as may be decided upon by its creditors." As to the first paragraph of this decree, it is clearly within the power of the court to make, and clearly was its duty to make, under the admitted facts. This is conceded by all parties to the present litigation, but the remaining portion of the decree is attacked, as being without the jurisdiction of the court, and beyond the limitations of its power. The court's jurisdiction in a proceeding of this character comes only from the statute under which it claims to act, and its powers are limited by the statute. It is said in Smith v. Westerfield, 88 Cal. 378, 26 Pac. 206: "Although it is a court of general jurisdiction, yet, in the exercise of these powers, its jurisdiction is limited and special; and whenever its acts are shown to have been in excess of the power conferred upon it, or without the limits of this special jurisdiction, such acts are nugatory, and have no binding effect upon those who have invoked its authority or submitted to its decision." And in the case of the State Invest. & Ins. Co. v. Superior Court, 35 Pac. 549, it is said of the jurisdiction of the superior court, in a case involving the principle here involved: "As its jurisdiction is derived from the statute, it is limited by the provisions of the statute, both as to the conditions under which it may be invoked and the extent of the judgment which it may make in the exercise of this jurisdiction." We quote from Windsor v. McVeigh, 93 U. S. 274: "Though the court may possess jurisdiction of a cause, of the subject-matter, and of the parties, it is still limited in its modes of procedure, and in the extent and character of its judgments. It must act judicially in all things, and cannot then transcend the power conferred by the law." As containing an interesting resumé of this principle of jurisdiction, and the authorities supporting it, see Thomas v. Mortgage Co., 47 Fed. 556.

[1] County Government Act, § 164, declares that the salaries and fees provided in such act for county officers shall be in full compensation for services rendered by such officers or their deputies, and that all deputies shall be paid out of such salaries, but that the assessor shall retain for his own use a specified per cent. on all taxes collected by him.

Section 11 of the bank act contains the law bearing upon the question here involved, and while the subject-matter of the section is one of the gravest importance, involving vast interests, complicated details, covering the liquidation of great banking institutions, and extending through a long term of years, yet the text of the statute is most meager, and what little there is of it most unsatisfactory and uncertain. Upon its face the statute is wholly inadequate to meet the exigencies that are bound to arise when courts are called upon, under its provisions, to deal with banking corporations. Its authors did not appear to understand or appreciate the importance of the question upon which they undertook to legislate, nor the difficulties surrounding its successful solution. For these reasons the court is left to grope its way in the dark upon the construction of a statute which, above every other statute, should be so written that all might understand. It is not necessary for the court to consider the meaning of that portion of the decree framed in the words of the statute, directing the bank commissioners to take such proceedings against the corporation as might be decided upon by its creditors, for no question of that character is involved in these proceedings. But the second paragraph of this decree in effect directs the bank commissioners to take charge of the assets of the corporation, and, under the control and supervision of the court, proceed to final and full liquidation of its affairs; and the justification of this portion of the court's decree in the law is the matter presented for our consideration upon the present application for this writ; for, in pursuance of this branch of the decree, the bank commissioners, in effect, as agents of the court, have taken charge and control of the property and business of the bank, and, to the exclusion of its directors, are proceeding to administer upon its effects, and conduct it through the course of liquidation. The present proceeding is one invoked to restrain the court and its agents (the bank commissioners) from carrying out the policy outlined and declared in its decree, upon the ground that the court is acting beyond the limits of any power conferred upon it. We think the writ should issue. It is demonstrated by the authorities quoted that the statute is the measure of the court's power, and unless the statute says the bank commissioners, in conjunction with and under the control of the court, may do the things they have done and are threatening to do, they are outside of the law, and their acts must cease. But the bank act is the only source from which the court's power to decree these things could flow, and that source of power is unable to respond when called upon to show good and legal cause for the court's action. Counsel for respondents have cited us to no law giving the court authority to administer upon and distribute the effects of this insolvent corporation, and we cannot find it in the statute. In giving a construction to section 11 of this act, it must be borne in mind that honest banks may become insolvent, as well as honest men, and that in the present case we have no question of fraud or dishonesty charged against the officers of this corporation. The two facts upon which the entire decree is based, and which must form its support, are that the corporation is insolvent, and that it is unsafe for parties interested in it for it to continue to transact business. Those facts are entirely consistent with a past honest administration of its business, and also consistent with a future honest liquidation of its affairs by its officers. Under such a state of facts, there is no reason why the officers of the bank should not proceed with the closing up of its affairs, and expeditiously return to the creditors their just dues. Such appears to be the evident purpose of the statute. The legislature appeared to recognize the fact that the officers of a bank, —men who are personally cognizant of the business throughout its ramifications,—having full knowledge of its minutest details, were the parties who could best and soonest carry it through a successful liquidation in the interest of its creditors. The injunction issued by the court enjoining the further transaction of business by the bank is in the language of the statute, and means what the statute means. The statute refers to the further transaction of a business for the conducting of which the corporation was organized. The prohibition is a restriction upon the doing of any further new business. No more money is to be received upon deposit; no more money is to be loaned. These are the objects and purposes of the statute, and nothing more. It is not contemplated that business may not be done by the officers of the bank which is absolutely necessary to the preservation of its assets, but, at the same time, it is contemplated that all its future acts and conduct must be directed towards the accomplishment of a single purpose, to wit, an economical and expeditious winding up of its affairs.

In this case there is no question of fraud or dishonesty upon the part of the officers of the bank, and no question of the rights of creditors petitioning the court for relief under the peculiar conditions existing. Measured by the facts found by the court, its jurisdiction did not extend beyond a prohibition of a further prosecution of the business of the bank, for that was the limit of its statutory authority. It had no power to oust the directors of the bank from the possession of its assets, or deprive them of the management of its affairs during its liquidation; for the statute vests in the court no such power. The decree authorized by the statute deprives the corporation of the right to further transact business, and, ex necessitate, there is nothing left for it to do but to pass into liquidation. The statute outlines in general terms how this liquidation shall be conducted, and its entire tenor is inconsistent with the idea of placing its affairs exclusively in the hands of the bank commissioners for the purposes of liquidation. To indicate that such was not the intention of the lawmaking power, and that a construction upon such lines is wholly unjustifiable, let us notice its provisions: (1) The section requires that the business of the bank be settled within four years from the time it is declared insolvent or thrown into liquidation, unless, at the expiration of such time, it shall obtain the consent in writing from a majority of the board of bank commissioners to continue in liquidation for a longer period. This provision contemplates that "it [the bank]" shall obtain the consent of the board of bank commissioners in order that it may continue in liquidation after the expiration of the term of four years. If the matter of liquidation was in the hands of the commissioners and the court, the foregoing provision would not be found in the act. (2) It is also provided that a bank in liquidation shall make semiannual reports of its condition to the bank commissioners, and shall state therein the amount of dividends paid, debts collected, and the amount realized on property sold. It is apparent that this report is to be made by the officers of the bank who have knowledge of these matters, to the bank commissioners. (3) It is also provided that the bank commissioners shall have the power, and it is made their duty, to examine the condition of every such corporation in liquidation in the same manner as in the case of solvent banks, "and shall have a general supervisory control of any such corporation." These provisions of the statute have no purpose, and are wholly meaningless, if the liquidation of this bank is to pass into the hands of the bank commissioners. (4) It is further declared that the bank commissioners shall have the power to designate the number of officers and employes necessary to close up the business and fix the salaries of the same, and shall do all in their power to make such liquidation as economical and expeditious as the interests of the depositors will admit. It will thus be observed that the commissioners are not even given the power to select the officers and employes, but simply to fix the number and designate their salaries. (5) The act expressly confers upon the bank commissioners the same powers over all banks in process of liquidation at the date of its passage as they have over banks situated as the one here involved; yet it has never been claimed by any one that the mere passage of the act ipso facto ousted the management then in possession of banks undergoing liquidation, and conferred complete and exclusive control over them upon the bank commissioners. It is evident such a thing was never contemplated by the legislature, and more than evident that such a contention could not stand in law for a moment. The foregoing citations from the statute are amply sufficient to indicate the general purpose of its provisions, and to further indicate beyond any doubt that the officers of the bank are not to be superseded by the commissioners in the control of its property during its progress towards final liquidation. As to the exact purpose intended to be accomplished by the following words found in the statute, we are not prepared to say: "And shall have a general supervisory control of every such corporation." In a limited sense, the bank commissioners have a general supervisory control of all solvent corporations, and we are not prepared to say that this clause of the act is more than a reiteration, in a general way, of those duties of the bank commissioners towards a bank in liquidation which are stated in terms by the act itself.

There is nothing in the conclusions we have reached in this case opposed to the principle of law declared in the recent decision promulgated in what is commonly known as the "Pacific Bank Case" (People v. Superior Ct. of San Francisco, 34 Pac. 492). It is there decided that the statutory insolvency proceedings had no application to banking corporations, but that the bank act, portions of which are involved in this litigation, superseded and supplanted the insolvent act of 1880. Such was the only question involved in that action, and we have no doubt whatever as to the soundness of the law there declared. There may be isolated clauses of the opinion written in that case, as may be found in the opinions of many courts written in complicated cases, that inferentially cover more ground than the facts involved actually demanded for their determination, but those things are matters separate and apart from the principles of law involved and declared in the case, and of no binding effect upon the court. Let the writ issue as prayed for.

SONOMA COUNTY v. CITY OF SANTA ROSA. (No. 15,257.)

CITIES—LIABILITIES—BOARD OF PRISONERS.

1. Where a city recorder had the jurisdiction of a justice of the peace of offenses against state laws and against city ordinances under the charter, which further provided that he might imprison persons adjudged guilty of the violation of city ordinances or state laws in the city prison or county jail, the city is liable for the board of persons committed to the county jail for violations of city ordinances, since the charter intends that prisoners shall be imprisoned in the city prison for violation of ordinances and in the county jail for violation of state laws.

2. In such case, under Pen. Code, § 1611, providing that the sheriff must receive all persons committed to jail by competent authority, it is immaterial that the recorder had no authority to commit prisoners convicted by him to the county jail, if he had jurisdiction to convict them.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Sonoma county; S. K. Dougherty, Judge.

Action by the county of Sonoma against the city of Santa Rosa. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

A. G. Burnett, Dist. Atty., Lippitt & Lippitt, and Emmett Sewell, Dist. Atty., for appellant. Wm. F. Cowan, for respondent.

HAYNES, C. This is an action brought by the county of Sonoma against the city of Santa Rosa to recover $371.70, alleged to have been paid by the county to the sheriff for boarding prisoners committed to the county jail by the city recorder for violations of the ordinances of the city. A general demurrer to the complaint was sustained, and this appeal is from a judgment entered thereon against the plaintiff.

The respondent, in support of its demurrer, contends that under the city charter it has the right to commit to the county jail all persons found guilty in the recorder's court of violations of the city ordinances, and that the county is compelled to support such prisoners at its own expense, and that the city is therefore not liable. The charter gives the recorder a dual jurisdiction: (1) The same jurisdiction over crimes and offenses committed against the state law, within the city limits, as is conferred on justices of the peace; and makes applicable to this jurisdiction of the recorder all the statutes of the state relating to the jurisdiction of justices of the peace in criminal cases, including "the processes issued by them, the trial of such cases, holding to bail, committing to prison," etc. (2) A jurisdiction over all breaches and violations of city ordinances, with power "to fine and imprison persons adjudged guilty of such violations or noncompliance with said ordinances, or violations of the laws of the state, in the manner provided by law or the ordinances of the city. Such imprisonment shall be in the city prison, or the county jail of Sonoma county." St. 1875-76, p. 257, § 15. Under this provision of the charter it is claimed the recorder may imprison violators of the city ordinances, either in the city prison or the county jail, at his option. But, if we have regard only to this charter provision, it is quite as clear that he has the same option in reference to violators of the criminal laws of the state; and therefore, if he chose, he could sentence any or all offenders against the state law to imprisonment in the city prison, and all offenders against the city ordinances to imprisonment in the county jail. But it is clear that he can have no such option in regard to persons found guilty of violating the criminal laws of the state. There is not only no intention to change the criminal law of the state apparent in the charter, but the frequent reference to such laws as the source of his powers in such cases places it beyond question that no such change was intended. All offenses against the criminal laws of the state are divided into two classes,—felonies and misdemeanors. Pen. Code, § 16. By section 19 of the same Code it is provided: "Except in cases where a different punishment is prescribed by this Code, every offense declared to be a misdemeanor is punishable by imprisonment in a county jail not exceeding six months, or by a fine not exceeding five hundred dollars, or by both." One of these classes of offenders is therefore excluded from this supposed option, and a reasonable inference would therefore be that the other place of imprisonment mentioned in the charter (the city prison) was intended for the other class of offenders, especially as the charter does not make the violation of a city ordinance a misdemeanor. But there are other reasons for this construction. The city marshal can have no control over prisoners confined in the county jail, yet the charter of the city of Santa Rosa provides that he "shall have charge of the city prison and prisoners, and of any chain gang or prisoners at work under any judgment or fine imposed by the city recorder." The language is not that he shall have charge of the city prison and of the prisoners confined therein, but he is to have charge of the city prisoners, as well as of the city prison; and there is no provision in the charter giving the sheriff of the county any charge over or concerning them, unless it is found in the supposed authority to commit them to the county jail.

But a more conclusive reason for the construction we have given this provision of the charter is found in our frame of government, the policy of which is to localize, as far as can reasonably be done, not only the power, but the expense of government. The state is divided into counties, townships, and municipal corporations, with such limited legislative powers as are essential to each organization, and the expenses of such local governments, in all matters purely local, at least, are borne by such locality. The expense of the county government is borne by the whole county. But a city requires a government of its own. The laws necessary for the government of the people of the state at large lack something made necessary by the aggregation of large numbers of people. This lack is supplied by ordinances which are not required in the rural districts and small villages. The enforcement of these ordinances, and the preservation of order, require machinery not required elsewhere, the expense of which should, and under our well-defined policy, manifested clearly in our codes and statutes, as well as in the state constitution, is required to, be borne by the city; and therefore, if the language of the charter here in question is doubtful, or capable of different interpretations, it ought to be read in the light of our frame of government, and construed in harmony therewith, for we cannot presume that the legislature intended, after giving the city of Santa Rosa ample authority to provide means for defraying the expenses of her city government, that any part of it should be borne by the county at large. In accordance with this policy, the city is not only empowered by its charter to levy and collect taxes for the support of its city government, but the city recorder is required to pay into the city treasury all fines and penalties imposed and collected in criminal proceedings. Section 15, p. 258. We think the provision in question requires persons found guilty of violating city ordinances to be committed to the city prison, and those found guilty of the violation of the criminal laws of the state, where imprisonment is ordered, to be committed to the county jail. This construction gives full effect to the provision under consideration, and is the only construction that would bring it in harmony with the general policy of the state and give effect to the provision in the charter placing city prisoners under the care and control of the marshal.

Respondent (the city of Santa Rosa) contends, however, that if the charter authorized the commitment of city prisoners to the county jail, plaintiff cannot recover, since, under the law, the county is chargeable with the support of prisoners confined therein; and, if they were illegally committed to the county jail by the recorder, such illegal commitment could not raise an implied contract on the part of the city to support them; so that in either case the city is not liable. If the second premise above stated is correct, the conclusion is inevitable. Section 1611 of the Penal Code provides: "The sheriff must receive all persons committed to jail by competent authority, and provide them with necessary food * * * to be paid out of the county treasury." It is contended that if the charter does not authorize the commitment to the county jail of persons found guilty of the violation of city ordinances, such commitments are in excess of his jurisdiction and void, and are not made by competent authority; that the plain duty of the sheriff, under such circumstances, is to refuse to receive the prisoner. But counsel are wrong in this construction. The commitments were illegal, but were nevertheless made by "competent authority." By competency is meant the legal power or capacity to take cognizance of a cause; as, for example, the competency of a judge or court to examine and decide. In the case of People v. Liscomb, 3 Hun, 778, the words "competent tribunal," used in the habeas corpus act of the state of New York, were construed to mean "a tribunal having jurisdiction of the subject-matter and the person." That the city recorder had jurisdiction to try and punish these persons is not disputed, and that constitutes "competent authority." That he erred did not affect the character of the tribunal. All that the sheriff was bound to know was that the city recorder had jurisdiction. That the recorder could, in some cases at least, legally commit prisoners to the county jail, was beyond question; and the sheriff could have no authority to sit in judgment, and determine whether, in any given case, the recorder had exceeded his jurisdiction. If respondent's construction is correct, it would apply as well to commitments made by the superior court, and would equally justify the sheriff in refusing to receive the prisoner if the court erred in imposing the punishment. If that construction should prevail, the liability of the county for the support of a prisoner committed by the superior court would be made to depend, not upon the jurisdiction of that court over the offense and the person of the offender, but upon the question whether the court erred in the exercise of its jurisdiction as to the sentence pronounced. But it is hardly consistent for respondent to urge (as it does in the other branch of the case) that the commitment was improper, and, because the sheriff did not detect its error and refuse to receive these prisoners, that he should not be compensated for their support, for upon its theory neither the city nor county could be liable; the ctiy, because it did not promise to pay, and the county, because the commitment was not by "competent authority." But, as we construe the charter, the county has borne an expense which, under the law, should have been borne by the city. It is said, however, that the complaint does not allege that these prisoners were received "at the request of the city;" but the complaint alleges the facts which show they were so received. A commitment by the judicial officer of the city ought, though erroneous, to have at least the force of a request; and, the expense of enforcing its ordinances being imposed upon the city by law, a promise to pay therefor is implied. The judgment appealed from should be reversed, with directions to overrule the demurrer.

We concur: BELCHER, C.; VANCLIEF, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment appealed from is reversed, and the court directed to overrule the demurrer to the complaint.

In re HUDSON. (No. 21,102.)

ATTORNEYS—REMOVAL—SUFFICIENCY OF ACCUSATION.

Under Code Civ. Proc. §§ 290, 291, providing that the accusation for removal of an attorney must be in writing, state the matters charged, and be verified by oath that the charges therein contained are true, an accusation merely on information, unsupported by informant's affidavit, is insufficient. De Haven, J., dissenting, on the ground that, though the verification of the accusation is insufficient, the objection cannot be raised by the court of its own motion.

Application for the removal of Rodney J. Hudson from the office of attorney. Dismissed.

PER CURIAM. Application for removal from the office of attorney. A document entitled "Accusation" has been presented by H. A. McCraney, in which he alleges certain facts against the above-named Rodney J. Hudson on information and belief, and prays that said Hudson be removed from the office of attorney and counselor at law. The accusation is also supported by the oath of McCraney, in the following form: "State of California, City and County of San Francisco—ss.: H. A. McCraney, being first duly sworn, deposes and says that he is the affiant in the foregoing affidavit and accusation; that he has heard said affidavit and accusation, and knows the contents thereof; that the same is true, of his own knowledge, except as to the matters therein stated on information and belief. As to those matters, that he believes it to be true." Sections 290 and 291, Code Civ. Proc., provide that the accusation for the removal of an attorney or counselor must be in writing, and must state the matters charged, "and be verified by the oath of some person to the effect that the charges therein contained are true." It was held in Hotchkiss' Case, 58 Cal. 39, that by these provisions the legislature clearly intended that the accusation must be made by one who has at least some information on which he bases his charges, and that an accusation merely upon information that was not supported by the affidavit of the informant was insufficient. Upon the authority of that case, the application is dismissed.

DE HAVEN, J. I dissent from the judgment. While I fully concur in the view that the verification attached to the accusation is insufficient, still, in my opinion, the objection is one which ought not to be raised by the court on its own motion. The accusation having been presented, the matter should be heard on its merits, unless the accused should himself interpose the technical objection to the form of the verification; and, even if such objection were made by him, the proceeding should not be dismissed, but the complainant should be permitted to amend so as to make the accusation and verification conform to the law. The accused should have the opportunity to answer the accusation, and if, upon full investigation, such accusation should not be sustained by the evidence, he is entitled to a judgment acquitting him of the charges, which, though informally made, certainly reflect seriously upon his professional character.

MARCEAU v. TRAVELLERS' INS. CO. OF HARTFORD. (No. 18,199.)

(Supreme Court of California. March 20, 1894.)

INSANITY—INSURANCE — INTENTIONAL KILLING OF INSURED.

On an issue as to the sanity of the person who killed insured, the testimony of an expert that a person might know an act to be wrong, and have no power to resist an impulse to commit such act, is not ground for reversal, though such "insane impulse" is not a defense to a charge of felony. Beatty, C. J., dissenting. 35 Pac. 856, affirmed.

In bank.

On rehearing. For original opinion, see 35 Pac. 856.

PER CURIAM. Rehearing denied.

BEATTY, C. J. I dissent from the order of the court denying a rehearing. It is assumed in the opinion of Mr. Justice GAROUTTE, as it has been in the argument of counsel, that the same test is to be applied in determining whether the death of Fiske was caused by an injury intentionally inflicted, within the meaning of this policy, as is applied to the plea of insanity in a criminal case. Accepting this proposition as embodying a correct statement of the law, it follows that unless the slayer of Fiske was of such unsound mind at the time of the killing as not to know the nature and quality of the act, or, in other words, so insane as not to know that it was wrong and criminal, then the injury was purposely inflicted, notwithstanding the slayer may have been impelled to the act by an insane impulse which he had not the power to resist; for such is undoubtedly the law of this state, as established by numerous decisions in criminal cases. This being so, it could not fail to prejudice the defendant to allow evidence to go to the jury, over its objection, to the effect that there is a kind of insanity which our law does not recognize as an excuse for criminal acts. Such testimony was wholly uncalled for. It was for the court to inform the jury, as matter of law, what insanity is, and to confine their consideration to that species of insanity that the law recognizes. But the ruling admitting the evidence quoted in the opinion of the court over the defendant's objection was, in effect, a declaration to the jury that it was material for them to know, as bearing upon the issue to be found, that there is a kind of insanity other than that which determines responsibility for criminal acts. Such a ruling, unless subsequently cured by striking out the objectionable testimony, and instructing the jury, unequivocally, that they must wholly discard it from their consideration in making up their verdict, is, in my opinion, not only erroneous, but highly prejudicial. And I think it is laying down a most dangerous rule, and one which must lead to serious abuses, to say, as the court does say, with reference to this testimony, that there is "no possible objection to a practice of placing before them [the jury] general information bearing upon this most metaphysical and abstruse subject." The aim and effort of courts ought to be to make the law which jurors are to consider for the purpose of finding a verdict as plain and simple as possible; and, to my mind, there exist the gravest possible objections to the admission of witnesses to testify to that which is purely matter of law, and especially when, as in this case, such testimony is, for all possible purposes of the trial, in direct conflict with the law governing the decision of the jury. But the error of the superior court did not end with the admission of this testimony. So far from striking it out, and instructing the jury to disregard it, the court charged the jury, with respect to insanity, in the language quoted in the opinion of Justice GAROUTTE (fifth paragraph). In this instruction two (possibly three) distinct hypotheses are stated, upon either one of which the jury are told they may find that the injuries to Fiske were unintentional; and one of these hypotheses, clearly, is the insane impulse theory, pure and simple. The attempt, in the opinion of the court, to give to this part of the charge a meaning consistent with the doctrine of insanity, so clearly and so long established in the law of California, is, to my mind, a failure; and, even if the instruction were so obscure and unintelligible in its terms as to warrant us in assuming that the jury did not understand it in an objectionable sense because they could not understand it at all, the original error in the admission of the testimony as to insane impulse would remain uncured. Because of the errors here briefly indicated, I think that the judgment and order of the superior court are erroneous, and should have been reversed.

PEOPLE v. STOKES. (No. 21,070.)

CRIMINAL LAW—APPEALABLE ORDERS.

Defendant cannot appeal from an order dismissing a prosecution pending against him.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Tulare county; W. A. Gray, Judge.

An information against Ella Stokes was dismissed, and she appeals. Dismissed.

Horace L. Smith, for appellant. Atty. Gen. Hart and Maurice E. Powers, Dist. Atty., for the People.

PER CURIAM. This is an appeal from a judgment of the superior court of Tulare county, Cal., dismissing an information which was pending in said court against the defendant. On June 15, 1893, upon motion of the district attorney, the superior court ordered that the case "be, and is hereby, dismissed, on the grounds that the offense charged was committed in the territory comprising the new county of Kings." The defendant contends that this dismissal is erroneous, because it was not made for a statutory reason, nor in furtherance of justice. For the purpose of this case it is sufficient to say that a defendant is not entitled to an appeal from an order dismissing a prosecution which is pending against him. If courts deem it proper to dismiss prosecutions against defendants charged with crime, we know of no objections in law which a defendant is entitled to urge against such a course. This defendant was not injured by the order of the court dismissing the prosecution, which resulted in her discharge. For the foregoing reasons, the order is affirmed.

CALLAHAN v. LOUGHRAN. (No. 15,429.)

Landlord and Tenant—Negligence in Making Repairs.

Plaintiff alleged that, a stairway of premises rented by him from defendant being in need of repair, defendant agreed to repair it, and employed a carpenter, who performed work on it and repaired it; that the same day, after defendant and his employe had, as plaintiff's wife believed, ceased repairs, and made the stairway fit for use, she, in the use of ordinary prudence, tried to use it, and by reason that, unknown to her, a step was negligently placed without being nailed, she was thrown down and injured. Held bad, as failing to aver that the repairs were completed, or that defendant induced her to believe they were.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Santa Clara county; F. W. Lawler, Judge.

Action by John Callahan against John Loughran for damages for personal injuries to plaintiff's wife. Demurrer sustained, and judgment for defendant. Plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Frank Sullivan, for appellant. W. H. Barrows, for respondent.

SEARLS, C. This is an appeal from a final judgment in favor of defendant, rendered upon plaintiff's refusal to amend his complaint after an order sustaining defendant's demurrer thereto. The only question involved relates to the sufficiency of the complaint. According to its averments, plaintiff, John Callahan, and his wife, were tenants of the defendant, they having leased from him five rooms in the second story of a tenement at No. 115 Twentieth street, San Francisco. The rooms were connected with the back yard by a wooden stairway of 30 steps. Defendant, at the time of entering into the lease, agreed with plaintiff and his wife to make all necessary repairs, and at various times during the tenancy did make repairs of various kinds. During the tenancy, the stairs aforesaid became insecure by reason of weak supports and a broken step, whereupon plaintiff and his wife notified defendant, who failed to make repairs, in consequence of which plaintiff and wife notified defendant that they would vacate the premises, or apply one month's rent to repair the same, unless the stairway was repaired in a proper manner. On the 10th of September, 1890, defendant, to prevent his tenants from leaving or applying a month's rent for repairs, agreed to do the same, and on that day attempted to repair the stairway, and employed a carpenter, who performed work thereon and repaired the same. On the 10th day of September, 1890, after defendant and his employe had, as plaintiff's wife believed, ceased repairs and made the stairway fit for use, she (the said wife), after the use of ordinary prudence, undertook to use the same; and while descending the said stairs, by reason of the negligent placing of a step on said stairs without nailing it, of which plaintiff's wife was ignorant, the step gave way, whereby she was thrown down the stairs, and injured. The husband seeks to recover damages for the injury and expense sustained by him in the premises, to the extent of $5,300.

The demurrer raises two objections to the complaint: (1) That it does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action; (2) That it is ambiguous and uncertain. Among the specifications under this latter head are: (a) That it fails to set forth the facts upon which plaintiff's wife founded the belief that defendant had repaired the stairway, and made it fit for the use of human beings; (b) that it does not show what, if any, care plaintiff's wife took to ascertain whether or not repairs had been made, etc.

At common law the landlord was not, in the absence of a covenant or stipulation binding him so to do, liable to do any repairs whatever. Woodf. Landl. & Ten. p. 595; Tayl. Landl. & Ten. §§ 327, 328. It follows that the measure of defendant's liability must be regulated by the standard of the statute. Section 1941 of the Civil Code provides that "the lessor of a building intended for the occupation of human beings must, in the absence of an agreement to the contrary, put it into a condition fit for such occupation, and repair all subsequent dilapidations thereof, which render it untenantable, except such as are mentioned in section 1929." Section 1929 (referred to above) applies to such deterioration or injuries as are occasioned by the ordinary negligence of the hirer. Section 1942 of the Civil Code provides as follows: "If within a reasonable time after notice to the lessor, of dilapidations which he ought to repair, he neglects to do so, the lessee may repair the same himself, where the cost of such repairs do not require an expenditure greater than one month's rent of the premises, and deduct the expenses of such repairs from the rent, or the lessee may vacate the premises, in which case he shall be discharged from further payment of rent, or performance of other conditions." In Van Every v. Ogg, 59 Cal. 563, it was held that the tenant had no right to recover damages for dilapidation of the demised premises during the pendency of the tenancy, except such as is given by the statute; and as section 1942, supra, only gave the tenant the right to make repairs to the extent of one month's rent, or to vacate the premises upon the failure of the landlord after notice to make such repairs, that his remedy is confined to these measures, and he cannot recover beyond them for damages sustained by such dilapidation. In other words, the obligation of the landlord is said to be limited to the extent of the privilege conferred upon the tenant. Sieber v. Blanc, 76 Cal. 173, 18 Pac. 260; Willson v. Treadwell, 81 Cal. 58, 22 Pac. 304; Tatum v. Thompson, 86 Cal. 203, 24 Pac. 1009; Green v. Redding, 92 Cal. 548, 28 Pac. 599. From the result of the foregoing decisions, counsel for the respondent draws the conclusion that by the special agreement the landlord assumed no obligations other than those imposed upon him by section 1941 of the Civil Code, and that the damage for a breach of such obligation is limited by the provisions of section 1942, supra. We agree with the learned counsel only in part.

In Eblin v. Miller's Ex'r, 78 Ky. 371, it was held that a mere promise by the landlord to repair, based upon the tenant's agreement to relinquish a purpose of abandoning the premises, cannot be supported for want of a consideration. Concede, then, for the purposes of the argument, that the contract or promise to repair was void for want of consideration, or that, if valid, it imposed upon the landlord no obligation different from, or in addition to, that of section 1942, and that, upon its breach by failure of the landlord to make such repairs, the rights of the tenants would have been measured by that section, still, when the landlord undertook to make the repairs, whether pursuant to a contract, or an obligation imposed by statute, or as a volunteer, he was in duty bound to use ordinary care in the conduct of the work. At section 175 of Taylor on Landlord and Tenant, the author says: "Again, while the landlord is not, as such, bound to repair, yet if he assumes to do so, and neglects to perform his obligation, or, in performing it, if any injury is caused from want of skill in, or proper selection of, his workman, he is held therefor,"—citing Benson v. Suarez, 43 Barb. 408; Leslie v. Pounds, 4 Taunt. 649; Gill v. Middleton, 105 Mass. 477; Glickauf v. Maurer, 75 Ill. 289; Watkins v. Goodall, 138 Mass. 533.

The question still remains, does the complaint sufficiently charge negligence upon the defendant? I am of opinion this question must be answered in the negative, bearing in mind that the pleading is to be construed most strongly against the pleader, and that no intendments can be indulged in its aid. It may be summarized thus: On the 10th day of September, 1890, defendant agreed to repair, and on that day employed a carpenter to repair, and they examined the stairs, and performed work thereon, and repaired the same; that on the same day the wife of plaintiff, after she believed defendant and the carpenter had repaired the stairs, in accordance with the agreement, in the exercise of ordinary prudence attempted to use the stairs, and met with disaster because the step was placed on the stairs and not nailed. It will be observed that the plaintiff does not assert that the work was completed, but only that his wife believed they had ceased repairing it, etc. Plaintiff and his wife had notice that repairs were being made, and it is apparent from the complaint that, pending those repairs, the stairs were unsafe; that there was a stage in the progress of the work when, without any negligence on the part of defendant, just the conditions existed which met the wife of plaintiff when she attempted to descend the stairs. She believed the work was completed; but it is not averred that it was so in fact, or that defendant so represented or considered it. It was her duty while repairs were progressing, of which she had notice, to make sure that the repairs were either completed, or that the descent of the stairs was safe, or that the defendant, by some declaration or act, induced her to believe they were safe. Had the repairs been completed, we are authorized to believe it would have been averred in the complaint, and, not having been so averred, we must conclude the facts did not authorize the averment; and the failure to aver other facts showing negligence on the part of the defendant must be construed in the light of what are no doubt the very facts in the case, viz. that they did not exist, and therefore could not be averred in a complaint under oath. The demurrer was properly sustained, and the judgment appealed from should be affirmed.

We concur: BELCHER, C.; VANCLIEF, C.

McCABE v. CARPENTER, Tax Collector.
(No. 15,477.)

TAXATION—FOR HIGH-SCHOOL PURPOSES—DELEGATION OF POWER TO SUPERINTENDENT OF SCHOOLS.

Under Const. art. 11, § 12, providing that the legislature may not impose taxes on counties, cities, or other public or municipal corporations for county, city, or other municipal purposes, but may vest in the corporate authorities thereof power to assess taxes for such purposes, Act March 20, 1891, delegating to the county superintendent of schools power to levy such tax for high school purposes as he might deem desirable without control by the inhabitants or any local board, is illegal.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Contra Costa county; Joseph P. Jones, Judge.

Action by J. P. McCabe against D. S. Carpenter, tax collector of Contra Costa county. Judgment for defendant. Plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

T. C. Coogan and W. W. Foote, for appellant. Henley & Macsherry, A. C. Hartly, and Mr. Costello, for respondent.

TEMPLE, C. This action was brought to recover from the defendant, as tax collector, the amount of certain taxes paid under protest. Certain school districts in Contra Costa county combined to establish a high school under an act of the legislature entitled "An act to provide for the establishment of high schools in the state of California," approved March 20, 1891 (St. 1891, p. 182). The plaintiff questions the validity of a tax levied under this law. It is contended that the law is unconstitutional, in that it authorizes the county superintendent of schools to furnish to the board of supervisors an estimate for the tax, and makes it the duty of the board to proceed to fix a rate which will realize the amount; thus leaving the amount of the tax wholly to the discretion of an executive officer, and leaving no discretion in the board. The law provides: "An annual tax shall be levied by the authorities whose duty it is to levy taxes in counties, cities, incorporated towns, the amount of said tax being estimated by the county superintendent of schools * * * and by him certified to the proper authorities, on or before the second Monday of September of each year. And it shall be the duty of such authorities to levy such rate as will produce the amount estimated to be necessary for such purpose." This estimate is furnished after the assessments have been equalized. No opportunity to be heard is afforded the taxpayer, and the discretion of the officer is controlled only by the phrase, "amount estimated to be necessary for such purpose." Appellant contends that this provision violates section 1, art. 3, of the state constitution, which divides the powers of the government into three departments, and declares that "no person charged with the exercise of powers properly belonging to one of these departments shall exercise any functions pertaining to either of the others." It is not denied that the county superintendent of schools is an executive officer. It seems to me, however, that, if it be granted that the section quoted vests in the county superintendent of schools legislative power the act is void, without reference to the character of the person in whom the power is vested.

Preliminarily to this question another presents itself. Could the legislature have levied the tax in question, or must it vest in the local authorities that power, under section 12, art. 11, of the constitution? School districts have been called public corporations and quasi municipal corporations. Hughes v. Ewing, 93 Cal. 414, 28 Pac. 1067. Public and municipal corporations are both mentioned in the section quoted from the constitution. But I think school districts have generally been considered a part of the county organization, and so they are regarded in the statute under consideration. In Hughes v. Ewing, supra, it seems to have been held that a school district comes within the provision of section 12, art. 11, and that the legislature cannot impose a tax upon the property or the inhabitants, but must vest the power in the local authorities. Whether a school district is itself a public corporation, or, with reference to the section under consideration, is to be deemed a part of the county organization, is immaterial to this argument. In either view the constitutional provision limits the power of the legislature in the matter of imposing taxes upon the inhabitants or the property within it. If the legislature cannot impose a tax upon the property or inhabitants of a school district, it would seem to follow that it cannot prescribe a procedure through which such tax would inevitably be levied without leaving some discretion in regard to it to the local authorities. The legislature imposes the tax when it requires an officer to make certain computations, the result of which must fix the amount to be levied. Such a process enjoined upon local authorities does not vest in such authorities the power to tax as required by section 12, art. 11. Therefore the argument of the respondent's counsel that such is the effect of the act, if correct, will not help him. But, since the power to levy a tax is purely legislative, it would seem to follow that the power cannot be vested in any other authority of the local corporation than the body in which is vested the legislative power of such municipal corporation. At all events, it could not vest such power in an executive officer of such corporation. Section 1817, Pol. Code, has no application to proceedings under this law. No process or procedure is laid down, following which the county superintendent shall reach the amount of his estimate. The word itself implies the use of discretion by the person required to make it in regard to a future contingency which is not capable of exact computation. The act itself gives no rule or data; not even, except by inference, that the purpose of the tax is to meet the expenses of the high school. Looking to the provisions in the general school law in regard to the discretion of county superintendents and trustees of school districts, we find they have a wide range of discretion in regard to expenditures. The trustees have, however, no voice in making this estimate; are not even required to furnish any data for it. How many teachers may be required, or how many months the school shall be held, or what other expenses would be incurred, are all conjectural, and all left to the judgment and discretion of the county superintendent. And nothing except the use of the word "estimate" implies that he is controlled even by such conjecture; and when the estimate reaches the board of supervisors of the county, which the act in a way recognizes as the proper authority to levy the tax, it has nothing to do but make a mathematical calculation, which consists in dividing the amount of the estimate by the amount of the taxable property in the district, and to enter the order. This is not the exercise of power. It is obedience to a command. Where one is required to do a given act in a mode prescribed, without reference to his judgment or discretion, except as to the mode of complying, the act is purely ministerial. The province of the county superintendent and the function of the board are well illustrated by the memoranda furnished the president of the board in this case. It consisted of an unsigned writing on a strip of paper, showing the amount of property in the district, amount required, allowance for delinquency, and rate. Of course, the board had nothing to do but to enter the order indicated by it, and this they must do if the law is valid. Certainly no legislative power is vested in the board in reference to this tax.

It is admitted that the power to levy is purely legislative. What discretion does the legislature exercise when it levies a property tax? The constitution provides that all property shall be taxed in proportion to value. The revenue laws provide modes of assessment, of ascertaining the ratable share of each taxpayer; the constitution itself fixing the rule of apportionment. The province of the legislature, then, is simply and solely to determine the amount. This, under the law in question, was done by the county superintendent. The board had no part or share in this, the only legislative function connected with it. Of course, it is claimed that the act of the board alone gave the levy its vitality as the levy. But, as the board had no discretion in the matter, it must follow either that the legislative power is delegated to the county superintendent, or the tax is imposed by the legislature. The order entered was really made by the county superintendent. The function of the board was clerical. The question as to whether in a given case there has been a delegation of the legislative power is sometimes a very difficult question to determine. Executive officers are often required to exercise a large discretion in the performance of purely administrative acts. The legislature cannot always anticipate contingencies which may arise. So it has been sometimes said, as in People v. Reynolds, 5 Gilman, 12 (quoted with approval in Society v. Austin, 46 Cal. 415), that there was a restricted sense in which legislative discretion may be delegated. "We see, then, that while the legislature may not divest itself of its proper functions, or delegate its general legislative authority, it may still authorize others to do those things which it might do properly, yet cannot advantageously, do itself. * * * The object to be accomplished, or the thing permitted, may be specified, and the rest left to the agency of others with better opportunities of accomplishing the object or doing the thing understandingly." This difficulty in drawing a precise line between legislative and administrative functions is noticed by Judge Cooley in his work on Taxation (page 62). He says: "We conceive that the legislature must in every instance prescribe the rule under which taxation may be laid. It must originate the authority under which the tax gatherer demands the contribution, but it need not prescribe all the details of action, or even fix with precision the sum to be raised, or all the particulars of its expenditure. If the rule is prescribed which in its administration works out the result, that is sufficient, but to refer the rule to another would be in excess of legislative power." The author then gives some illustrations of the doctrine. One is where the judgments of a state board of claims are made final, and the legislature directs that the claims allowed shall be added to the general levy; another case is the awards of a commission to settle claims between counties which are to be added to the levy; another is power to add to the levy to create a contingent fund to be at the disposal of the executive, though not enumerated in detail by the legislature. The author, however, immediately adds that to leave to a court, board, or state officer the power to determinate the rate of a levy, is incompetent.

A similar question was considered by this court in two cases which were in all respects alike, and which were considered with very great care. Society v. Austin, 46 Cal. 415, and Houghton v. Austin, 47 Cal. 646. They involved the validity of a tax levy determined under an act of the legislature by a board composed of the governor and other executive officers. The legislature fixed the amount to be raised, and directed the board to transmit to county supervisors the rate of state tax, "which, after allowing for delinquency in the collection of taxes, must be sufficient to raise the specific amount of revenue directed to be raised by the legislature for state purposes." The only discretion given the board was to estimate the probable delinquency, and the board had considerable data upon which this could be done in past experience. Yet it was after an exhaustive discussion held, although the effect was temporarily to deprive the state of its revenues, that the act was void because of this attempt to delegate legislative discretion. Manifestly a much larger discretion is given by the act under consideration to the county superintendent than was given to the board created by that act. The case of Macklin v. Trustees, 88 Ky. 592, 11 S. W. 657, does not seem to me in point. The question there was whether, under the act of the legislature, the power to levy a tax could be delegated to the trustees of a school district, without referring the question to the inhabitants of the district. As a delegation of legislative power, it would, upon principle, have been just as objectionable when delegated to the inhabitants as to the trustees. The law was treated as conferring power upon a municipal government, and the discussion had reference to the extent to which such power could be delegated to such corporation. That this is an exceptional case is declared by Cooley in his work on Taxation (page 63). Here one objection is that the power was delegated, not to the local legislature, but to an executive officer; and the power vested in this officer, or attempted to be, was a perpetual power to levy any amount of tax that he might deem desirable, year after year, without control by the inhabitants or any local board, although he was not a district officer, and not necessarily an inhabitant of the district. If I am right in this position, it becomes unnecessary to determine the other points made. I recommend that the judgment and order be reversed, and the court directed to enter judgment for the plaintiff on the findings.

We concur: BELCHER, C.; HAYNES, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment and order appealed from are reversed, and the court below directed to enter judgment for the plaintiff on the findings.

AFFLERBACH v. McGOVERN. (No. 15,276.)

REPLEVIN—JUDGMENT—WHEN DISTURBED.

In an action to recover the possession or value of personal property, the finding of the trial court will be affirmed when there is evidence to support it, though the evidence is conflicting.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; William T. Wallace, Judge.

Action by C. H. Afflerbach against John McGovern to recover the possession or value of certain personal property. From a judgment for defendant, and from an order denying a motion for a new trial, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

J. C. Bates, for appellant. J. W. Harding, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. This is an action to recover the possession or value of certain personal property. The court below gave judgment for the defendant, from which, and from an order denying his motion for a new trial, the plaintiff appeals.

This is a second appeal. In the opinion rendered on the former appeal (79 Cal. 268, 21 Pac. 837), the principal facts of the case are stated, and they need not therefore be repeated here. The court found that "the plaintiff was not, on August 12, 1880, nor at the time of the commencement of this action, nor at any other time, the owner, nor in the possession, nor entitled to the possession, of the goods and chattels in the complaint mentioned, nor of either or any of them;" and the only contention on the part of the appellant is that this finding was not justified by the evidence. This contention cannot be sustained. It is true that there was some conflict in the evidence; but, when looked at as a whole, it appears to be clearly sufficient to justify and sustain the decision. The judgment and order appealed from must be affirmed, and it is so ordered.

McLAUGHLIN v. PERKINS et al. (No. 15,206.)

MECHANIC'S LIEN—NOTICE OF CLAIM.

The fact that a building contract provides for the issuance of a certificate by the architect before the installment due upon the completion of the building shall be paid does not postpone the commencement of the 30 days allowed subcontractors, within which to file their claims, to the time of the issuance of the certificate.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; E. R. Garber, Judge.

Action by R. A. McLaughlin against William Perkins and others. There was a judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Smith & O'Keeffe, for appellant. Boyd, Fifield & Hoburg, for respondents.

BELCHER, C. This is an action to foreclose a lien for materials used and work done by subcontractors in the construction of a building for the defendant Perkins. The court below gave judgment for the defendants, upon the ground that the claim of lien was not filed in time, and the plaintiff appeals from the judgment on the judgment roll. The only question in the case is, was the claim of lien filed within the time required by statute? The court found the facts to be, in substance, as follows: On August 13, 1889, one E. W. Hyde entered into a written contract with defendant Perkins, to erect for him a certain building according to plans and specifications prepared by R. H. White, architect, and to finish the same within 90 days from said date, for the sum of $4,900, payable in installments; the fifth installment, of $687.50, to be paid when the building should be completed and accepted, and the sixth installment, of $1,250, to be paid 35 days after its completion. This contract was duly recorded, and, under it, Hyde proceeded to erect the building. On September 16th he contracted with the assignors of the plaintiff to do the tinning and plumbing of the building, which they did, for the agreed price of $720, of which $475 was paid, leaving still due and owing therefor the sum of $245, for which, on March 1, 1890, they duly filed, and caused to be recorded, their claim of lien. The building "was completed and finished according to the plans and specifications on the 27th day of January, 1890, but it was accepted by the defendant William Perkins, on the 18th day of January, 1890, and was actually occupied and used by the tenants of defendant William Perkins on the 25th day of January, 1890, which tenants rented it on the 21st and 22d days of January, 1890. But plaintiff had no notice of the acceptance of said building by said defendant Perkins, or of its occupation by said defendant's tenants, until the 31st day of January, 1890, on which day the architect, R. H. White, issued a certificate in the following words and figures, to wit: 'San Francisco, January 31, 1890. To William Perkins: This is to certify that the sum of six hundred and eighty-seven and 50-100 dollars, amount of fifth payment on building located, etc., is due and payable to E. W. Hyde. [Signed] R. H. White, Architect.'" The contract between Hyde and Perkins contained the following provisions: "When each payment or installment shall become due, and at the final completion of the work, certificates in writing shall be obtained from the said architect, stating that the payment or installment is due or work completed, as the case may be, and the amount then due; and the said architect shall at said times deliver said certificates, under his hand, to the contractor, or, in lieu of such certificates, shall deliver to the contractor, in writing, under his hand, a just and true reason for not issuing the certificates, including a statement of the defects, if any, to be remedied, to entitle the contractor to the certificate or certificates. And in the event of the failure of the architect to furnish and deliver said certificates, or any of them, or, in lieu thereof, the writing aforesaid, within three days after the times aforesaid, and after demand therefor, made in writing by the contractor, the amount which may be claimed to be due by the contractor, and stated in the said demand made by him for the certificate shall, at the expiration of said three days, become due and payable, and the owner shall be liable and bound to pay the same on demand. In case the architect delivers the writing aforesaid in lieu of the certificate, then a compliance by the contractor with the requirements of said writing shall entitle the contractor to the certificates." Appellant contends that these provisions of the contract made the certificate of the architect a prerequisite to the payment of any money to the contractor, and that until such certificate was issued the building could not be considered completed, nor accepted as completed, and hence, as the lien was filed within 30 days after the certificate above mentioned was issued, it must be held to have been filed in time. The provisions of the contract were not, in our opinion, as far reaching as claimed, but were intended simply for the protection of the owner, by making the approval of the architect a condition precedent to the contractor's right to demand payment of the money. This condition, however, the owner was at liberty to waive, if he chose to do so; and he might, without any certificate from the architect, have accepted the building and paid for it as he had agreed to do. The statute provides that every person, save the original contractor, who claims the benefit of the law in regard to liens, "must within thirty days after the completion of any building, improvement or structure" file for record with the county recorder his claim of lien, and that "the occupation or use of the building, improvement or structure by the owner or his representative, or the acceptance by said owner or his agent of said building, improvement or structure, shall be deemed conclusive evidence of completion. This language is clear and positive, and, as the right to a lien is purely statutory, is decisive of appellant's rights here. It follows that the judgment should be affirmed.

We concur: VANCLIEF, C.; TEMPLE, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment appealed from is affirmed.

102 Cal. 534

In re MITCHELL. (No. 15,351.)

EXEMPTIONS—IMPLEMENTS OF MECHANIC.

Under section 690, subd. 4, Code Civ. Proc., a person engaged in printing cannot claim as exempt any number of presses and amount of type he may have, but only such as are "necessary to carry on his trade."

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; John Hunt, Judge.

Petition by creditors of W. L. Mitchell to have him declared an insolvent debtor. Judgment for petitioners, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

John Flournoy, for appellant. Geo. A. Rankin, for respondents.

BELCHER, C. This is a proceeding in involuntary insolvency. The petition of the creditors alleged that on the 18th day of June, 1892, W. L. Mitchell made a transfer to certain persons of his property, consisting of a printing plant, type, printing materials, etc., with intent to delay, defraud, and hinder his creditors, and that he was about to depart from this state with intent to defraud his creditors. The answer of Mitchell admitted that he sold the property to the persons named, but denied that he sold the same with intent to delay, defraud, or hinder his creditors, denied that he was about to depart from the state with intent to defraud his creditors, and alleged that the property sold was exempt from execution. The case was tried before a jury, and, in accordance with the issues raised by the pleadings, three special issues were submitted for decision. The jury found that Mitchell did make the transfer of his property with intent to delay, defraud, and hinder his creditors, that the property transferred was not exempt from execution, and that, at the time the petition was filed, he was not about to leave the state with intent to defraud his creditors. A decree was accordingly entered, adjudging Mitchell to be an insolvent debtor, and ordering him to file in court the schedule and inventory provided for in the insolvent act. He thereupon moved for a new trial, which was denied, and now prosecutes this appeal from the order denying his motion.

The only specifications found in the statement are to the effect that the verdict was not justified by the evidence, because it appeared therefrom that the property transferred was exempt from execution. Under these specifications, the questions as to whether the property was owned by Mitchell, and was transferred with intent to hinder and delay his creditors, cannot be considered, as all objections other than those specified are deemed to be waived. The sole question, then, is, was the property exempt from execution? The property consisted of four printing presses, a miscellaneous assortment of type, a paper-cutting machine, chases, rules, leads, and the general paraphernalia of a printing office. Three of the presses were operated by steam, and the machinery was run by shafts, belts, and pulleys. There was also an iron safe, which cost $100, and the total cost of the plant was $3,500. Mitchell was not himself a practical printer, typesetter, pressman, or machinist, but he was the manager of the printing establishment, and employed a foreman, and some times a dozen typesetters and machinists, the number depending upon the amount of work on hand. He testified that "every bit of the material, machinery, type, etc., which I sold * * * was absolutely necessary to the business which I was carrying on." On the other hand, N. C. Hawks testified that he had been a practical printer for 18 years, and that a printer could get along and make a living with one press and $500 or $600 worth of type. The statute declares that "the tools or implements of a mechanic or artisan necessary to carry on his trade" are exempt from execution. Code Civ. Proc. § 690, subd. 4. Conceding that Mitchell was a mechanic or artisan, within the meaning of this section, and that the printing presses operated by steam, paper-cutting machine, etc., may be regarded as the tools or implements of a printer, still the statute exempted only such tools or implements as were necessary to carry on his trade, and not all that he may have acquired and used in his business. Whether, therefore, the whole plant was exempt or not was a question of fact, which was by the court very properly submitted to the jury under instructions that stated the law bearing on the subject very clearly and fully. The jury found against the contention of appellant, and, in our opinion, the verdict cannot be disturbed for want of evidence to support it. The order appealed from should be affirmed.

We concur: SEARLS, C.; TEMPLE, C.

CITY CARPET-BEATING, ETC., WORKS v. JONES. (No. 15,300.)

DEMURRER—SEPARATING CAUSES OF ACTION—CONTRACTS IN RESTRAINT OF TRADE.

1. Under Code Civ. Proc. § 430, subd. 5, a pleading is not demurrable because two causes of action are not separately stated.

2. Under section 1674, Civ. Code, a contract for the sale of the good will of a business, and agreeing not to do a similar business in several counties, is void as to all but the county in which the business is carried on.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; J. C. B. Hebbard, Judge.

Action by City Carpet-Beating, etc., Works against H. L. Jones to enjoin a breach of contract. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Modified.

S. R. O'Keeffe and J. C. Campbell, for appellant. Daniel Titus, for respondent.

HAYNES, C. On June 6, 1887, appellant was engaged in the business of cleaning and renovating carpets at a designated place on Eighth street, in the city of San Francisco, and on that day sold his buildings, machinery, and all appliances, and the good will of said business, to one Reamer. In the contract of sale the following covenant was inserted: "And in order to secure and protect said party of the second part in the full, free, and undisturbed use and enjoyment of the said good will, the party of the first part hereby promises and agrees that he will not, for and during the period of ten years from the date of this instrument, enter into, or be engaged or interested in, directly or indirectly, the business of taking up, removing, cleaning, renovating, laying, or relaying carpets, and of cleaning and renovating any other fabrics, in the said city and county of San Francisco, in the county of Alameda, or in the county of San Mateo." The property and good will so purchased was afterwards sold by Reamer to the plaintiff,—a corporation. The breach of this contract, complained of, is that appellant afterwards engaged in carrying on said business in said city of San Francisco, on the same street, opposite plaintiff's said place of business. Plaintiff, on the trial, waived damages, on account of the insolvency of the defendant, and obtained a decree enjoining the defendant from prosecuting or carrying on said business until the expiration of the time limited in the contract.

The demurrer to the complaint was properly overruled. The ground of demurrer was that two causes of action were united, and were not separately stated; one for breach of warranty that defendant would not injure plaintiff's business, and one for a breach of his contract not to carry on the business. I do not think that two causes of action are stated, or were intended to be stated; but, if it were otherwise, it is not ground of demurrer. The Code of Civil Procedure (section 430) specifies all the grounds of demurrer. The fifth is "that several causes of action are improperly united." This provision applies to causes of action which cannot be embraced in the same action, though separately stated, and not to causes of action which may properly be joined in the same action under section 427, but which are not "separately stated," as required by the last-named section. "The remedy is therefore not by a demurrer, but by a motion to make the pleading more definite and certain, by separating and distinctly stating the different causes of action." Pom. Code Rem. § 447. See, also, Id. § 446; Bernero v. Insurance Co., 65 Cal. 387, 4 Pac. 382; and Fraser v. Water Co., 73 Cal. 190, 14 Pac. 829.

Appellant's principal contention is that that portion of the contract between defendant and Reamer, hereinbefore quoted, is void because it includes, not only the city and county of San Francisco, but the counties of Alameda and San Mateo. The Civil Code contains the following provisions: "Sec. 1673. Every contract by which any one is restrained from exercising a lawful profession, trade or business of any kind, otherwise than is provided in the next two sections, is to that extent void. Sec. 1674. One who sells the good will of a business may agree with the buyer to refrain from carrying on a similar business within a specified county, city or part thereof, so long as the buyer, or any one deriving title to the good will from him, carries on a like business therein." Section 1675 relates to partners. The property and business purchased from appellant were conducted in the city and county of San Francisco, and the good will was of the business there conducted. It is conceded that the contract is void so far as it purports to restrict appellant from engaging in said business in the counties of Alameda and San Mateo, and that, if the city and county of San Francisco had been the only locality specified in the contract, it would have been valid; so that the precise question at issue is whether the specification of these additional counties makes the restriction void as to the city and county of San Francisco, to which the judgment limits the injunction. At common law the territorial restriction imposed by this contract would doubtless have been considered valid, inasmuch as a portion of the value of the good will may have accrued from customers residing in these contiguous counties, though the business was conducted in one alone; and the purchaser, unless restricted by statute or by a controlling public policy, was entitled to the whole of the good will which he purchased and paid for. It was not, therefore, at common law, an illegal contract, nor are such contracts declared by the statute to be illegal. They are simply void so far or to the extent that they exceed the restrictions imposed by the statute. The Code introduces no new principle. It simply eliminates from the controversy arising upon such restriction the question as to what is a reasonable territorial limit, by specifically defining it, and thus preventing litigation; and in this the statute is wise and salutary, even though, in certain cases,—possibly in this one,—it gives the purchaser less than he bought, and less than he might enjoy without violating the interests of the public. The statute imposes no penalty upon the purchaser under such contract, nor could it require the seller to resume business. As was said by this court in Brown v. Kling, 35 Pac. 995: "A contract restraining one from following a lawful trade or calling at all is invalid, because it discourages trade and commerce, and prevents the party from earning a living; but the right to agree to refrain from his calling, within reasonable limits as to space, may have the contrary effect. It encourages trade, for it gives value to a custom or business built up, by making it vendible." In Wright v. Ryder, 36 Cal. 358, the court, quoting from Story on Contracts (section 551), speaking of partial or limited restraints, said: "Such an agreement not only does not obstruct trade, but is oftentimes requisite and necessary, as well for the advantage of the public as of the individual." We see, then, that, when confined within reasonable limits (and as to what is reasonable the statute is conclusive), the public, as well as the parties, are benefited, and are therefore interested in sustaining such contracts as are or may be brought within the statutory restrictions, where the contract admits of division. In this case three counties are named in the contract, and I see no difficulty in upholding it as to the county in which the business was conducted, and declaring it void as to the other two counties. The boundaries of each are definite, and fixed by law. Neither includes any part of the others. If the city and county of San Francisco had alone been named, the contract would have been good. How the naming of the counties of Alameda and San Mateo in addition, such addition being void, could affect that which otherwise is valid, the void part being capable of exact ascertainment and separation, I do not comprehend, and especially when such separation not only does no violence to the language of the statute, but does justice between the parties, and promotes the public interests, and conforms to the obvious intention of the statute. It is only to the "extent" that the contract departs from the provisions of the Code that it is declared void. The case of Brown v. Kling, supra, was a case where the contract was that the seller should not engage in the butcher business for three years, the contract omitting the qualification contained in the statute, viz.: "So long as the buyer or any person deriving title to the good will from him carries on the business;" a qualification also omitted here, but as to which no question is made. In that case, however, the question of restriction, or division of such contracts, as to space or territorial limits, was incidentally discussed; and the case of Baines v. Geary, 35 Ch. Div. 154, was quoted from, in part, as follows: "It is quite clear that a covenant in restraint of trade is good, if it does not go further than is necessary to give reasonable protection to the person who imposes it. There is nothing illegal in such a covenant, but it is considered unreasonable if it imposes a larger restraint than is necessary for the protection of the covenantee. The courts have, however, seen their way to treat such a covenant, as divisible, and to enforce it to the extent to which it is reasonable, while declining to enforce such part of it as is unreasonable. There are many reported cases in which covenants in restraint of trade have been held to be divisible as regards space."

Appellant cites several cases which require to be briefly noticed. The one most nearly in point is More v. Bonnet, 40 Cal. 251. There the covenant was not to engage in the business sold "in the city and county of San Francisco, or state of California." The court said: "No precise rule can be laid down for the solution of the question whether a contract is entire or separable, but it must be solved by considering both the language and the subject-matter of the contract. There were not two distinct areas, for the one included the other. The defendant's business was not carried on in the two distinct areas, as two separate occupations; but the complaint avers that the defendant was carrying on business in the state, and that he sold such business to the plaintiff." In that decision (an injunction was denied), it is clear that it was not decided that in no case could the covenant be held valid if it embraced unreasonable limits as to space, but left the question as to whether the territory was divisible to be determined upon the facts of each case, and strongly intimated that the decision was placed upon the ground that in that case "there were not two distinct areas, for the one included the other," and that the complaint alleged that the defendant was carrying on said business "in the state." It may be also remarked that that case was decided before the adoption of the Civil Code, and is therefore not to be taken as a construction of the Code provision on that subject. The case of Lumber Co. v. Hayes, 76 Cal. 387, 18 Pac. 391, is not in point. There the agreement was to form a combination, the sole object of which was to increase the price of lumber, by limiting the supply, and giving it the control of the lumber market within the territory specified. It was held that the contract was illegal in its very essence; that "the bad enters into and permeates the whole contract, so that none of it can be said to be good," and that it was therefore incapable of division. In the case of Wright v. Ryder, 36 Cal. 342, the covenant was not to run a steamboat upon any of the routes of travel upon the waters of the state. The covenant was held void. In Callahan v. Donnolly, 45 Cal. 152, the covenant was that defendant should not engage in "any branch of the yeast-powder business." There was no restriction as to space. It included the world. The case of Vulcan Powder Co. v. Hercules Powder Co., 96 Cal. 510, 31 Pac. 581, was much like Lumber Co. v. Hayes, supra. The contract was declared to be illegal, and an accounting between the parties was refused upon that ground.

It is also contended that the covenant in this case includes the business of "cleaning and renovating any other fabrics" which is not included in the business, the good will of which was sold. In the absence of evidence that appellant was not engaged in renovating and cleaning other fabrics besides carpets, or that, if he was, that the good will thereof was not sold, it would be giving to the contract a very narrow construction to hold that the good will sold did not include such other fabrics. The contract cannot be held to be void on that ground.

The fifth finding, it is contended, is not supported by the evidence. It is not necessary to rehearse the evidence on this point. The only witness examined was the manager of the plaintiff corporation, who testified to the acts of the defendant, as well as to conversations with him, which, if true, were quite sufficient to sustain the finding in question, and this testimony was wholly uncontradicted by the defendant. That some portions of the testimony of the witness tended to show that defendant was simply an employe, may be admitted, if that were material, but we cannot disturb the finding for that reason.

The judgment should be modified to conform to the statute as to time, viz. that it should continue so long as the plaintiff or any one deriving title to the good will from it, carries on said business in said city and county, not exceeding 10 years from June 6, 1887, and, as modified, the judgment and also the order appealed from should be affirmed.

We concur: VANCLIEF, C.; SEARLS, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reason given in the foregoing opinion, it is ordered that the judgment appealed from be modified so as to limit the continuance of the injunction for such time as the plaintiff, or any one deriving title to the good will of said business from or through the plaintiff, shall carry on said business in the city and county of San Francisco, not exceeding 10 years from the date of said contract, and, as modified, the said judgment, and also the order appealed from, be affirmed.

BLYTHE v. SAVAGE et al. (No. 15,611.)

(Supreme Court of California. May 24, 1894.)

On rehearing. Petition denied.

For prior reports, see 36 Pac. 522, 588.

PER CURIAM. The petition for rehearing is denied. Petitioners say that with respect to certain asserted "errors of law," and to what is called by them a "federal question" claimed to be "involved with Pina v. Peck," this court "has not said in its opinion that any of these points are not well founded." All the appeals in the Blythe Estate were considered in one opinion, in the concluding part of which we said: "There are no other points presented in the briefs and arguments which call for special attention." The transcripts presented a great multitude of asserted "errors of law," which, however, were little pressed in the arguments. We considered none of them tenable, and it would have been an endless task to notice them in detail. As to the "federal question," we cannot now see any. None of the points alluded to in the petition for rehearing were well founded.

MURPHY v. MULGREW. (No. 15,214.)

FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCES — CHANGE OF POSSESSION—EVIDENCE—DAMAGES.

1. A sale of horses by a man to his wife is void as to his creditors, under Civ. Code, § 3440, providing that a transfer not followed by an actual change of possession is void, where he managed them after the sale just the same as before, though he did so as the purchaser's agent.

2. The fact that a married woman included horses purchased from the husband in an inventory of her separate property, filed under Civ. Code, § 165, does not render the sale of them to her by her husband valid as to one of his creditors at the time the inventory was made, where there was no change of possession, as required by Civ. Code, § 3440.

3. In an action where the validity of a conveyance of personal property, as to creditors, is in issue, declarations of the vendor as to the character of his possession, while in actual possession of the property, after the sale, are competent.

4. In an action against an officer for the wrongful taking of property, the simple fact that the person from whom it was taken gave her attorneys her note for $200 for their services in the action does not support a finding that $200 was a fair compensation for the time and money expended by her in the pursuit of the property.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Sonoma county; R. F. Crawford, Judge.

Action by Ella A. Murphy against J. F. Mulgrew. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed.

Barham & Bolton, for appellant. J. T. Campbell and A. B. Ware, for respondent.

GAROUTTE, J. Plaintiff claims to have purchased two certain race horses from her husband, Wyman Murphy, on January 11, 1890. On November 16, 1891, the defendant, as sheriff of the county of Sonoma, took possession of the horses under a writ of attachment in favor of the Santa Rosa Bank, and against the husband, Wyman Murphy. The sheriff refusing to return the possession to plaintiff upon demand, she brought this action to recover the property. The appeal is from the judgment, and order denying a motion for a new trial.

1. The main question here presented is, do the facts disclosed by the record support the transfer by the husband to the wife, in view of the provisions of section 3440 of the Civil Code? In other words, was there such an immediate delivery, and actual and continued change of possession, of the property, as is contemplated by that statute? There is no substantial conflict in the evidence upon this point, and plaintiff herself testified, in effect, as follows, regarding the transfer: "I resided with my husband upon the homestead at the time I purchased these horses from him. He gave me a bill of sale of them at that time, and they were in the barn, a short distance from the house. Upon receiving the bill of sale, I put it away, and said, in substance, to him: 'You take charge of this property for me, and manage it for me.' The horses remained at the homestead after the bill of sale, the same as before; and, when we moved away, we took them with us. My husband drove them all this time, and managed them, just the same as before the bill of sale was made." From the evidence of the plaintiff, it will be perceived that no actual change of possession of this property took place at the time of the delivery of the bill of sale; but, on the contrary, in all its surroundings, it remained entirely in statu quo. Mrs. Murphy attempts to escape the legal effect of the foregoing evidence by the claim that she had appointed her husband her agent to take the possession and control of the horses for her, and, as such agent, his possession was her possession; but there is nothing to be urged in favor of such a contention. Both the letter and the spirit of the law contained in section 3440 would be defeated by the recognition of such a principle. The object of the statute is to require notice to the world of the transfer of personal property, in order that men may be able to deal with each other upon equal terms, and from a common level. The efficacy of the statute would be entirely destroyed if the vendor were allowed to remain in possession of the property as the agent of the vendee, in the absence of any notice to the world of such a change of conditions. Such a practice would be in direct conflict with the terms of the statute itself. We do not find a syllable of evidence in the record that would indicate to the outside world that a change of ownership had taken place as to these horses, and we can hardly imagine a case where the provisions of the statute could have been more entirely disregarded. Morgan v. Ball, 81 Cal. 93, 22 Pac. 331, is much stronger for the vendee, in its facts; and the language relied upon by respondent, taken from the case of Williams v. Lerch, 56 Cal. 334, has been well and justly criticised in the case of Etchepare v. Aguirre, 91 Cal. 293, 27 Pac. 668. The fact that a vendor and vendee are husband and wife, or parent and child, is no reason why the provisions of the statute should receive a different or more liberal construction. Those conditions give the statute no additional elasticity. The rule of construction is the same in all cases, and the relationship existing between the parties is a matter wholly immaterial. McKee v. Gracelon, 60 Me. 165; Hoffner v. Clark, 5 Whart. 546.

2. The transfer of the property in litigation by bill of sale was made January 11, 1890; and upon December 30th, following, plaintiff filed an inventory of her separate property in the recorder's office, in accordance with the provisions of section 165 of the Civil Code. The Santa Rosa Bank became a creditor prior to the recording of the inventory, and the attachment proceedings upon the husband's indebtedness were begun November 16, 1891. It is now insisted by respondent that, conceding no immediate delivery and actual and continued change of possession took place at the date of the bill of sale, still the subsequent recording of the inventory in the recorder's office, of her separate property, including these horses, cured any defective compliance with the provisions of section 3440, and gave her good title against the world from that day. It is unnecessary to pass upon the scope and purpose of section 165 of the Code. Whatever may be its scope and purpose, we are well satisfied it is not entitled to a construction that would nullify the provisions of section 3440 as to fraudulent transfers of personal property.

3. The court committed error in not allowing declarations of the vendor, Murphy, as to the character of his possession after the sale, and while he was in the actual possession of the property. Bump, Fraud. Conv. (3d Ed.) p. 588; Waite, Fraud. Conv. § 279; Cahoon v. Marshall, 25 Cal. 197; Blake v. Graves, 18 Iowa, 312.

4. The evidence is insufficient to justify the finding of the court that $200 is a fair compensation for the time and money expended by the plaintiff in the pursuit of the property. All the evidence bearing upon this question is the fact that plaintiff gave her note for $200 to her attorneys as a fee for their services in the case. This fact is wholly insufficient to support the judgment in that regard.

For the foregoing reasons it is ordered that the judgment and order be reversed, and the cause remanded.

We concur: HARRISON, J.; VAN FLEET, J.

CASTLE v. SMITH. (No. 18,156.)

NUISANCE—LIABILITY OF GRANTEE—NOTICE—PRESUMPTIONS—TRIAL—FINDINGS—APPEAL.

1. In an action against the grantee of land for the continuance of a nuisance erected by his grantor, notice to defendant that the erection was a nuisance is essential to plaintiff's cause of action, and it is not for defendant to show want of such notice.

2. Such notice is not dispensed with by Civ. Code, § 3483, making a grantee liable "in the same manner as the one who first created the nuisance," as the liability of the creator is based on the presumption that he has notice that it is a nuisance, which presumption does not arise against the grantee.

3. There is no presumption that a grantee knows that a dam erected by his grantor on the land was erected without the consent of others affected thereby.

4. In an action for damages caused by the erection of a nuisance, and to compel defendant to abate the same, plaintiff may waive the equitable relief, and thereby render a finding of facts by the court unnecessary.

5. Where the complaint contains two counts, one of which does not constitute a cause of action, and the error in rendering a judgment thereon can be cured by a modification of the judgment, the verdicts on each count having been returned separately, a new trial will not be ordered.

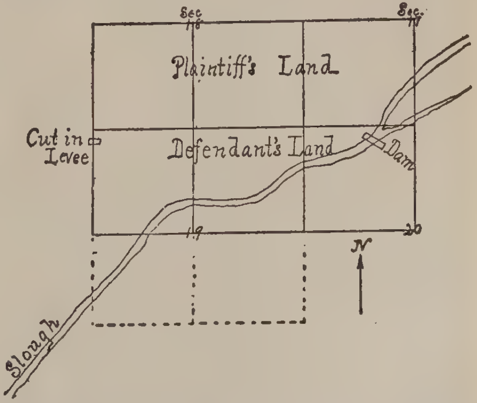
In bank. Appeal from superior court, San Joaquin county; Ansel Smith, Judge.

Action by C. C. Castle against Jennie Smith. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Judgment modified.

W. L. Dudley, James H. and John E. Budd, and J. C. Campbell, for appellant. Swinnerton & Rutherford, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. Action to recover damages for diverting water from defendant's land, and causing it to overflow paintiff's land, by reason of maintaining a dam on defendant's land across a slough, and also for opening a levee on defendant's land, and thereby causing an overflow of plaintiff's land. In addition to damages, plaintiff prays for a decree that defendant abate the alleged causes of the overflow, as nuisances, by removing her dam, and closing in her levee. Richard Smith, son of defendant, was made a defendant, but, as to him, a nonsuit was ordered at the close of plaintiff's evidence in chief. The case was tried by a jury, and the jury returned a general verdict for the plaintiff on each of the two counts of the complaint; assessing the damages on the first count (for maintaining the dam) at $4,500, and on the second count (for opening the levee) at $3,500. After the verdict, and before the judgment, the plaintiff withdrew his prayer for the abatement of the alleged nuisances, and waived all equitable relief; and thereupon judgment was rendered on the verdict for $8,000 and costs, taxed at $482.80. The defendant appeals from the judgment, and from the order denying her motion for a new trial.

It is admitted that since 1880 the plaintiff has owned the S. ½ of section 18, and S. W. ¼ of section 17, township 2 N., range 6 E., and that from 1880 until August 3, 1889, George F. Smith (defendant's husband and grantor) owned the N. ½ of section 19, and N. W. ¼ of section 20, of the same township, and adjoining plaintiff's land on the south side thereto, all situate in the county of San Joaquin. It appears that all the lands above described are swamp and overflowed lands, not generally susceptible of cultivation without reclamation; that they are, to some extent, overflowed by the tides, and are also subject to periodical overflows, to the depth of three to five feet, from the San Joaquin river and other sources, by extraordinary floods. It does not appear, however, that any part of these lands have been purchased from this state. A slough called "Twelve-Mile Slough," crosses the lands of plaintiff and defendant, diagonally, from northeast to southwest, as shown on the following diagram:



Twelve-Mile slough has no natural source of water supply, except surface drainage, during the rainy season, and has in it no water, except standing pools, during the dry season. That part of it which crosses the corner of plaintiff's land and the northwest quarter of section 20 has well-defined banks, which, at the dam, are 10 to 11 feet high; but below the middle of the northeast quarter of section 19 the slough is a mere swale, having no well-defined banks, and being only about a foot to a foot and a half lower than the general level of the land bordering upon it. The east line of plaintiff's and defendant's lands is marked "Line of Segregation" upon an unofficial map used on the trial, and is understood to be the line of segregation between the swamp lands and high lands. In 1882 the plaintiff and the defendant's grantor, George F. Smith, verbally agreed to reclaim their lands in the manner following: Each, at his own expense, was to build a levee from a point at the extreme western junction of their lands around his land to the segregation line; that is, the plaintiff was to build on the north and west of his land, and Smith on the south and west of his, and join their levees at said point on the west, where they were, jointly, to build a floodgate. This agreement was executed by the completion and junction of their levees in the fall of 1883. During 1884 they discovered that their levees, alone, were insufficient to protect their lands. Having been constructed mostly of peat turf, they were porous, so that large quantities of water seeped through and under them, which, together with the water from the slough and surface drainage, overflowed their lands. Thereupon, each erected pumping works,—the plaintiff on his north line, and Smith on his west line. By means of these pumps they were generally able to keep the water down; but, in consequence of a disagreement as to the proportion of pumping each should do, plaintiff, in 1886, built a levee about three feet in height on or near his southern line, for the purpose of preventing the water from passing from the land of one to that of the other, thus relieving himself from pumping any part of the water coming in through the slough. Thereupon, Smith proposed to plaintiff that they jointly excavate a canal on the line dividing their lands, and build a levee on each side thereof, and, by means of a dam across the slough, turn the water of the slough through such canal. To this proposal, plaintiff declined to assent. Smith then said he would excavate the canal on his own land, and construct a dam across the slough, turning the water of the slough into the canal, and build a levee on his side of the canal. Plaintiff objected to this, unless Smith would also build a sufficient levee on plaintiff's side of the canal. Smith declined this condition, and, against the protest of plaintiff, proceeded to excavate the canal, and to build the dam and levee on his own land, and completed them on the 25th day of December, 1886. The levee thus constructed by Smith on the south side of the canal was of equal height with his outside levees, and about 2½ feet higher than plaintiff's levee on the north side of the canal. During the next three years—that is, until December 25, 1889—the canal carried off the water from the slough without any overflow of, or injury to, plaintiff's land; and the evidence does not tend to show that plaintiff made any objection or complaint to Smith, or any other person, on account of the dam or canal, during that period of three years. On August 3, 1889, Smith executed a deed to his wife,—the defendant, Jennie Smith,—conveying to her all his land above described, and thereafter, on January 9, 1890, died.

1. The appellant contends that the judgment on the first count of the complaint is erroneous, for the reason that there was neither averment nor evidence that the defendant had any notice before the commencement of the action that the dam across the slough was a nuisance, nor that it ever had any injurious effect upon the plaintiff or his property, nor that she was requested to remove it. We think this point must be sustained. It is only alleged in the first count that defendant "kept and maintained the dam across the slough since August 3, 1889, and thereby turned the water of the slough on plaintiff's land, to his damage," etc. Neither the canal nor levee is complained of. It is not averred that defendant ever had notice that the dam was a nuisance, or had any injurious effect upon plaintiff or his property, nor that she was ever requested to remove it; and while the evidence on the part of the plaintiff clearly showed that the dam was erected in 1886 by George F. Smith, as above stated, it had no tendency to prove notice to defendant of the alleged nuisance, nor a demand upon her to abate it. And the defendant testified positively that she had no such notice, and that no such demand was made upon her, before the commencement of this action. In answer to this point, counsel for respondent claim that such notice and demand were not essential to plaintiff's cause of action, and that the want of them is mere matter of defense, which should have been pleaded as such by the defendant; but we think this position cannot be maintained. In Grigsby v. Water Co., 40 Cal. 407, it was said: "The rule seems to be well established that a party who is not the original creator of a nuisance is entitled to notice that it is a nuisance, and a request must be made that it may be abated, before an action will lie for that purpose, unless it appear that he had knowledge of the hurtful character of the erection." In Plumer v. Harper, 3 N. H. 88, it was said: "It is agreed in all the books that the grantee is not liable, until, upon request, he refused to remove the nuisance." This case is reported in 14 Am. Dec. 333, with notes by Mr. Freeman, in which he says: "The overwhelming weight of authority, therefore, is in favor of the position that no action will lie against him [the grantee] for merely continuing the erection which constitutes the nuisance in its original state, unless he has notice to abate it, and such notice is alleged. And this is so, notwithstanding the fact that he may have made repairs upon the erection constituting the nuisance, so long as such repairs do not render it more noxious than it was when it came to his possession." See the numerous cases cited to these points. Also, Conhocton Stone Road v. Buffalo, etc., R. Co., 51 N. Y. 573, and Dodge v. Stacy, 39 Vt. 560. The case of Pierce v. Society, 72 Cal. 180, 13 Pac. 478, is not in point for respondent, since, in that case, it appears that the defendant had "full notice" of the nuisance which was caused by the manner in which a steam-bathing establishment, out of repair, was used. Section 3483 of the Civil Code provides: "Every successive owner of property who neglects to abate a continuing nuisance upon or in the use of such property created by a former owner, is liable therefor in the same manner as the one who first created it." It is claimed that this section dispenses wih notice of the nuisance to the successive owner. But it is to be observed that the owner who creates the nuisance is presumed to have notice that it is a nuisance; therefore, is held liable without notice; whereas, no such presumption is indulged against his successor. Consequently, notice to the successor must be proved, else he would be held liable in a different manner from the owner who created the nuisance, as well as for a different cause. It is further claimed that the character of the dam was such that knowledge of its existence, which it is admitted defendant had, was notice to her that it injuriously affected plaintiff's land. Yet it clearly appears from the testimony of the plaintiff, as well as the testimony of other witnesses, that his land was not injured by the dam or canal until December 25, 1889, three years after their construction. And as to the injuries to plaintiff's land and crops alleged to have been suffered between December 25, 1889, and April, 1890, it is clear from the evidence that they were proximately caused by the extraordinary floods during that period, and would have been just as great if the dam and levee had not existed. All the lands similar to plaintiff's land in that vicinity, including defendant's land, were overflowed by the same floods. If there had been no dam, and no cross levee, all the water from the slough would have flowed upon the lands inclosed by the outside levees, and would have spread all over them, as it did in 1884, before they were built (the land of plaintiff being as low as that of defendant), and could not have escaped through the floodgates, for the reason that the water outside the levees was nearly up to the top of those levees. The outside pressure on those turf levees caused a great amount of seepage, which, together with the accumulation of surface drainage, would have overflowed all the land inclosed by the outside levees, without any contribution from the slough, and actually did overflow defendant's land, notwithstanding its protection from the slough. In regard to this the plaintiff testified as follows: "I first saw the waters of Twelve-Mile slough running in this canal, and over onto my land, in December (about Christmas), 1889. It did not come in the 1st of December, 1889. There was a great fall of snow and rain in the fall and winter of 1889 and 1890. The whole section of the country around there was all flooded. Smith's land was all covered over with water. A portion of it came from back water, seepage water, and a portion of it from the sloughs and head. The water that came down the slough covered my land. The back water came up to the top of the levee in two places, and washed over, and we put in sacks and stopped it. It was near my engine house, on the north side of the levee. The water did not run over the top anywhere else on my levee. It continued running over there for about an hour. Then it rained again, and the water came down. The head water and back water met. It would rise again. And it was that way from that time on, probably, for a month or more after that. From December, when the waters first commenced rising, away along through January, February, and March, the whole country thereabouts was submerged by water; my land, and Smith's land, and everbody else's thereabout. There was also water came down Twelve-Mile slough, got in on Smith's land and mine, and there was no place for it to get off." Under the admitted circumstances, the testimony of the plaintiff corroborates, rather than disputes, the positive testimony of defendant that she had no notice that the dam was a nuisance, or injurious to plaintiff, until the commencement of this action. All the low lands in the valley were inundated by a sudden, extraordinary flood, not caused by the dam or slough in question. Why should defendant have attributed the overflow of plaintiff's land to any other cause? Then, again, no reason appears why she should have known, or even suspected, that the dam was not built with the approbation and consent of plaintiff, and there is no presumption that she did. So much of the evidence on this point is presented for the purpose of showing that the case, on the first count, does not necessarily turn on the question of pleadings. Yet it is evident that the case was tried by plaintiff on the theory that notice to defendant of the nuisance was not essential to his cause of action; for, in his evidence in chief, there was nothing tending to prove that defendant had any knowledge whatever of the injury complained of in the first count, or of its cause, and here he relies principally upon the same theory.

2. The second count charges that in February, 1891, the defendant cut a wide and deep aperture through the western outside levee on her own land, at the west end of the canal, by reason whereof, in the following month, the back waters from the San Joaquin river and tributaries flowed through the lands of plaintiff, and destroyed his crops thereon, etc.

The evidence is sufficient to justify the verdict of the jury on this count, unless, as contended by the appellant, the defendant had a right to open the levee as she did. The arguments of counsel for appellant in support of this alleged right of the defendant to open the levee are principally, if not entirely, founded upon the assumption that the lands of the parties are legally "swamp and overflowed lands," authoritatively segregated, and certified to the state, and that the parties have acquired title from the state by purchase, and thereby have incurred such obligations to reclaim the land as are imposed by law on purchasers of swamp and overflowed land from the state. But there is nothing in the pleadings or in the evidence tending to show that these lands were ever lawfully segregated as swamp and overflowed lands, or that either party claims title or possession under the state. Therefore, neither the obligations assumed by purchasers of swamp and overflowed lands nor any deductions therefrom are relevant to this case.

3. The court did not err in refusing to find the facts after the plaintiff had waived all equitable relief. Section 731 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides that a nuisance is the subject of an action, in which "the nuisance may be enjoined or abated, as well as damages recovered." Under a similar provision of the practice act (section 249), it was said by Mr. Justice Sanderson, for the court: 'The nuisance is the cause of action. The abatement and damages therefor are merely the different kinds of relief to which the plaintiff may be entitled." Yolo Co. v. Sacramento City, 36 Cal. 196. We perceive no reason why the plaintiff was not at liberty to withdraw his prayer for abatement of the nuisance, and thereby waive the equitable relief prayed for, nor why, after such withdrawal and waiver, findings were necessary. The verdict of the jury, if justified by the evidence, supported the judgment for damages, at least. If no equitable relief had been prayed for, the action would have been purely legal, and such as the common law denominates an "action on the case." Therefore, after the withdrawal of the prayer for equitable relief, only an action at law remained. It does not appear why plaintiff's counsel waived equitable relief. They may have done so because, in their opinion, the complaint did not entitle plaintiff to such relief, or that such relief was not justified by the evidence. However this may be, it seems clear that the defendant could not have been injured by the refusal of the court to find facts additional to the verdict.

4. Appellant contends that the court erred, in numerous instances, in its instructions to the jury, and in rejecting evidence offered by defendant. But, so far as relates to the second count, we find no error prejudicial to the defendant. As the first count states no cause of action, and the error of rendering a judgment thereon may be corrected by a modification of the judgment, a new trial should not be ordered. The judgment is therefore modified by reducing it to the sum of $3,982.80, which includes the costs of trial, and as so modified the judgment is affirmed; costs of appeal to be taxed to the respondent. The order denying defendant's motion for a new trial is affirmed.

CLARKE v. MEAD. (No. 15,030.)

SALE FOR STREET ASSESSMENT—VALIDITY—EVIDENCE.

1. In an action to quiet title by one whose land had been sold to pay a special assessment thereon, the certificate of sale is admissible to show that it conformed to Pol. Code, § 3776, providing what such certificate should contain, and that the deed contained all the recitals in the certificate as required by Id. § 3786.

2. Notice of application for a tax deed under Pol. Code, § 3785, containing all the matters therein required, and served more than 30 days before the day of application named, is sufficient, though dated within that time.

3. The statute making a tax deed prima facie evidence of the proceedings requisite to its validity (Pol. Code, § 3786), is not inoperative because contained in the Political Code instead of the Code of Civil Procedure, which regulates the character and effect of evidence.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; J. C. B. Hebbard, Judge.

Action by one Clarke against one Mead to quiet title. From a judgment for defendant, and order denying a motion for a new trial, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Alfred Clarke, for appellant. Geo. E. Bates, for respondent.

HARRISON, J. Action to quiet title. The plaintiff was the owner of a certain tract of land in San Francisco, situate within the district which was assessed for the widening of Mission street, continued from Twenty-Sixth street to the county line. The assessment being delinquent, the superintendent of streets sold the lot to the defendant November 29, 1889, and, no redemption having been made, that officer on the 29th of December, 1890, executed a conveyance of the land to the defendant. At the trial the plaintiff gave evidence tending to show title in himself at the date of the sale, and the defendant offered in evidence the certificate of sale, testimony tending to show that the notice of the application for a deed required by section 3785 of the Political Code had been given, and the deed to himself from the superintendent of streets. The court rendered judgment for the defendant, and the plaintiff moved for a new trial, which was denied, and from this order and the judgment he has appealed. The errors relied upon by the appellant are the rulings of the court in admitting evidence offered on behalf of the respondent. Section 16 of the statute under which the proceedings were had (St. 1889, p.

74) provides: "All provisions of the law in reference to the sale and redemption of property for delinquent state and county taxes in force at any given time shall also then, so far as the same are not in conflict with the provisions of this act, be applicable to the sale and redemption of property for delinquent assessments hereunder, including the issuance of certificates and execution of deeds. The deed of the street superintendent made after such sale, in case of failure to redeem, shall be prima facie evidence of the regularity of all proceedings hereunder, and of title in the grantee."

1. The court did not err in admitting in evidence the certificate of sale. The objection by the appellant that the certificate is insufficient to prove any of the previous steps in the proceedings is ineffectual, as the statute does not give, nor does the respondent claim, such effect from its introduction. It was relevant and competent evidence of the official act of the officer in making the sale, and was admissible for the purpose of showing that it conformed to the requirements of section 3776 of the Political Code, and contained the matters which by section 3786 of that Code were to be recited in the deed.

2. A witness on behalf of the defendant testified that on the 26th of November, 1890, the land was vacant and unoccupied, and that on that day, on behalf of the defendant, he posted in a conspicuous place upon the property a notice by the defendant that on the 27th of December he would apply for a deed of the property, and that on the next day he filed with the superintendent of streets an affidavit of such posting, together with a copy of the notice posted. This affidavit and the copy of the notice were also introduced in evidence. The notice contained the matters required by section 3785 of the Political Code to be given in order to authorize the execution of a deed. It is contended by the appellant that this evidence was insufficient to show that the proper notice was given, for the reason that upon the cross-examination of this witness he testified that he thought that a notice which was then shown to him, and which purported to bear the date December 25th, was the one he left posted upon the property. This notice is not, however, set forth in the record, and we cannot determine whether it is sufficient or not. The objection, however, that its date differs from the date of the one which the witness had testified was a copy of the one he posted would not impair the effect of the notice, as the statute does not require the notice to be dated, and it is not controverted that the notice which was posted contained all the matters required by section 3785, or that it was posted upon the property more than 30 days before the day stated therein, on which the purchaser herein applied for a deed.

3. The appellant objected to the introduction of the deed from the superintendent of streets, upon the ground that no foundation had been laid for introducing said deed by showing the validity or regularity of the proceedings preceding the deed. The deed itself is not contained in the record, but it is stated that it "is dated December 27, 1890, and is in due form of law, and covers the property in controversy, and contains all the matters recited in the certificate of sale." The ground urged in support of the objection is that it was incumbent upon the respondent to make proof of all the facts essential to the exercise by the officer of the power of sale conferred by the statute, and that the provisions of the statute making the deed prima facie evidence of certain facts essential to its validity is inoperative, for the reason that the character and effect of evidence is declared in the Code of Civil Procedure, and that any declaration upon these subjects in any other statute cannot be considered. The power of the legislature to make the deed prima facie evidence of certain preliminary steps in the proceeding is too well established to need discussion. Rollins v. Wright, 93 Cal. 395, 29 Pac. 58; McDonald v. Conniff, 99 Cal. 386, 34 Pac. 71; Marx v. Hanthorn, 148 U. S. 172, 13 Sup. Ct. 508. The appellant was not precluded from showing the absence of any of the acts of which the deed is made primary evidence, but, as he made no effort to show that any of the preliminary steps in the proceedings had not been taken, the deed itself was sufficient evidence to authorize the court to find that they had all been regularly taken, and that the title of the appellant had been thereby transferred to the respondent. It was not held by the trial court that the deed was conclusive evidence of the notice required by section 3785, but the respondent made proof that such notice was given by the testimony of the person who posted the notice. The proposition that the provision making the deed prima facie evidence of certain preliminary facts cannot be considered, for the reason that it is not found in the Code of Civil Procedure, is untenable. The provisions of the four Codes are to be construed as though they were all parts of the same statute (Pol. Code, § 4480), and it is only when there is a conflict between different provisions that it is necessary to determine which shall prevail. There is, however, no conflict between the provisions of the Code of Civil Procedure relating to evidence, and the provision in the Political Code declaring the effect of the deed of the officer, or making it prima facie or presumptive evidence of some other fact. See McDonald v. Conniff, supra. The judgment and order are affirmed.

In re DE LEON'S ESTATE. (No. 15,367.)

Settlement of Deceased's Estate—Petition by Remainder-Man — Jurisdiction of Superior Court—Decree—Collateral Attack.

1. A petition entitled "In the Matter of the Estate of L., Deceased," alleged that L. devised a life estate in his property to his daughter, remainder over to her children; that, after his death, the court decreed distribution in accordance with the will; that petitioner was subsequently born to the daughter, and that the daughter had died. The petition asked the court to determine to whom the property belonged, and make distribution. Held that, though brought in the superior court sitting in probate in the matter of an estate in which distribution had been decreed, the facts alleged entitled the petition to be treated as a complaint in equity, and gave the court jurisdiction to award the relief asked, though the proceeding was brought under Code Civ. Proc. § 1723, which gives the superior court power as a court of probate to decree merely that a life estate has terminated.

2. Petitioner, not being in esse when the prior decree of distribution was made, is not bound thereby, and may attack it collaterally.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, San Francisco county; J. V. Coffey, Judge.

Petition of Virginia Durstein for distribution of the estate of Jose Francisco de Leon, deceased. From the decree, Emil Kehrlein and others appeal. Affirmed.

T. M. Osmont, for appellants. Lloyd & Wood (L. D. McKisick, of counsel), for respondent.

FITZGERALD, J. This proceeding was brought under section 1723 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which reads as follows: "If any person has died, or shall hereafter die, who at the time of his death was the owner of a life estate, which terminates by reason of the death of such person, any person interested in the property, or in the title thereto, in which such life estate was held, may file in the superior court of the county in which the property is situated his verified petition, setting forth such facts, and thereupon, and after such notice by publication or otherwise as the court may order, the court shall hear such petition and the evidence offered in support thereof, and if, upon such hearing, it shall appear that such life estate of such deceased person absolutely terminated by reason of his death, the court shall make a decree to that effect, and thereupon a certified copy of such decree may be recorded in the office of the county recorder, and thereafter shall have the same effect as a final decree of distribution so recorded." The petition substantially alleges that on the 9th day of April, 1872, Jose Francisco de Leon made, published, and declared his last will and testament, by the terms of which he devised the real property described in said petition to his daughter, Mrs. Virginia Leon De Cima, to hold and enjoy during her life, with the provision that she could not sell or mortgage the same, and that upon her death the said property should "pass to her children in equal portions;" that the said testator died in July, 1873, and his will was thereafter admitted to probate, and Mrs. De Cima, who was named as the executrix therein, thereupon qualified, and entered upon her duties as such; that in August, 1874, the court made a decree of distribution under the will, decreeing "that all of the property hereinafter described should go to and vest in the said Virginia Leon De Cima during her life, and upon her death the same should be divided between her four children, share and share alike, to wit, Gertrudis Leon De Cima, Frank Cima, John Cima, and Arthur Cima, who were all the children of said Virginia Leon De Cima at the time said decree was made; that after the decree of distribution was made the said Mrs. De Cima was divorced from her husband, Don Juan De Cima, and thereafter, in February, 1893, she intermarried with one Laurent Durstein; that the only issue of this marriage was the petitioner, who was born July 15, 1884,; that on the 25th day of May, 1891, the said Mrs. Virginia De Cima Durstein, mother of petitioner, and the holder of said life estate, died, leaving surviving her as her only children the said Gertrudis, John, and Arthur De Cima, and the said petitioner; that subsequent to the decree of distribution the said John conveyed his interest in the property to the appellants, Emil Kehrlein, Joseph Cuneo, Giacomo Costa, and Giuseppe Cadenasso, who are now the owners thereof. It is further alleged that by reason of the death of Mrs. De Cima Durstein, her life estate in and to said property has terminated, and the title thereto has vested one-fifth in the petitioner, Virginia Durstein; one-fifth in Kehrlein, Cuneo, Costa, and Cadenasso jointly; one-fifth in Juan De Cima, as father and sole heir of Frank De Cima, deceased; one-fifth in Arthur De Cima; and the remaining one-fifth in the said Gertrudis, who is now Mrs. Sanchez. The prayer of the petition is to the effect that, as the life estate of Mrs. Durstein has terminated by reason of her death, the court will make a decree to that effect, and adjudge and determine to whom, under the will of Jose Francisco de Leon, the said property belongs, and the interest of each party therein; and "for such further and other judgment and decree as the court may deem meet and able to grant." The petition was demurred to generally on the ground that it did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, and specially upon the further ground that the court had no jurisdiction of the proceeding. At the same time appellants filed their answer, denying, on information and belief, the marriage of Mrs. De Cima to Durstein, or that the petitioner was the issue of such marriage. They further deny that a one-fifth interest, or any interest, in said property has vested in petitioner, but aver that the title thereto passed and was vested in the parties to whom it was distributed by the decree of the probate court referred to in the petition; and that the petitioner had never had any right, title, or interest therein. And for a further and separate answer and defense they aver "that the said decree of distribution was a final decree of distribution of the estate of the said Jose Francisco de Leon, deceased; that on the same day an order was made and entered in said court in said estate settling the final account of the executrix of the last will of deceased; that on the 27th day of August, 1874, a decree of final discharge of the executrix of said estate was made, entered, and filed in said cause; that the administration of said estate was then closed, and finally wound up; and that this court has no further jurisdiction of said estate." Upon a trial of the issues thus raised by the pleadings, it was adjudged by the court "that the life estate vested in and held by said Virginia Leon De Cima Durstein in all and singular the lands and premises hereinabove named and described, and the rents and revenues thereof since her death as aforesaid, has absolutely terminated, and the title to said lands and premises, with the revenues thereof, has vested absolutely one-fifth thereof in Gertrudis Leon De Cima Sanchez; one-fifth in Juan Cima as father and sole heir of his son Frank Cima, deceased; one-fifth in Arthur Cima; one-fifth in Virginia Durstein; one-fifth jointly in Emil Kehrlein, Joseph Cuneo, Giacomo Costa, and Giuseppe Cadenasso, as successors in the interest of John Cima,"—from which judgment the said Kehrlein, Cuneo, Costa, and Cadenasso alone appeal with a bill of exceptions.

It is claimed by appellants that the court had no jurisdiction of this proceeding—First, because it was brought in the superior court sitting in probate, in the matter of an estate in which the final decree of distribution had been entered and the estate wound up more than 17 years before the filing of the petition; and, secondly, because, if the proceeding was brought under section 1723 of the Code of Civil Procedure, as it purports to be, then it should have been instituted in the superior court under its general, and not its probate, jurisdiction, in which case the power of the court to grant relief is limited by the provisions of the section to decreeing that the life estate of Mrs. De Cima Durstein had terminated. While the contention of appellants is technically correct as to both propositions, still the facts stated in the petition, notwithstanding its title, are such as to entitle it to be treated as a complaint in equity, and, as the allegations thereof are sufficient in all respects to justify the relief granted, the court having jurisdiction of the subject-matter and of the parties, it follows that the claim of appellants with respect to these questions cannot, under the liberal construction required by the provisions of section 4 of the Code of Civil Procedure, be sustained. In re Thompson's Estate (Cal.) 35 Pac. 991.

It is lastly claimed by appellants that the decree of distribution made by the probate court in August, 1874, is final and conclusive; and in support of this claim they rely on section 1666 of the Code of Civil Procedure. This section can have no possible application to the case before us, for the reason that the decree referred to was and is absolutely void as to the petitioner, as she was not in esse at the time that it was rendered. This being so, it follows upon well-settled authority that such a decree may be made the subject of collateral attack in a proceeding or action of this character. Baker v. O'Riordan, 65 Cal. 368, 4 Pac. 232; Pearson v. Pearson, 46 Cal. 610. Let the judgment be affirmed.

PAINTER et al. v. PAINTER et al. (No. 15,310.)

PARTNERSHIP ACCOUNTING — SURVIVING PARTNER —EVIDENCE.

1. Upon the death of one partner the business was carried on for a number of years by the survivor. In a suit for an accounting and the appointment of a receiver, it appeared that the books contained many errors and erasures. Many of these errors compensated each other. The same method of bookkeeping was pursued, and the same irregularities were found, both before and after the deceased partner's death. Many of the more serious irregularities were explained. The books had been kept continuously by the same bookkeeper, who testified that he had never made a fraudulent entry. Held not to sustain a finding of fraud.

2. Where a surviving partner has conducted the business for six years to the advantage of all parties concerned, a decree declaring all the assets to belong to the old firm, and refusing to allow such partner any compensation for his services, or even credit for amounts paid a manager of the business, is erroneous.

3. In a suit against a surviving partner for an accounting, a credit to him on account of real estate appeared in the ledger, written over an erasure, under date of February 28, 1882. An expert witness surmised that the entry was made in 1883, after the death of plaintiff's decedent, and fraudulently antedated, as he saw nothing on the face of the books to justify the entry. Defendant's account book, kept as one of the books of the firm, contained entries justifying the credit, and the item appeared properly entered in the journal between entries unquestionably made in 1882. Defendant testified, corroborated by vouchers and his account book, that he took land in his name for the firm; that the payments were made by the firm, though charged to him, and the credit was made by the consent of his partner to balance his account. Held insufficient to sustain a finding that the entry was fraudulent and void.

4. One partner advanced money to the firm, and permitted his copartner to withdraw it for his individual use. The latter died without having returned the money. Thereafter, an action was brought by his personal representatives against the surviving partner for an accounting. Held, that the claim need not be presented for allowance against the estate of the deceased partner, but would be adjusted by charging plaintiffs therewith on the partnership accounting.

5. The control of firm assets and business should not be wrested from the surviving partner, by the appointment of a receiver, without a clear showing of mismanagement or improper conduct, and of danger of ultimate loss to the estate of the deceased partner.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; F. W. Lawler, Judge.

Action by Caroline A. Painter and E. B. Dallam, executors of the will of Jerome B. Painter, deceased, against Theodore P. Painter and J. Milton Painter, for an accounting. From a judgment for plaintiffs, and an order denying a new trial, defendants appeal. Reversed.

Pringle, Hayne & Boyd, for appellants. Fox, Kellogg & King (P. T. Riley, of counsel), for respondents.

VANCLIEF, C. This is an action by the executors of the will of Jerome B. Painter, deceased, to compel an accounting and settlement of the affairs of the partnership firm of Painter & Co., of which the deceased was a member, and Theodore P. Painter was the surviving partner.

The business of the partnership was that of manufacturing and selling printing presses, type, and other materials, and the publication of an annual directory, and other incidental business. The partnership was originally formed in 1859, when it was composed of the three brothers,—Jerome B., J. Milton, and Theodore P. Painter, of whom Jerome B., the deceased, was the eldest, and Theodore P. the youngest. J. Milton ceased to be a member of the firm October 1, 1865, from which date until the death of Jerome, February 6, 1883, the eldest and youngest brothers continued to be equal partners. During the partnership the firm acquired considerable real estate, a portion of which stood in the joint names of the partners, and a portion in the separate name of each partner. By the will of Jerome B., all his share in the partnership stock and good will of the business, except the real estate, was devised to his brothers, J. Milton and Theodore P., upon the condition of their assuming the partnership liabilities. Shortly after the death of Jerome, Theodore, the surviving partner, formed a new copartnership for the same purposes with J. Milton, without changing the firm name; and on December 3, 1884, they filed a certificate of their partnership, under the firm name of Painter & Co., as having existed since February 12, 1883. Before entering upon the business of the new firm, they took an account and inventory of the stock on hand, which was reported to the appraisers of the estate of Jerome B. Painter. All stock on hand was then marked so as to distinguish it from any additional stock they might acquire, and all sales of that stock were thereafter distinguished on the sales books from the sales of other stock. The books of original entry, cash book, and journal used by the old firm were used by the new firm, and were kept by the same bookkeeper, George W. Darbey, who had kept the books of the old firm for more than six years prior to the death of Jerome B. Painter. By order of J. Milton, posting of the old firm books was discontinued until it was discovered that they had not been fully posted prior to the death of Jerome, when directions were given to complete the posting of them. No posting of the accounts of the new firm, nor of sales of the stock of the old firm, was done for a period of about four years; but proper data for future posting were kept in the books of original entry, cash book, and journal. Only one cash account was kept, but the sales book clearly distinguished the sales of the old stock from the sales of new. J. Milton was the manager of the business, but made no charge against the old firm for his services, or for services of the new firm for selling the old stock, nor for collecting the debts due the old firm. The continuance of the business by the new firm facilitated, to some extent, the winding up of the old business. New machinery was purchased by the new firm for the manufacturing department; and the manufacture and sale of new stock, and the continuance of a general sale department, helped the gradual disposition of the old stock at less expense and sacrifice than probably would have been incurred by putting it upon the market at once, and separately from a general business and assortment of goods in that line. In 1878 the old firm entered into an agreement with Francis & Valentine, H. E. Langley, and others for the purpose of the copyrights and privileges of "Langley's San Francisco Directory," and certain other directories, and of the good will of the business of publishing the same, and agreed to publish the same annually for a period of 10 years, and to pay to Francis & Valentine 20 per cent. of the value of all copies sold,—equivalent to a royalty of one dollar per volume,—and providing that "in case of the death of either of the partners composing the firm, as it then existed, the surviving partner and the estate of such deceased partner shall have the right of abandoning the publication of the aforementioned works," and of being discharged from future liability, upon reassignment of the copyright and good will of the business. Up to the death of Jerome B., February 6, 1883, the publication of the directories had been made at a continual loss to the firm, and the publication for the year 1883 caused a loss of $1,200. The surviving partner, Theodore P., who was also one of the executors of the will of Jerome B., proposed to abandon the business of publishing the directories, as unprofitable, and spoke of the matter to Mr. Dallam, a coexecutor, who interposed no objection; but J. Milton Painter was of opinion that the future publication of the San Francisco directory might be made profitable, if they could secure more favorable terms from Francis & Valentine; and it was concluded to make another attempt, on the condition that the new firm should act on their own responsibility, and at their own expense. As a result of the efforts of J. Milton Painter, the contract with Francis & Valentine was modified so as to reduce their royalty on the San Francisco directory to 50 cents per volume. J. Milton then introduced a change of management, by which the publication of that directory became profitable. In November, 1886, the contract was further modified so as to constitute a partnership between the new firm of Painter & Co. and the firm of Francis & Valentine, for the publication of the San Francisco directory on the basis of sharing equally the profits and losses, but the publication was to be under the supervision of Painter & Co. After the year 1883 the plant of type, stands, and cases used by the old firm of Painter & Co. was used by the new firm in the publication of the directory, without formal transfer to the new firm; but all money required to be advanced for the publication for each year thereafter was advanced by the new firm, and a yearly rental of $300 was allowed as compensation for the use of the plant. The accounts of the directory concern were kept upon the books of the old firm by the same bookkeeper, without change in the manner of keeping them. The only means of discriminating between the old and new accounts consisted of the dates of the entries, and the essential nature of the business of publishing a new directory for each succeeding year. All accounts in regard to the directory, pertaining to the business of the old and new firms, were entered continuously upon the same books, in the same firm name, of Painter & Co.

In the year 1884, litigation arose between the surviving partner of the old firm and the estate of Jerome B. Painter, deceased; growing out of an attempt of the surviving partner to enforce a debit to the account of Jerome B. as a claim against his estate, though his net interest in the firm assets had been appraised at $4,152.94. This attempt of the surviving partner was defeated by a decision of this court in January, 1886. 68 Cal. 395, 9 Pac. 450. In May, 1888, the surviving partner, having resigned his position as executor, brought suit to settle the old partnership, and to sell the real and personal assets of that firm; and, in October of that year, J. Milton Painter brought suit to obtain a construction of the will of Jerome B. Painter, and to marshal the assets of the firm and of the estate of the deceased partner. In May, 1889, the present suit was brought, the complaint in which charges, in substance, that upon the death of Jerome B. Painter, the surviving partner, Theodore P. Painter, took possession of all the property and business of the firm, and admitted the defendant J. Milton to an interest in the business; that defendants have ever since conducted the business as if it had been their own; that Theodore P. was both surviving partner of the old firm and one of the executors of the will of the deceased partner; that he has neglected and refused to settle the affairs of the partnership; that, by order of the probate court, he has filed a report and account in that court, wherein he falsely claimed that at the time of the death of Jerome B. he was indebted to the firm in the sum of $44,000 and upwards, which indebtedness, on September 10, 1888, had increased to $73,000, whereas, on the contrary, the partnership was indebted to him, at the time of his death, in the sum of $50,000 at least; that the said report and account filed were insufficient and unintelligible, as well as false and fraudulent; that the probate court appointed an expert to examine the books, and state an account of the condition of the affairs of the partnership, who has been engaged in that work for several months, but is unable to state the account, for the reason that defendants have not, for many years past, kept any true or intelligible account of the business of the partnership; that, since the death of Jerome B., Theodore P. has altered and falsified the accounts of both himself and Jerome B., and made many new, false, and fraudulent entries in the books, with intent to cheat and defraud the estate of Jerome B.; that he has collected large sums of money on account of the firm, amounting to at least $20,000, which he has not accounted for, but has appropriated to his own use; that he has so managed the business as to lose, in a large degree, the good will of the business; that the books have not been posted since April, 1885; that false and fraudulent balances have been carried forward in the cash book, showing the balance of cash on hand to be far below what it really was; that there would be due to the firm about May 16, 1889, the sum of $16,000, on account of the printing of the San Francisco directory, which money is and will be the property of the firm, and would be lost to the firm if paid to the defendants; that the estate of Jerome B. Painter cannot be closed without a settlement of the partnership; and that unless all the books, papers, vouchers, properties, and assets of the firm are taken from the hands of the defendants, into the custody and control of the court, there is imminent danger that the interest of the estate of Jerome B. Painter in the property of the firm will be entirely lost. The prayer of the complaint is for the appointment of a receiver, and for an accounting and settlement of the partnership. The answer denies each allegation of fraud, and all danger of loss to the estate of Jerome B. Painter. It claims that the money received, and to be received, from the publication of the directory, is no part of the assets of the firm of which Jerome B. Painter was a member. It avers that the keeping of the books was intrusted wholly to George W. Darbey, the same bookkeeper who was originally employed by Jerome B. Painter, and they were kept in the same style and manner after as before his death; that no false or fraudulent entries were made in the books at any time, and no irregularity appears on the books, since the death of Jerome B. Painter, which has not a precedent and example in the books as previously kept by Darbey; that the omission of posting in the ledger was through a misunderstanding on his part of instructions given him. It sets forth the efforts made by the surviving partner to liquidate the business of the firm of which Jerome B. Painter, deceased, was a member, and the pendency of the action brought by the surviving partner, May 4, 1888, to settle the partnership. The court appointed a receiver, who took possession of the whole of the type-foundry business, merchandise, and personal property on hand, of every description, and the whole of the directory business, and moneys arising therefrom, to the exclusion of both of the defendants. The findings were in favor of the plaintiffs upon every issue, including all of the averments of fraud; and, as the result of an accounting of the whole business from 1880, the court adjudged that Theodore P. Painter was indebted to the firm of Painter & Co. in the sum of $28,675.64, one-half of which was declared a lien, in favor of the estate of Jerome B. Painter, upon Theodore P. Painter's half of the assets of the firm, and further adjudged that the defendant J. Milton Painter had no interest in any of the assets of the firm, including the property in the hands of the receiver, all of which was adjudged to be firm assets. The defendants moved for a new trial, alleging the insufficiency of the evidence to sustain the findings of the court; and this appeal is from the judgment, and from an order denying their motion for a new trial.

1. The evidence is insufficient to sustain the findings in regard to the alleged fraud of the defendants. Those findings are based upon the surmises of Mr. Folger, an expert witness, that various irregularities and erasures found in the books, and certain entries, of which the explanation was not obvious upon inspection, were indicative of fraud. These surmises were natural, as appears from the testimony of Mr. Van Bokkelen, another expert witness, who states "that while, on the preliminary examination of the books of Painter & Co., the irregularities found by him made a very unfavorable impression, yet on a more careful examination of such irregularities and errors, and the discovery of the explanation of the more serious of them, and the examination of the methods of bookkeeping for several years prior to the death of said Jerome, in which the same irregularities and errors occur, he is now satisfied that those errors and irregularities, with attending circumstances, exclude the idea of fraud." If the record did not afford the means of testing the relative value of the opinions of Mr. Folger and Mr. Van Bokkelen, the case might be considered as one of conflicting evidence; but from the facts, figures, and circumstances found in the record, all supporting Mr. Van Bokkelen's theory, I think Mr. Folger's unsupported opinion does not create a substantial conflict, and is too slight and uncertain to justify a finding of fraud. Code Civ. Proc. § 1835; Estate of Carpenter, 94 Cal. 411-419, 29 Pac. 1101; People v. Stewart, 80 Cal. 131, 22 Pac. 124. The evidence discloses a careless habit of bookkeeping by Darbey, and it is somewhat surprising that his services were retained, not only during the last six years of the life of Jerome B. Painter, and by the new firm of Painter & Co. until the appointment of the receiver, in 1889, but also by the receiver himself, from the date of his appointment to the time of the trial, in 1892, notwithstanding the fact that the affidavit on which the receiver was appointed disclosed the principal irregularities appearing in the books kept by Darbey. The evidence shows, and it is not disputed, that Darbey kept the books in the same careless and bungling manner from the beginning to the end of his services to the two firms of Painter & Co., but does not sufficiently show that either he, or any of his employers, were at any time guilty of fraud, or that any fraudulent entries were made in the books, or that any entries were fraudulently omitted, though the books contain many mistakes and erasures, and the vouchers show that entries were carelessly omitted. It appears that during the lifetime of Jerome B. Painter, he was the managing member of the firm. He had kept the books for a time, and always had more immediate supervision of the books and accounts than had Theodore, who was a printer, and had never studied bookkeeping, either practically or theoretically, and seldom examined the books, further than to see that certain entries were made in which he had an interest. After the death of Jerome B. Painter, no entry appears to have been made in any book by Theodore P. Painter or J. Milton Painter; but all entries were made in the handwriting of Darbey, who testifies that he never made a fraudulent entry in the books. Yet the evidence establishes that during the lifetime of Jerome B. Painter, as well as subsequent to his death, there were many irregularities, consisting of mistaken entries made on the wrong side of the accounts, with many erasures and corrections of mistakes in the cash account, and careless omission of entries and postings. The books abound with so many of these errors throughout the service of Darbey as bookkeeper, many of which compensate each other, that it cannot be supposed that they were fraudulently designed. None of them, when viewed in the light of all the circumstances in proof, is inconsistent with innocent design, and it follows that none of them should be considered as fraudulently designed. Fraud should never be presumed, nor grounded upon mere suspicion, nor inferred from circumstances which are susceptible of an explanation consistent with innocent intention. Estate of Carpenter, 94 Cal. 411–412, 29 Pac. 1101; Estate of Kidder, 66 Cal. 490, 6 Pac. 326; U. S. v. Arredondo, 6 Pet. 716; Tucker v. Moreland, 10 Pet. 78; Paxton v. Boyce, 1 Tex. 317–325; Steele v. Kinkle, 3 Ala. 358.

2. The court erred in finding and adjudging that the whole of the assets taken from the possession of the defendants by the receiver were the assets of the old firm of Painter & Co., and at the same time refusing to allow any compensation to either of the defendants for their labor, skill, and energy in the conduct of the business for six years, and charging Theodore P. Painter with all the funds drawn by J. Milton Painter for his support during that period, while acting as manager of the new firm. He drew funds for his support at the rate of about $116 per month, aggregating during the six years the sum of $8,372.54, all of which Theodore P. Painter is made to pay out of his own pocket, without deduction or allowance of any compensation for the services of J. Milton Painter. J. Milton Painter was treated by the court, in all respects, as a mere intruder in the business of the old firm of Painter & Co., and as if he were a mere private employe of Theodore P. Painter, payment for whose services could not be charged to the old firm by the surviving partner. Such a ruling is manifestly unjust, and contravenes the principles of equity. It is true that a surviving partner is not entitled to compensation for the mere winding up of the business of the firm. "But the rule applies merely to the simple and immediate winding up, by collecting the assets, paying the debts, and accounting for the surplus, as is necessarily involved in the creation of a partnership, and implied in the contract; but for time, skill, and trouble expended beyond this, and inuring to the general benefit, the reason of the rule fails, as where, after dissolution, a partner successfully continues the business of the firm, using the original capital, good will, or other assets, and a benefit is received from his efforts, he is allowed to deduct from the profits a compensation, varying according to the state of the accounts, the nature of the business, the difficulty and results of the undertaking, and, perhaps, its necessity or desirability. The most usual application of this limitation of this principle is in the case of a surviving partner continuing the firm business, or completing the enterprise of the partners." 2 Bates, Partn. § 773. This court has said: "When the partnership has been carried on for some time after a dissolution by death, and such continuance has proved beneficial to the parties, it is but just and proper that the surviving partner should receive a reasonable allowance for his skill and industry in conducting the business; for during that time the business has not received the care and labor of the deceased partner, as an equivalent for such services. While all the parties are living, each is under obligation to devote his time and services to the partnership business, and there is therefore good reason for holding that neither should receive a compensation for such services. But when, in consequence of the death of one partner, this equality no longer exists, it is but equitable that the surviving partner should be compensated for such services as he may have rendered in the business after the death of the deceased partner, to be deducted out of the profits realized by the continuance of the business, and the overplus of such profits, after deducting such compensation, to be divided between the partners. Story, Partn. § 343, and notes; Coll. Partn. § 328; Gow. Partn. 354. We do not wish to be understood, however, as holding that the surviving partner is entitled to compensation merely for services rendered in winding up the affairs of the firm (Beatty v. Wray, 19 Pa. St. 516), but to confine it to a case like the present, where the partnership business has been continued for a considerable period in order that the affairs of the partnership may be advantageously wound up." Griggs v. Clark, 23 Cal. 427, 430. Where a surviving partner, who has continued the business to advantage, is ordered to account, he should be allowed all expenses incurred in continuing the business. O'Reilly v. Brady, 28 Ala. 530; Calvert v. Miller, 94 N. C. 600. And in the present case, upon the theory that the whole business conducted by the defendants should be regarded as if continued by the surviving partner for the benefit of the old firm, a reasonable compensation for the services of J. Milton Painter, as manager of the continued business, should be allowed as an expense incurred in continuing the business, in addition to a reasonable compensation for the services of the surviving partner. Where a partner forms a subpartnership with a third person, who becomes manager of the firm business, such manager, not being a partner of the other partner, is entitled to compensation, as against him. Newland v. Tate, 3 Ired. Eq. 226. But it is by no means clear that the court was justified in ordering an accounting of the whole of the business conducted by the new firm of Painter & Co., and in taking into its custody all of the assets claimed by that firm. It is true that, as a general rule, an accounting of profits will be ordered against a surviving partner who conducts the business after dissolution, with the use of the firm assets. "But if, from the nature of the concern, and the state of the accounts, the assets cannot be realized, except by continuing business, and the surviving partners continue as a new firm, debiting themselves with old assets, they are not accountable for profits." 2 Bates, Partn. § 794. "Just allowances to the continuing partners are always made, and if the main contribution to subsequent success is the skill, time, and diligence of each partner, it is difficult or impossible to say how much of the profits is to be allowed for or deducted for the services of incoming new partners; and, if an accountability for profits would be unjust, the court may allow interest only." Id. § 797. The rule for an accounting of profits "being founded on the misuse of another's property, held for other purposes only, and on its exposure to risks, the share of profits to be accounted for is measured by the amount attributable to that source. Hence, if the subsequent profits are partly or wholly due to the skill of the remaining partners, a special inquiry is necessary to ascertain the amount. No general rule can be made." Id. § 797. There should be no accounting for subsequent profits where the deceased partner owes the firm more than the amount of his interest in the business of the firm, and the subsequent profits arise from the prudence, skill, and industry of the remaining partners. Id. § 798, and cases cited.

The case at bar seems to be a proper one for a special inquiry. According to the theory of the evidence contended for by the appellants, viz. that Jerome B. Painter bought all of the school lands purchased by him on his own private account, as his property, and that they are not assets of the partnership, and that Theodore P. Painter is entitled to all the credits of which he has been deprived by the findings and decree of the court, Jerome B. Painter might prove to be indebted to the firm, at the time of his death, beyond the actual value of his interest in the personal assets of the firm at that date, the actual value of which does not now certainly appear. If that theory were sustained, as the result of a new trial, his estate would not be entitled to share at all in the profits of the business conducted by the new firm. But, in determining the assets of the firm at the date of his death, the value of the good will of the business must be taken into the account; and it should be ascertained by special inquiry what was the precise value of the interest of Jerome B. Painter in the personal assets of the firm, including the good will, at the date of his death, and to what extent his interest in the assets was employed by the new firm in the conduct of their business. To the proportionate extent to which his interest in the good will and personal assets of the old firm was actually used by the firm in the prosecution of its business, his estate ought, in equity, to participate in the profits realized by the new firm. On the other hand, to the full extent of the interest of Theodore P. Painter in the assets of the old firm, as a partner therein, and of all money advanced by the members of the new firm, either individually or upon their joint credit, and to the extent of their purchase of new machinery and new merchandise with their own funds, and to the extent of the value of their personal services, skill, and energy employed in the business of the new firm, it is equitable and just that the new firm should receive its proportionate share of the profits realized from the new business. In estimating the value of the good will of the old firm, it should be considered that, while the old firm had the right to continue the publication of the directory, it was not under contract obligation to do so after the death of Jerome B. Painter, and that the original contract, as made by the old firm, had proved unprofitable, and that the profits subsequently realized were owing to modification of the contract secured by J. Milton Painter, and largely owing to his management of the business. It should also be considered, as matter of law, that no directory to be published after the death of Jerome B. Painter could have been copyrighted in advance of its publication, so that such copyrights could not be the property of the old firm. The question to be determined in this connection is merely as to what was the actual value of the good will of the directory business, considered as a part of the good will of the whole of the firm business, when the new business was inaugurated by the new partners under the old firm name.

3. The evidence is insufficient to justify the finding that the entry of a credit to Theodore P. Painter on the books of the old firm, of the sum of $15,203.19, on account of real estate and interest, was fraudulent and void, and that that amount was properly chargeable against him. The entry is written in the ledger over an erasure at the top of a column under date of February 28, 1882, and the expert witness, Mr. Folger, surmised that the entry was made February 28, 1883, after the death of Jerome B. Painter, and was fraudulently antedated; and, as he saw nothing on the face of the books to justify the entry, he thought that that amount should be charged back to Theodore P. Painter. But he admits that he did not examine the private account book of Theodore P. Painter, which was kept in the handwriting of Darbey, as one of the books of the firm, which, as the expert witness Van Bokkelen clearly shows, contained entries of sundry amounts paid by him on account of real estate and interest, which correspond with and justify the entry of $15,203.19 made to his credit in 1882. The narrative of Theodore P. Painter, which is corroborated by his account book and the vouchers produced in evidence, is to the effect that B. C. Vandall was indebted to the firm of Painter & Co. in a large sum of money, and having no assets other than heavily incumbered real property at South San Francisco, which might have a prospective value, but then had no value beyond the amount of the incumbrances thereon, proposed to transfer it to the firm, subject to the incumbrances. Jerome Painter endeavored to have the title taken in the name of a third person, as he did not wish to have Vandall ask the firm for more money in case the land should rise in value, but, failing to secure such third person, requested Theodore P. Painter to take the deed of the land in his name. The property thus standing in the name of Theodore, the payments from the firm money made by him to pay off the incumbrances were entered by the bookkeeper upon Theodore's cash account; and the entry of $15,203.19 to his credit upon the journal and ledger in 1882 was of an amount then calculated by the bookkeeper to correspond with the principal and interest with which Theodore had been charged, and was entered upon the books at Theodore's request, in accordance with a tag showing the amount calculated by the bookkeeper, which he obtained from Jerome B. Painter. The entry upon the journal is without erasure, under a page bearing date March 31, 1882, but following an entry carried over from the previous page under date of February 28, 1882; it being the custom of the bookkeeper to make his journal entries as of the last day of each month. Immediately following the journal entry of this credit is a debit to the Boston & Fairhaven Iron Company, which the press copy of letters shows must have been entered in March, 1882, and was correctly posted as an entry of March 31, 1882. The credit to T. P. Painter was posted in the ledger under date of February 28, 1882. The amount of interest entered in the journal as part of the credit was calculated by Darbey only to February 1, 1882. The erasure over which the posting was made in the ledger is fully accounted for by a previous mistaken entry of a debit balance of December 31, 1880, which was commenced to be carried to the wrong side of the page, and erased by the bookkeeper, as was his custom in cases of such mistakes, which were comparatively frequent. One of the expert witnesses testified that he had discovered that the word "balance" had been originally written under the entry of this credit in the ledger, and erased; and in the photographic copy of the ledger page, appearing in the transcript, the top of what might be the letters "B" and "l" are plainly visible, and it is apparent that the date of 1880, originally written above the mistaken entry of the debit balance, was changed to 1882,—the date of the posting of the credit. The testimony clearly establishes that it was a common mistake of the bookkeeper to commence to place an entry at the beginning of a column of figures in the wrong column, and to correct it by an erasure, sometimes making the correction before he had finished the incorrect entry. Such mistakes and erasures abound in the ledger, but it is noticeable that no erasures of importance appear in the journal, or in the books of original entry; and none appear in the journal entry of this credit, which stands properly between entries which were unmistakably made in 1882,—prior to the death of Jerome B. Painter. It is not necessary to review in detail all of the evidence bearing upon the subject-matter of this credit. It has been carefully considered, and it is sufficient to say that, taken as a whole, in view of the well-settled presumption against fraud, it does not sustain the finding that this credit was fraudulent, but does tend to establish, on the contrary, that it was made in the lifetime of Jerome B. Painter, with his knowledge and consent, and was made on account of real estate belonging to the firm. If so, it was improperly charged back against Theodore P. Painter in the accounting between him and the estate of Jerome B. Painter.

4. The same is true of a credit to Theodore P. Painter of $4,282.98 on account of stock of the South San Francisco Dock Company, entered under date of June 30, 1882. The journal entry of that date appears to be regular, and refers by names and numbers to the certificates of stock for which the credit was given, and is immediately followed by another journal entry of the same date, of interest due the Bank of British North America for the month of June, 1882. No erasure appears in the posting of this entry. This stock was obtained from B. C. Vandall on account of a debt to the firm, and was redeemed and held in the name of Theodore P. Painter for the firm, in the same manner as the land deeded by Vandall to him. Theodore P. Painter testified that this entry was also made, with the consent and knowledge of Jerome B. Painter, at the date of the entry appearing on the books, and there is no proof to the contrary. Before making the entry, Darbey made a calculation of the principal and interest to June 19, 1882, but made a mistake against Theodore P. Painter of $1,000 in the calculation, thus attaining the precise sum entered upon the books to his credit. Under this state of the evidence, this credit was improperly rejected by the court, and the amount improperly charged back to Theodore P. Painter in the accounting.

5. The court also improperly rejected a credit to Theodore P. Painter of $1,961.87, entered on the journal March 31, 1882, and posted as of that date, on account of money advanced to F. P. Thompson, and interest thereon, in consideration of the note of F. P. Thompson, executed to the firm of Painter & Co. on the 29th of January, 1878, payable March 1, 1878. This note was drawn in the handwriting of Jerome B. Painter. Theodore P. Painter testified that F. P. Thompson was superintendent of state printing, and requested a loan from Painter & Co., and that Jerome B. Painter agreed to the loan, but did not want it to appear upon the books of the company, and requested him to draw the money in several sums, on his private account, and loan it to Mr. Thompson upon his note payable to the firm. The note was not paid, and was about to outlaw in March 1882, when the amount advanced, with interest, was credited to Theodore, with the knowledge and consent of Jerome. There is nothing to contradict this explanation of the matter. The account book of Theodore P. Painter, kept by Darbey, shows that in January, 1878, unusually large sums of money, amounting to more than enough to cover the amount of the loan from the firm to Thompson, were charged to Theodore P. Painter, as having been drawn by him from the funds of the firm. Darbey's recollection is that the note was about to outlaw when this credit to Theodore was entered, which would correspond to the date of the credit in March, 1882. It appears that, for some unexplained reason, interest on the money advanced by Theodore P. Painter was calculated to the 18th of April, 1882; but such a calculation would evidently not have been made if the entry were antedated after the death of Jerome B. Painter, in 1883. That it was not so antedated further appears from the journal entry immediately following the credit of $1,961.87, which is proved by the invoice book to have been entered in March, 1882.

6. Theodore P. Painter is also improperly charged with $7,312.48, being the whole of the credit side of a branch account kept by him upon the books of Painter & Co., entitled "Mrs. M. B. Account." "Mrs. M. B." was the mother of the Painters, and Theodore used her initials, in her lifetime, to designate an account of moneys received by him from her as a gift, and also moneys received by him from other friends, which he advanced to the partnership. This account was in fact a separate branch of the account of T. P. Painter with the firm of Painter & Co. But it is evident that, if the items of this account had been entered upon the account kept in the name of Theodore P. Painter, the credit side of the Mrs. M. B. account would have appeared upon the credit side of his own account. No justification is apparent for debiting Theodore P. Painter, individually, with the whole of the credit side of this account. If it were shown that there were any improper items of credit in the account, they should, of course, be deducted therefrom. So, also, any improper items of debit should be corrected. But Theodore P. Painter should be credited, instead of charged, with any true balance of credit to the Mrs. M. B. account. The balance of credit appearing upon the face of the account is $6,508.15. Items of credit amounting to $2,477.33, consisting of $2,000, principal, received by Jerome B. Painter from Theodore P. Painter March 5, 1881, and interest on that amount, in the sum of $477.33, from that date until February 28, 1883,—the date of the entry of these items of credits,—are controverted, as having been improperly entered after the death of Jerome B. Painter, without any corresponding money appearing upon the books to have been paid into the account, or to have been received by Jerome B. Painter. Theodore P. Painter testifies in regard to this entry that just before the first Monday in March, 1881, at Jerome B. Painter's request, he withdrew from the bank $2,320 of the money due to this account. This amount appears on the face of the account to have been charged to the Mrs. M. B. account, March 5, 1881, as drawn by T. P. Painter individually; and the remaining $2,000 was deposited in the office of the firm, and was used by Jerome B. Painter personally, under a promise to replace it. He put off adjusting the matter, but finally promised to pay the money on the 20th of February, 1883, but died on the 6th day of that month, without having done so. After his death, Theodore P. Painter, by the advice of his attorney, Judge Cope, had the entry in question made upon the books to the credit of the M. B. account, under date of February 28, 1883. The claim for the adjustment of this matter appears to have been made in good faith, and to have been immediately announced to his coexecutors, who agreed that that sum should be paid. It also appears that in the months of March and April, 1881, the cash account of Jerome B. Painter showed few and small charges to him, indicating that he then had some other source of supply of funds. Under these circumstances, it would seem that the entry of the credit to the Mrs. M. B. account was justifiable, and should not be charged back to Theodore P. Painter. But the entry made by the bookkeeper was an incomplete adjustment of the matter, for the manifest reason that Jerome B. Painter, having actually received the money drawn from this account, which was deposited in the office of the firm by Theodore P. Painter at his request, should also be charged therewith. The credit to the Mrs. M. B. account appears, in itself, a proper manner of canceling the debit made to that account on March 5, 1881, when the money was merely drawn by Theodore P. Painter from the bank at the request of Jerome B. Painter, and deposited in the office of the firm. It must be regarded, therefore, as remaining in the custody of the firm until taken therefrom by Jerome B. Painter, whose account ought to be charged therewith, as an asset of the firm, instead of the account of Theodore P. Painter, while the firm liability would still remain to return the money to Theodore P. Painter through the Mrs. M. B. account. For these reasons the credit to that account should stand, and the account of Jerome B. Painter should be charged correspondingly. The same result would have been reached by the payment of the money and interest out of Jerome B. Painter's estate to Theodore P. Painter individually; but that estate is in court, and, as the matter can properly be adjusted through the medium of the partnership accounting, I think it should be adjusted in the manner indicated. A surviving partner is not required to present a claim against the estate of a deceased partner, who has received money from the custody of the firm, or which constitutes, legally or equitably, a part of its assets, if the claim can be worked out through the settlement of the partnership. Manuel v. Escolle, 65 Cal. 110, 3 Pac. 411; Painter v. Painter, 68 Cal. 395, 9 Pac. 450. The mere fact that the entry of the credit to the Mrs. M. B. account was made upon the firm books after the death of Jerome B. Painter is not material, there being sufficient proof aliunde to justify the credit. The respondents have not contradicted the sworn statement of Theodore P. Painter as to the claim made by him to them immediately after the death of Jerome B. Painter in reference to the $2,000 received by Jerome B. Painter in March, 1881, and as to their agreement that it should be adjusted. That Jerome B. Painter had full confidence in the integrity of his brother Theodore is manifest from the terms of the will.

7. A charge of $349.52 is improperly made against Theodore P. Painter on account of payments made by him upon a firm note for $700, executed October 1, 1880, to Grace Meininger, payable one year after date, with interest at 10 per cent. per annum, payable quarterly. It appears that the money loaned by her to the firm, for which this note was given, was entered upon the books of the firm as an account in her name. But on February 28, 1881, the money was drawn out, and divided between the partners, and the account closed, though the note was not taken up or paid. The payments subsequently made on the note by Theodore P. Painter were charged to him, individually, in the accounting, on account of the apparent squaring of her account upon the books. But the note remained unpaid, and was a subsisting obligation of the firm. It is clear that all payments made by Theodore P. Painter upon the Grace Meininger note, out of firm funds, during the existence of the note, as a firm obligation, are properly chargeable to the firm, and not to Theodore P. Painter individually.

8. Sundry credit items, appearing on the books as credited to Theodore P. Painter, amounting in the aggregate to $5,988.75 in May, 1889, have been erroneously charged to him by the court in the accounting. These credits were matters of offset to charges made by the bookkeeper to Theodore P. Painter of cash received from sales of merchandise, or from collections reported by him, which appear from the books to have been credited back to him when the money was paid in; and to charge them back to him again is manifestly unjust. These credit items, furthermore, relate largely, if not entirely, to the business of the new firm, and, in so far as they do so relate, their justice is matter of inquiry and adjustment between Theodore P. Painter and J. Milton Painter, as partners. There is no proof that Darbey, the bookkeeper, fraudulently entered these credits to the account of Theodore P. Painter, and there is proof that he had charged Theodore P. Painter, individually, with a corresponding amount of cash received, to which the credits apply when the cash was returned, and paid over by him to the firm.

9. On the face of the cash book by Darbey, as bookkeeper, a total cash shortage of $17,432 appears to have occurred between June, 1881, and May, 1889, one-half of which ($8,656) has been charged to Theodore P. Painter in the accounting. A much larger amount of cash shortage appears on the face of the cash books to have occurred under former bookkeepers in the life-time of Jerome B. Painter, between 1871 and 1881. The cash books do not appear ever to have been kept in balance. The partners appear to have contented themselves with watching the actual cash receipts and disbursements, and seeing that proper entries were made upon their individual accounts and the accounts of the firm with third parties, without requiring the general cash account to be kept in accurate balance, or to correspond in balance with the balance of cash on hand. The proof is clear, from the examinations of many vouchers, that very many items of cash were not entered at all upon the general cash account. A sufficient number of these omissions were proved to reduce the apparent cash shortage by the amount of $5,722.69, and to make it evident that the apparent cash shortage was owing to a careless and slipshod manner of bookkeeping, especially as to entries upon the general cash account, which was never balanced, and not owing to any fraud, either on the part of the bookkeeper or of the members of the new firm, in their relation to each other, or in their relation to the old firm of Painter & Co. All entries made upon the books were made by the bookkeeper, Darbey, who was generally careless, and especially so in his posting of the general cash account, which was never balanced, or used by the partners, either of the old or new firm, as a criterion of the amount of cash which ought to be on hand. But Darbey is not convicted of dishonesty, and the manner in which he kept the general cash account goes far to acquit him of such a charge. Had he been dishonest, it is highly improbable that he would have kept that account in a condition to disclose a large cash shortage, for which the firm might call him to account. Indeed, it does not appear that Darbey ever handled any of the moneys of the firm, and it seems absurd to account for the cash shortage upon the supposition of his intentional dishonesty. Neither is there ground, from the evidence, for reasonable belief that either of the partners fraudulently directed the bookkeeper to make false entries in the general cash account, or to omit the making of other entries therein, so as to show, upon the face of the books, a cash shortage of many thousands of dollars. The court has erroneously credited Jerome B. Painter with one-half of the cash shortage of the old firm, which occurred under the administration of Darbey, as bookkeeper, during his lifetime. The evidence discloses that Jerome B. Painter was then the managing partner, and carefully supervised the accounts of the firm, and controlled its receipts and expenditures, while Theodore P. Painter, the younger partner, was unacquainted with bookkeeping, and had nothing to do therewith, except to see that some entries were made, affecting his interest, under the supervision and with the consent of Jerome B. Painter. Clearly, if any account were to be made of cash shortage occurring under the management of Jerome B. Painter, the whole should be charged to him, instead of crediting him with one-half thereof. But, in view of the presumption against fraud on his part, the proper conclusion is that all apparent shortage in the cash account during his lifetime should be disregarded, and not treated as assets of the firm. The same bookkeeper was employed both by the old and new firm, and, for his loose habits and negligence, Jerome B. Painter was at least in pari delicto with his younger brothers, who were less experienced in bookkeeping, and less familiar with Darbey's methods. Hottel v. Mason, 16 Colo. 43, 26 Pac. 335; Barrett v. Kling (City Ct. Brook.) 16 N. Y. Supp. 92. But, as respects the apparent cash shortage in the accounts of the new firm of Painter & Co. since the death of Jerome B. Painter, if regarded at all, it should be considered as a matter to be adjudged between the members of the new firm, consisting of Theodore P. Painter and J. Milton Painter, and having occurred solely on account of that portion of new business in which the new firm alone is entitled to share. It is evident that all sales of merchandise belonging to the old firm are sufficiently distinguished by the entries in the sales book to disclose what portion of the cash was received from those sales; and for all of that portion the new firm will be accountable to the old firm, regardless of any cash shortage in their general cash account. The same is true of all debts collected on account of the old firm, which must be accounted for in full. But in so far as the estate of Jerome B. Painter may be shown, upon a new accounting, to be entitled to share in the profits of the new business, on the ground of the employment of its assets therein, the apparent cash shortage should be disregarded, for reasons heretofore stated.

10. Appellants claim that an erroneous credit was allowed Jerome B. Painter on account of the purchase of school lands, which the court finds to be the property of the firm, but which appellants claim were purchased by Jerome B. Painter on his own private account. The proof that he did purchase these lands on his private account is conclusive, unless it can be held to be overcome by an entry which stood upon the firm books for a long time prior to the death of Jerome B. Painter. The written contract for the purchase of these lands was made with B. F. Mauldin by Jerome B. Painter individually; and the account of the purchases was kept in his private cash book, and never at any time entered to his credit on the journal or ledger, as payments made by him on account of the firm. They were afterwards entered upon the ledger simply as a "Land Account," containing a memorandum of the moneys paid, and interest thereon, but not describing any lands whatever. Theodore P. Painter, who was not accustomed to inspect the books as a whole, did not discover this ledger entry until long after it had been made, but, as soon as he did discover it, protested against it. He testifies to a conversation then had with the respondent Dallam, in which he complained of the entry, and denied that the firm had anything to do with those school lands, and that Dallam then advised him to complain to Jerome, and, if he would not correct the matter, to bring suit. This conversation is not denied by Dallam. Theodore testified that he then had a personal interview with Jerome, and complained of the ledger entry, and wanted it changed, reminding Jerome that he (Theodore) had refused to enter into the purchase of the school lands, to which Jerome replied: "O, well, that is all right. I just entered it there for the time being." He further testifies that: "No reference was made to the school lands after the conversation I just spoke of. That gave me to understand that they were not intended for the company. He said the equivalent of that." It appears that Theodore P. Painter has uniformly denied that the firm was interested in the purchase of these school lands, and that the respondents, as coexecutors of the will of Jerome B. Painter, treated the school lands as his individual property after his death. In view of the whole evidence upon the subject of the purchase of these school lands, and especially in view of the fact that Jerome B. Painter never demanded or received a credit upon his account with the firm on account of the cash paid for them, the finding that these lands were the property of the firm of Painter & Co., and that Jerome B. Painter should be credited with their price in the accounting, is against the evidence. There is nothing but this ledger entry, against Theodore's protests, to connect the firm, in any manner, with the contract of purchase. The lands were paid for out of the private funds of Jerome, and were taken in his name; and there is no pretense that the original investment was on account of any business in which the firm had an interest, or was agreed upon, in its inception, by both partners. In this respect there is an essential difference between the purchase of the school lands in the name of Jerome, and the taking of the Vandall lands in the name of Theodore, on account of a firm transaction, at the suggestion of Jerome, for which Theodore received a credit upon the journal in 1882, with Jerome's consent, and by his order to the bookkeeper. On no tenable ground, so far as appears from the evidence, can the investment made by Jerome in these school lands be held to have been the original purchase of property by him on account of the firm, and on no principle of justice can Theodore be compelled to take or pay for one-half of these school lands. In view of the protest made by Theodore, he cannot be held estopped by the entry of the so-called "land account" upon the ledger of the firm.

11. Appellants have printed in the transcript the original order appointing the receiver, with the affidavit upon which the same was based, and also an order refusing to discharge the receiver, with the affidavit and counter affidavits used thereupon; but there is no appeal from either of these orders, and the affidavits are not made part of the record by any bill of exceptions, and therefore the correctness of these rulings cannot be reviewed upon this appeal. But the court has incorporated in its findings a fact, presumably based upon the evidence in the record, "that there was at the commencement of this suit, and ever since has been, and still is, great and imminent danger that the interest of J. B. Painter, and of his heirs and devisees, in the property of said firm would be entirely lost, and that the appointment of a receiver herein heretofore, and at the commencement of this action, made by the court, was and is proper, necessary, and warranted in the premises." This finding is not sustained by the evidence adduced upon the trial of the cause; and the further finding that, "since the death of said Jerome B. Painter, said surviving partner has so managed the business that he has, in large degree, lost the good will thereof, and has virtually wrecked the said business," has no evidence to sustain it. The ex parte showing made at the appointment of the receiver may have been sufficient, prima facie, to justify the order; but the whole of the evidence adduced at the trial shows that the appointment of the receiver was in fact unjustifiable, or at least that his appointment should not have been continued after the trial. The rule is well settled that the surviving partner being the one in whom the deceased himself reposed confidence, and being in law entitled to the possession and control of the firm assets, control should not be wrested from him, by the appointment of a receiver, without a clear showing of mismanagement or improper conduct, and of the danger of ultimate loss to the estate of the deceased partner. Walker v. House, 4 Md. Ch. 39-44; High, Rec. § 497; Bates, Partn. §§ 993, 999; 17 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 115. In view of all the evidence adduced at the trial, the receiver should have been discharged by the court. I think the judgment and the order denying a new trial should be reversed, and a new trial granted, to be conducted in accordance with the principles stated in this opinion.

We concur: SEARLS, C.; BELCHER, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, it is ordered that the order denying a new trial be reversed, and a new trial granted, to be conducted in accordance with the principles stated in this opinion.

REID v. ROBRECHT. (No. 15,314.)

BANKRUPTCY—SALE OF ASSETS—NOTICE—QUIETING TITLE.

1. Under 18 Stat. p. 178, § 4, providing that all sales of property of a bankrupt shall be at public auction (unless otherwise ordered by the court), after notice of time and place of sale, a private sale of land by an assignee, without notice, and not ordered by the court, is void.

2. In an action to quiet title, the testimony of one that plaintiff placed the property in charge of his firm six days prior to the suit, to rent and collect the rents for him, and that thereafter his firm paid plaintiff some money received from the rent, is insufficient to support a finding that plaintiff was in possession.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; Walter H. Levy, Judge.

Action by George W. Reid against Anton Robrecht. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed.

Edward R. Taylor, for appellant. Schrivner & Schell and Horace Hawes, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. Action to quiet title to certain property in San Francisco. The plaintiff had judgment, and the defendant appeals therefrom, and from an order denying a new trial.

In 1874 one P. F. Cusick became the owner of and invested with the legal title to, the property in question. Prior to July 30, 1878, Cusick and his wife filed a declaration of homestead upon said property, and on July 30th he went into bankruptcy, and on August 12th was adjudged a bankrupt, and an assignee was appointed, to whom the register executed an assignment of the bankrupt's effects on September 2, 1878. This assignment was not recorded in the recorder's office of the city and county within six months, as required by the bankrupt act, nor until April 23, 1885, nor in the office of the clerk of the district court until April 22, 1885. On the 6th of April, 1885, the assignee, in consideration of the sum of $50, conveyed the premises in question to the plaintiff, which conveyance was recorded April 23, 1885. Defendant's answer denied plaintiff's ownership and possession, and alleged that in 1881 Cusick and wife executed a mortgage to him upon the same premises to secure their joint and several promissory note for $5,100, that the mortgage was duly recorded the same day; that in March, 1885, he obtained a decree of foreclosure of said mortgage, and that at the sale of the premises under said decree he became the purchaser, and, no redemption having been made, in due time received a deed from the sheriff therefor, and that notice of the pendency of the action was duly recorded June 30, 1884, at the time the action was commenced. Upon the trial the plaintiff put in evidence the title of Cusick, and the proceedings in bankruptcy down to and including the assignment by the register to the assignee, and then offered in evidence the deed from the assignee to the plaintiff, to the admission of which defendant objected. It was not shown by recitals in the deed, or otherwise, that the assignee had any authority to make the sale or conveyance. The act of June 22, 1874 (18 Stat. p. 178, § 4), provided that all sales of the property of a bankrupt shall be at public auction (unless otherwise ordered by the court), after three weeks' notice of the time and place of sale, given in such paper as should be determined by the judge to be best calculated to give general notice of the sale. No order was made by the judge directing a sale, nor designating the paper in which notice of the sale should be given, nor was any notice of the sale shown to have been given. When a sale is made under a power given by statute, all the requirements of such statute, so far as they are conditions precedent to the operation of the power to vest the estate, must appear to have been complied with. A sale, therefore, by the assignee of the bankrupt at private sale and without notice is absolutely void. The deed offered in evidence did not recite the performance of any of the acts required by the statute to precede the sale, nor were such facts otherwise shown, or offered to be shown. Plaintiff, therefore, acquired no title to the premises by the deed, and the court erred in receiving it in evidence.

The plaintiff called as a witness Mr. Bovee, who testified that he was a member of the firm of Bovee, Toy & Co., real-estate agents; that on the 1st day of July, 1885, the plaintiff came to them, and put the property in their charge, to let the premises and collect the rents, and that rents were collected and paid over to plaintiff. Upon cross-examination, the witness admitted that he had no personal knowledge that the premises were leased by them to the tenants, nor that the tenants paid the rent, but was so informed by the collector and bookkeeper, and that he had seen accounts and checks to the effect that it had been paid to plaintiff; that he did not know any of the tenants personally, nor had he any personal interview with them that he knew of. Upon objection being made by counsel for defendant, the court said: "I think they are entitled to this much of the testimony to remain in the record anyway: that is, to the effect that Mr. Reid went to the firm of Bovee, Toy & Co. for the purpose of getting them to lease or rent this property for him, and Bovee, Toy & Co. paid him the rent for it. I think that is sufficiently shown as the knowledge of the witness. I shall allow that portion I have stated to remain. The other portion in relation to the tenants being there I shall order stricken out." Plaintiff thereupon rested, and defendant moved for a nonsuit which was denied. The defendant introduced evidence tending to support his answer, and the court found all the issues in favor of the plaintiff, and it is assigned as error that the evidence does not support the findings. The finding that, at the commencement of the action, the plaintiff was the owner and in possession of the premises in controversy cannot be sustained. The sale and conveyance under which the plaintiff claims is, as we have seen, absolutely void. He could not, therefore, recover upon the strength of his title alone, though under the statute he might do so, if his title were good, even if he were not in possession. He contends, however, that he is in possession, and that possession is sufficient evidence of title to enable him to maintain this action against the defendant who has no title. Whether possession of lands the title to which has passed from the government, and become vested in a private owner, is sufficient to authorize such possessor to maintain an action to quiet title, where such possession has not by its character and lapse of time created a title in the possessor, need not be considered, as no possession was shown in the plaintiff at the commencement of this action. The complaint was filed July 7, 1885, six days after the plaintiff went to Bovee, Toy & Co. and requested them to rent the property and collect the rents for him. The testimony of Mr. Bovee simply shows that, at some time thereafter, money was paid over to the plaintiff as moneys received from rents of the property, but when such payments were made does not appear. Conceding all that may be properly claimed from this testimony, it only shows that, six days prior to the commencement of the action, the plaintiff claimed ownership of the property, and a consequent right to rent it, and does not show possession. The finding of title and possession in the plaintiff is therefore not sustained by the evidence. Judgment and order reversed.

HARRISON, J., being disqualified, did not participate.

STEELE et al. v. MARSICANO. (No. 15,425.)

ACTION FOR CONVERSION—EVIDENCE.

A broker, having arranged with defendant's fruit-packing company, without his knowledge, to store with it a quantity of sugar, purchased the sugar from plaintiffs, in defendant's name, and had it sent to the packing establishment, the drayman taking a receipt in the name of defendant's company. Defendant, on learning that the sugar was on the premises, had the broker remove it, and, on receiving a bill for it, notified plaintiffs that he did not make the purchase. Held, that defendant was not liable as for conversion of the sugar.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; John F. Finn, Judge.

Action by one Steele and others against one Marsicano for conversion of sugar. Judgment for plaintiffs and defendant appeals. Reversed.

John J. Roache, for appellant. Garber, Boalt & Bishop, for respondents.

HARRISON, J. The defendant carries on the business of packing fruit at a warehouse on Battery street, in San Francisco, under the name of Overland Packing Company, and is also the president of the American Salt Company, and has his office or headquarters at the office of that corporation, on Sacramento street, in that city. On March 19, 1892, a man named Laton visited the office of the salt company, and inquired for the defendant, saying that he wished to store some sugar with him at his place on Sacramento street. The defendant was absent from San Francisco, and the clerk in charge told him that they had no room; and, on his inquiring whether he could store it with the Overland Packing Company for a few days, the clerk, at his request, knowing that he was acquainted with defendant, telephoned the inquiry to that place, and received an affirmative reply. Laton then visited the Overland Packing Company's place, and, upon seeing where the sugar was to be stored, said he would send it up. He then went to the office of the plaintiffs, representing himself to be a broker for the defendant, and negotiated the purchase in his name of 21 tons of sugar, and directed that it be delivered to the Overland Packing Company. The plaintiffs employed their own drayman for that purpose, and when he reached the packing company's place, on Battery street, the foreman of that place, and one of his men, took it on the trucks and ran it into the building; and a receipt for its delivery was given to the drayman, in the name of the Overland Packing Company. The sugar was delivered on the 22d of March, but the defendant did not learn of its delivery until two days thereafter, when he immediately directed his foreman to tell Laton to take the sugar away, which he did, and Laton removed the sugar the next day. On the Monday following, which was collection day, the defendant received from the plaintiffs a statement of his account or purchase of the sugar, and immediately visited the office of the plaintiffs, and denied having made such purchase. The record does not show whether the plaintiffs made any explanation of the transaction with Laton, or what steps they took to investigate the transaction; but they seem to have become satisfied that the purchase of the sugar had not been authorized by the defendant, as, instead of bringing an action against the defendant for its value, they made a formal demand upon him, about two weeks later, for its redelivery, and then brought this action, charging him with the conversion of the sugar. Judgment was rendered in the court below in favor of the plaintiffs, and the defendant has appealed.

In order to charge the defendant with the conversion of the plaintiffs' goods, he must be shown to have done some act implying the exercise or assumption of title, or of a dominion over the goods, or some act inconsistent with the plaintiffs' right of ownership, or in repudiation of such right. A simple act of intermeddling with another's property, which does not imply any assertion of title or dominion over the property, and which is done in ignorance of the owner's claim thereto, and without any intention to deprive him of it, will not constitute a conversion. If I find a horse in my lot, I am not guilty of its conversion if I turn it into the highway. Nor is the warehouseman, who receives goods from a wrongdoer, and afterwards redelivers them to him, in ignorance of the claim of another, guilty of their conversion. Conversion is a tort, and, to establish it, there must be a tortious act. "If a bailee have the temporary possession of property, holding the same as the property of the bailor, and asserting no title in himself, and in good faith, in fulfillment of the terms of the bailment, either as expressed by the parties or implied by law, restores the property to the bailor before he is notified that the true owner will look to him for it, no action will lie against him, for he has only done what was his duty." Nelson v. Iverson, 17 Ala. 216. See, also, Burditt v. Hunt, 25 Me. 422. In Parker v. Lomard, 100 Mass. 408, where the defendant took possession of a warehouse in which there was certain cotton belonging to the plaintiff, but which the defendant, upon information to that effect received from his predecessor, entered upon his books as belonging to another, to whom he subsequently delivered it, it was held that he was not liable for its conversion. In Hill v. Hayes, 38 Conn. 532, some stolen money had been delivered to the defendant by the thief, to be kept for him. The defendant had no knowledge that the money had been stolen, and in a few days gave it to a third party, to be redelivered to her bailor; but it was held that she was not guilty of conversion. See, also, Frome v. Dennis, 45 N. J. Law, 515; Loring v. Mulcahy, 3 Allen, 575; Gurley v. Armstead, 148 Mass. 267, 19 N. E. 389. A demand of the property, and a refusal to redeliver it, do not, of themselves, constitute conversion. They are merely evidence from which a conversion may be established, and, as evidence, may be repelled by proof that a compliance was impossible. Hill v. Covell, 1 N. Y. 522. A refusal is not evidence of conversion, unless the party had it in his power at the time to deliver up the goods. Kelsey v. Griswold, 6 Barb. 436. In order to establish the conversion by mere proof of the demand and refusal, the plaintiff must also show the ability of the defendant to comply with the demand at the time it is made. Whitney v. Slauson, 30 Barb. 276; Johnson v. Couillard, 4 Allen, 446.

Under these principles the judgment against the defendant cannot be sustained. As Laton had no authority to negotiate a purchase of the sugar for the defendant, the plaintiffs do not rely upon his pretended agency, but seek to charge the defendant with its conversion by reason of the acts done by himself; claiming that the delivery of the sugar to the defendant, and his subsequent refusal to redeliver it upon their demand, constitute such conversion. But the delivery of the sugar to the defendant was not the result of any act or authority on his part. It was delivered there at the instance of Laton, and must be considered as a delivery to Laton. As Laton had no authority to bind the defendant, his direction to the plaintiffs to deliver the sugar at the defendant's place of business, and their delivery in pursuance thereof, cannot create any obligations against the defendant in reference to the sugar. The taking of a receipt in the name of the Overland Packing Company is immaterial. It did not establish any relation of contract between the plaintiffs and the defendant; for it was shown by the plaintiffs that this delivery was made at the instance of Laton, and there was nothing in the receipt which indicated that the delivery was made in pursuance of a purchase on behalf of the defendant. The receipt was only a voucher to Laton that the plaintiffs had followed his direction, and had the same effect as though the sugar had been placed on board a vessel for transportation, or in some other warehouse, for which a drayman's receipt was given. It could not place the defendant under any obligation to the plaintiffs, for at the time of its delivery there was no statement on the part of the plaintiffs of the purpose with which it was brought to his place, and the defendant was justified in supposing that it was the sugar which Laton had requested might be placed there for a few days. The defendant must be considered as having received the sugar from Laton, and as his bailee. Before the defendant had any knowledge of the relation of the plaintiffs to the sugar, Laton had removed it from the defendant's packing house, at the direction of the defendant. This direction, and the removal, instead of being the exercise of any dominion or control over the sugar by the defendant, was for the purpose of avoiding its control, and freeing himself from any connection with it. It was restoring the sugar into the hands and under the control of the party by whom it had been placed upon his property, and was the reverse of assuming any dominion or claim to it. When, subsequently, the defendant visited the plaintiffs' place of business, in response to the bill for the sugar which they had sent him, and disclaimed the purchase, the plaintiffs do not seem to have acquainted him with the facts of the transaction, and did not question his declaration that he had not made the purchase until some two weeks later, when they made a formal demand for its redelivery. As, at this time, it was not in his power to comply with the demand, his refusal did not constitute a conversion; and as none of the previous acts done by him with reference to the sugar had been in the assertion of any dominion over it, or with any knowledge of the plaintiffs' rights, or from which any repudiation of their rights could be implied, he cannot be charged with the conversion. The judgment and order are reversed.

BUTLER v. ASHWORTH et al. (No. 15,396.)

MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS—LIABILITY OF OFFICERS—NEGLIGENCE.

1. The superintendent of streets of a city is liable for any damages resulting from his negligence in repairing a sewer, notwithstanding his official capacity.

2. If the cost of making the repairs of a sewer exceeded $100, the superintendent of streets had no jurisdiction to do the work (St. 1877–78, p. 544), and would be liable for damages unless he did it skillfully and diligently.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; Charles W. Slack, Judge.

Action by Butler against Ashworth and another for damages for negligence in repairing a sewer. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Geo. B. Merrill, for appellants. Humphrey & Welch (W. C. Burnett and L. G. Burnett, of counsel), for respondent.

HARRISON, J. The plaintiff brought this action against the defendants to recover damages caused by them in repairing a sewer in Tenth street. The defendant Ashworth was superintendent of public streets and highways in San Francisco, and his codefendant was his deputy, under whose direction the work was done. The complaint alleges that in January, 1888, a break occurred in the sewer in Tenth street, near Bryant, and that the defendants undertook to repair it, and did the work in such a negligent and unskillful manner as to prevent the flow of sewage through the sewer, and cause it to flow back, and be discharged into her house through a private sewer connecting her house with the public sewer, from which she suffered the damage complained of. The defendants, in their answer, denied that the damage sustained by the plaintiff was caused by any of their acts, and alleged that the acts done by them were done in their official capacity; and that they performed said work of repairing the sewer in a skillful and workmanlike manner. The jury rendered a verdict in favor of the plaintiff for the sum of $800, and from the judgment entered thereon, and an order denying a new trial, the defendants have appealed.

Upon the issue whether the damage sustained by the plaintiff was caused by the acts of the defendants, the evidence before the jury was conflicting, and their verdict in her favor must be accepted as determinative of that question. There was also a great deal of evidence presented to the jury by both parties for the purpose of showing the manner in which the work of repairing the sewer was done by the defendants, and from the character of this evidence we cannot say that the jury was not justified in finding that the work was done in an unskillful and unworkmanlike manner. The jury were instructed by the court that, if they were satisfied from a preponderance of the evidence in the case that the defendants performed their duty in a negligent and unskillful or unworkmanlike manner, and that the injuries sustained by the plaintiff were directly caused by such negligence, she was entitled to recover, but that, if they were not satisfied that the defendants performed said work in a negligent or unskillful manner, or that, if they did so perform the work, the injuries alleged were not directly or proximately caused thereby, she was not entitled to recover. The denial of a new trial shows that in the opinion of the judge, who heard the evidence and saw the witnesses, the verdict of the jury was correct, and we are not at liberty to disturb this conclusion.

The court instructed the jury that, although it was the duty of the superintendent of streets to attend to the repairing of sewers, yet, if he undertook to make any such repairs, he must do it in a careful and skillful manner, and would be liable for any damages resulting from his negligence in making such repairs; that his claim to have done such work in his official capacity would not relieve him from responsibility for such damage if he did the work in an unskillful or negligent manner. The jury were further instructed that, if the cost of making the repairs exceeded $100, the superintendent had no jurisdiction to do the work, and that the defendants would be liable for the damage sustained by the plaintiff, unless, after they undertook to repair the sewer, they worked skillfully and diligently. The effect of this latter instruction was to place the acts of the superintendent in making the repairs on the same footing, in the contingency supposed, as any other person making the repairs. The instruction was given in view of the act of March 27, 1878 (St. 1877–78, p. 544), by which the superintendent is given authority, in cases of urgent necessity, to repair any of the public streets or sewers, either by contract or otherwise, provided that the repairs between two main streets shall not exceed $100. In the absence of this statute the superintendent would have no authority to make the repairs, and, if he would justify his acts, he must bring himself within the terms by which the authority is given. The instruction itself is in harmony with those previously given, in which the rights and liabilities of the superintendent are defined, as the jury were merely told by this the conditions under which the defendants could invoke their claim to protection by reason of their official character. The objection that there was no evidence by which the jury could determine whether the cost of the repairs exceeded $100 is unavailing. There was abundant evidence before the jury of the amount of labor required in making the repairs, and it was not necessary that there should be any evidence of the exact amount paid for that labor. The jury could determine from their own experience whether it would exceed $100 or not. Cederberg v. Robison, 100 Cal. 93, 34 Pac. 625. We find no error in the record, and the judgment and order denying a new trial are affirmed.

REDMOND v. PETERSON et al. (No. 15,461.)

ACTIONS AGAINST INSANE PERSONS—APPEARANCE BY GUARDIAN—PLEADING—AMENDMENT.

1. A judgment against an incompetent person, rendered in an action wherein his general guardian appeared for him, is binding, though no summons was served upon such incompetent.

2. Where one appears and answers an amended complaint, he is bound by the judgment thereon, though such amended complaint was filed without leave.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Alameda county; John Ellsworth, Judge.

Action by James Redmond against Hannah J. Peterson and others to foreclose a mortgage. From a judgment for plaintiff and a cross complainant, and an order denying a new trial, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Edward A. Holman and Fred V. Wood, for appellants. M. C. Barney, R. E. Ragland, Shadburne & Herrin, Chas. J. Heggerty, and Wm. M. Madden, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. Appeal from a judgment against said incompetent, Hannah J. Peterson, in favor of the plaintiff, and from a judgment in favor of the defendant Liberty S. Henderyckx, as executor of R. S. Henderyckx, upon his cross complaint, against said Peterson, and also from an order denying the motion of said Peterson, by her guardian, to set aside said judgments. The action was brought by the plaintiff to foreclose a mortgage executed by R. S. Henderyckx (since deceased) to Hannah J. Peterson, to secure a promissory note made by the mortgagor to the mortgagee, and which note and mortgage were afterwards assigned to the plaintiff. Afterwards said Peterson purchased the mortgaged premises from Henderyckx, and executed a mortgage thereon to him to secure a part of the purchase money. After these transactions, and prior to the commencement of this suit, defendant Peterson was adjudged, by the superior court, "to be a person of unsound mind and an incompetent," and the defendant Gottshall was appointed the guardian of her person and estate. This action was brought by the plaintiff against "Louis Gottshall, guardian of the estate and person of Hannah J. Peterson, an incompetent, and Liberty S. Henderyckx, executor of the estate of R. S. Henderyckx, deceased," said Peterson not being made a party. Gottshall demurred, upon the ground that the complaint did not state a cause of action against him as guardian. Thereupon, without any ruling upon the demurrer or order of court bringing in a new party, the plaintiff amended his complaint, and made the incompetent a party. To this complaint Gottshall and Peterson filed a general demurrer, which was overruled by the court, and said defendants answered. The executor of Henderyckx answered, and also filed a cross complaint against Peterson to foreclose the junior mortgage, and Gottshall and Peterson answered the cross complaint. Findings and judgment went against Peterson both upon the complaint and cross complaint, the judgment being entered May 26, 1892.

On May 22, 1893, pursuant to notice previously given, the attorney for Gottshall and Peterson moved the court to set aside the said judgment, upon the following grounds: "(1) That said purported amended complaint was filed herein without the leave or order of this court; (2) that said purported amended complaint does not constitute an amended complaint in this action; (3) that said Hannah J. Peterson, an incompetent, was never made a party to this action by any order of this court or otherwise; and (4) that said purported amended complaint does not constitute a cause of action as to said Hannah J. Peterson, an incompetent." This motion was overruled, and a bill of exceptions taken, in which the grounds of the motion above recited are set out, and the statement is also made that, "in support of said motion, said defendant introduced in evidence the papers, files, records, and proceedings in this action," and an affidavit that no order was made or entered permitting the plaintiff to file an amended complaint, or to make said Peterson a party, and that said amended complaint was filed and said Peterson made a party without any order or leave of the court. Said motion was denied. None of the "papers, files, records, and proceedings" in the action are set out in the bill of exceptions, and no other evidence for or against the motion was given except the affidavit above mentioned. Neither the findings nor the judgment recite or allude to the service of process upon any of the defendants, but both state that the defendants appeared by their respective attorneys, naming the attorneys of each. That no cause of action existed against the guardian, from whom alone a recovery was sought in the original complaint, there is no question whatever. He was neither a necessary nor a proper party to the action. In Emeric v. Alvarado, 64 Cal. 593, 2 Pac. 418, in speaking of infants, the court said: "The guardian is to appear for them, and is no more a party to the action than the attorney who appears in an action for one who has attained his majority is a party to the suit in which he enters his appearance." That no order was made permitting or directing a new party to be brought in, and the complaint amended by adding the sole party liable, is sufficiently clear upon the record. Nor does it appear from the record that any process was served upon the incompetent, either before or after the amended complaint was filed, but it does appear that Peterson, the incompetent person, appeared by attorney, and jointly with her guardian filed an answer to the amended complaint.

Under the foregoing facts, the question is, did the court have jurisdiction over the defendant Peterson, who was alleged in the complaint and found by the court to have been "a person of unsound mind and incompetent"? And the solution of this question depends solely upon the fact as to whether or not a general guardian of an incompetent or infant defendant has the power to appear in an action without service of summons upon the ward. It has been held by this court in several cases that the appointment and appearance of guardians ad litem, without a personal service of summons upon the incompetent, was void. Gray v. Palmer, 9 Cal. 638; Johnston v. Savings Union, 63 Cal. 554; McCloskey v. Sweeney, 66 Cal. 53, 4 Pac. 943. It is very apparent in these cases that such of necessity must be the law, for the court has no authority to appoint a guardian ad litem until the personal service upon the infant or incompetent has first been made. But the rule in this state as to general guardians is not in line with the foregoing cases. In Smith v. McDonald, 42 Cal. 484, it is declared a rule of property that a general guardian has the power to waive a personal service upon the ward in the following explicit terms: "Under such circumstances, it has risen to the importance of a rule of property, and even though it were conclusively shown to have been, as an exposition of the statute it attempted to construe, incorrect at the outset, I think it nevertheless our duty to maintain it now, and not permit it to be disturbed. If its operation for eight years in practice has shown it to have unnecessarily facilitated the despoliation of the estate of infants, it certainly is not for us to abrogate it for such a reason." The doctrine here enunciated has been followed in various cases since that time; and if, when Smith v. McDonald was decided, the principle had then become a rule of property, it is certainly impregnable to attack at the present day. Its overthrow would result in disaster and ruin to many innocent holders of real estate who have purchased upon their counsel's advice that such was the law. Having arrived at the foregoing conclusion, the case presents itself exactly as though a party were here attacking a judgment rendered against him by a court having jurisdiction of the subject-matter of the action, where he had voluntarily appeared, filed an answer to the merits of the complaint, and gone to trial upon the issues made by his pleading. We do not see how the fact that he was brought into the action by an amended complaint, rather than by the original, is now material; nor is it material that the first defendant sued was wrongly sued, and that he (the incompetent) alone was the only proper party to the action. It is sufficient to say to all his present complaints in this direction that he voluntarily came into court, and submitted himself to its jurisdiction for all purposes. A judgment rendered against him under these circumstances is beyond all doubt binding, and in full force and effect, as far as any question of personal jurisdiction is concerned. The judgments and order appealed from are affirmed.

NICHOL v. LAUMEISTER. (No. 15,370.)

INSTRUCTIONS—BURDEN OF PROOF—EVIDENCE.

1. A verdict based on conflicting evidence will not be disturbed on appeal.

2. In an action against a sheriff for the wrongful taking of property under execution, an instruction, concerning the burden of proof, that plaintiff must prove the affirmative issues tendered by his complaint by a preponderance of evidence, is sufficient when no further instruction is requested.

3. The refusal of a request to instruct is not error where the court of its own motion gives an instruction fully covering the one requested.

4. The admission of a writ of attachment, and the sheriff's return thereon, in a certain case between plaintiff and his vendor, and a memorandum furnished by the garnishee, are admissible in connection with a cross-examination of such garnishee when they tend to contradict statements made by him on direct examination.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; A. A. Sanderson, Judge.

Action by Frederick D. Nichol against Charles S. Laumeister. From a judgment for defendant, and an order denying a motion for a new trial, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Wal. J. Tuska and R. H. Taylor, for appellant. Dorn & Dorn (E. S. Heller and Geo. T. Wright, of counsel), for respondent.

BELCHER, C. This is an action to recover damages for the conversion of certain personal property, constituting the stock and fixtures of a restaurant in the city of San Francisco. At the time of the alleged conversion, defendant was the sheriff of the city and county of San Francisco, and took the said property under a writ of attachment issued in an action commenced against J. P. Dockery by one of his creditors, and subsequently sold the same under a writ of execution. The plaintiff claimed ownership of the property under and by virtue of a bill of sale thereof made to him by J. P. Dockery, the then owner, on September 14, 1890, and certain acts of possession thereafter; and the defendant justified the taking upon the ground that the sale was void as to the attaching creditor, because (1) the bill of sale was made by Dockery and accepted by the plaintiff with intent to hinder, delay, and defraud his (Dockery's) creditors; and (2) the transfer was not accompanied by such an immediate delivery and followed by such actual and continued change of possession as were required by law. The case was tried before a jury, and the verdict and judgment were in favor of defendant. The plaintiff moved for a new trial, which was denied, and has appealed from the judgment and order denying his motion.

1. The point that the evidence was insufficient to justify the verdict cannot be sustained. It would subserve no useful purpose to state the facts, but, in our opinion, the evidence on the part of the defendant was amply sufficient to show that the transfer was made with intent to hinder, delay, and defraud the creditors of Dockery, and was at the time known to be so made by both of the parties to the transaction, and also that the transfer was not accompanied by a sufficient change of possession. It is true there was a sharp conflict in the evidence in regard to this matter, and, as the court remarked, there were "undoubtedly some unblushing falsehoods uttered on the stand here on the part of either the witnesses for the plaintiff or for the defendant." But the question as to which witnesses told the truth was for the jury, and its determination of the question cannot be disturbed on appeal.

2. We see no material error in the rulings upon the admission of evidence. The writ of attachment in the case of Nichol v. Dockery and the sheriff's return thereon, with the memorandum furnished by Strause, gar-nishee, were properly admitted in evidence in connection with Strause's cross-examination. They tended to show that some of the statements made by the witness on his direct examination were not true. The other papers in the case were irrelevant, and were properly excluded.

3. The instructions given to the jury as to the burden of proof stated the law correctly, so far as they went. They were: "In civil cases, and this is a civil case, the affirmative of the issue must be proven, and, where the evidence is contradictory, the decision must be according to the preponderance of the evidence. In this case the burden of proof is upon the plaintiff, so far as the issues tendered in his complaint are concerned, and, if such issues have not been established by a preponderance of evidence, then it will be your duty to find a verdict in favor of the defendant." If the plaintiff desired further instructions as to the burden of proof upon the issues raised by the answer he should have asked for them, and, having failed to do so, he cannot now be heard to complain.

Instruction No. 2, asked by the plaintiff, was properly refused. It related to change of possession, and upon that subject the court of its own motion charged the jury fully and fairly. Instruction No. 5, asked by the plaintiff, was properly modified by the court. As modified and given, it stated the law correctly. The instructions given by the court are quite lengthy, and must be read together as a whole. When so read, they appear to cover the whole case, and to state correctly the law applicable thereto. The record discloses no ground for reversal, and the judgment and order appealed from should be affirmed.

We concur: TEMPLE, C.; HAYNES, C.

HAWLEY v. LIVERPOOL & LONDON & GLOBE INS. CO. (No. 15,448.)

FIRE INSURANCE—IMMATERIAL MISSTATEMENT BY INSURED—TITLE OF PROPERTY.

1. An insurance policy provided that, if the insured misrepresented any material fact concerning the insurance, it should be void. A former policy on the property had been canceled because the company issuing it was going out of business. Plaintiff represented that no former policy had been canceled. Held, that the misrepresentation was not material.

2. The policy also provided that it should be void unless the insured was, at the date of the policy, the owner in fee simple of the land on which the building stood. Before the policy was issued, plaintiff gave a deed of the property, as a mortgage, and the policy stated that the property was mortgaged. Held, that plaintiff was the owner in fee simple.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Humboldt county; G. W. Hunter, Judge.

Action by Nancy Hawley against the Liverpool & London & Globe Insurance Company on a fire insurance policy. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Buck & Cutler, for appellant. J. F. Coonan and Denver Sevier, for respondent.

McFARLAND, J. This is an appeal by defendant, an insurance company, from a judgment recovered by plaintiff upon a fire insurance policy made by defendant to plaintiff, and from an order denying a new trial. There are only two points made by appellant which require notice:

The policy provided that it should be void "if the insured had concealed or misrepresented, in writing or otherwise, any material fact or circumstance concerning said insurance, or the subject thereof." In the written application for the policy appear the following question and answer: "Has any company canceled or refused a policy on the property? No." This answer was not true, as another company had canceled a policy on the property, and appellant contends that the falsity of the answer vitiated the policy. The application was made by an agent of respondent, who testified that the question was never asked him, nor answered by him, and that he knew of the cancellation of a certain policy, and would have told of it if he had been asked. But, waiving that matter, the fact was that the canceled policy was one issued and canceled by the Alta Fire Insurance Company, and that "the reason of the policy being canceled was that the Alta Fire Insurance Company was retiring from business, and they wished to clear up everything." The cancellation of the Alta policy, therefore, was for no reason that could have influenced the appellant in granting or refusing the policy sued on, and the alleged misrepresentation was in no sense material.

It is also contended that the plaintiff was not, at the time of the issuance of the policy, the owner of the land on which the insured buildings stood, and that, therefore, she cannot recover, because the policy provides that it shall be void if the interest of the insured in the property was other than that of sole and unconditional ownership, and "if the subject of insurance be a building on ground not owned by the insured in fee simple." We do not think the position tenable. The facts on this point are that, for many years prior to the issuance of the policy, respondent had been the owner in fee and in possession of the land; that she was then in possession of it; and that she was then also the owner in fee, unless a change in the title had been effected by certain transactions which she had with one T. Needs about a year before the making of the policy. Needs had held mortgages on the land executed by respondent, and, as they were about to outlaw he had brought a suit to foreclose them. The suit was brought because the time to sue was about to expire, and because, as Needs testified, "it was in the winter time, and we could not get any letters to her," and not because he wanted to harass respondent. He said, "It had been a hard winter, and I didn't want to take the property away from the lady." Afterwards, on October 11, 1890, the suit was withdrawn, and the mortgages canceled; and respondent executed a deed to Needs, which, upon its face, purported to convey to him an absolute title to the land. But it is clear that this deed was intended as a mortgage to secure the debt that had been secured by the former mortgages, and the jury was warranted in so finding. The only possible objection to such a finding lies in the fact that, on the day the deed was executed, Needs gave to respondent a writing which was, in form, an agreement to convey the land to respondent upon the payment to him within a year of a certain sum of money that was the amount of the debt which she owed him and interest. It is contended that this writing absolutely precluded the jury from finding that the title to the land did not pass from respondent to Needs, no matter what the other evidence upon the subject was. But we do not think so. The question is, was the deed from respondent to Needs intended by the parties thereto to be a mortgage? Upon this question, parol evidence was admissible; and such evidence, introduced at the trial, abundantly shows that such was the intention of the parties. And, this being so, the mere form in which the instrument acknowledging that intention was put is not controlling, and appellant was not deceived in the matter. In the application for the policy appears the following: "Is property incumbered by mortgage or otherwise? (Answer) Yes." It was thus put upon inquiry as to the nature, amount, and form of the mortgage. The policy was issued on September 11, 1891; and the condition of the title was then just the same as it had been since the date of the said deed, and continued to be the same until the time of the fire. The authorities cited by counsel to the effect that there must be an indebtedness to constitute a mortgage are not in point, for there was here sufficient evidence to warrant the jury in finding that there was an indebtedness. McCormick v. Springfield, etc., Ins. Co., 66 Cal. 361, and McCormick v. Orient Ins. Co., 86 Cal. 260, 24 Pac. 1003, are not in point. In those cases the insured represented themselves as the owners of certain manilla paper, which was the subject of the policy, when they were not such owners, but merely held stock in a corporation which did own it, and were engaged in selling the paper on commission; and the policy provided that the insured should be the sole and unconditional owners, or that their interest in the property should be truly stated. Other specific points made by appellant are involved in the above propositions, and they need not be specially noticed. We see no error for which the judgment should be reversed. Judgment and order affirmed.

PEOPLE v. HOLLADAY et al. (No. 15,379.)

ADVERSE POSSESSION—LAND DEDICATED TO PUBLIC USE—RES JUDICATA—ACTION ON BEHALF OF STATE.

1. Act Cong. July 1, 1864 (13 Stat. 332), grants to the municipality of San Francisco all the rights and title of the United States in a certain public square known as "Lafayette Park," within the city limits as fixed by act of the legislature of 1851, "for the uses specified in the ordinance of said city, ratified by an act of the legislature" approved March 11, 1858. The ordinance referred to was passed in 1855, and provided for the location of Lafayette park. Defendant was in actual possession of the land in question, January 1, 1855, and so continued till after March 11, 1858. Held, that the land having been dedicated to the public by the act of the legislature of 1858, which dedication was confirmed by the act of congress of 1864, making it operative on the legal title in the government as well as on such title as the city held prior thereto, the defendant never acquired any title by possession. 29 Pac. 54, affirmed.

2. The city and county of San Francisco being a municipal corporation, endowed with full power and jurisdiction over the public parks within its territory, a suit prosecuted by such city, wherein it claims legal title to land as part of a public park and as trustee of the people of the state, is a bar to any subsequent action by the people of the state for the same land. 29 Pac. 54, affirmed.

Action by the people against Holladay and others. From a judgment for defendants, and an order denying a new trial, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Atty. Gen. Hart (Craig & Meredith and William Matthews, of counsel), for the People. S. W. and E. B. Holladay and Mastick, Belcher & Mastick, for respondents.

McFARLAND, J. This is an appeal by plaintiff from a judgment in favor of defendants, and from an order denying plaintiff's motion for a new trial. The litigation is about the ownership of a piece of land in the city of San Francisco, which respondents claim to own, and which, according to appellant's contention, was dedicated to public use as a park. The litigation has been in progress, under various forms, for over 30 years, and has generally resulted favorably to respondents herein. This present case was here before on an appeal by the present respondents, and the decision on that appeal is to be found in 93 Cal. 243, 29 Pac. 54. By that decision it was definitely determined, and it has become the law of the case, that the present respondents are the owners of the undivided nineteen-twentieths of the land in contest; but an order of the lower court, granting a new trial, was affirmed because the judgment erroneously included the other twentieth, which was not involved in the action. When the remittitur went down, the defendants (respondents herein) filed a supplemental answer, which put the said one-twentieth in the same category with the other nineteen-twentieths, so that the said decision on the former appeal applied to the whole of the property. On the present appeal there are no new points made which require notice. In the opinion of the court on the former appeal, delivered by Mr. Justice De Haven, the points upon which the case turns were fully discussed, and it would be useless to restate here the views there expressed. For the reasons given in that opinion, the judgment and order must be affirmed. The judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

Ex parte ORFORD. (No. 21,131.)

Claim against Decedent's Estate — Order Directing Payment—Effect of Appeal — Bond of Administratrix.

1. The right of appeal given by Code Civ. Proc. § 963, from an order of the superior court directing the payment of a claim against an estate, is independent of the amount involved.

2. Pending an appeal from an order of the superior court directing an administratrix to pay a claim allowed by it, she is not guilty of contempt in refusing to comply with the order.

3. The official bond of an administratrix operates as an appeal bond in probate proceedings, and also stays proceedings upon the order appealed from (Code Civ. Proc. § 965), without an order of the court to that effect.

Department 2.

Application by Mary Orford for writ of habeas corpus. Writ allowed.

Thos. F. Barry, for appellant. J. B. Reinstein, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. The petitioner is administratrix of an estate in probate. As such she was ordered by the superior court, in which the administration was pending, to pay a claim allowed on account of expenses of the last illness of her intestate. From this order she took an appeal to this court. Notwithstanding her appeal, she was cited by the superior court to show cause why she should not be punished for a contempt of its authority in failing or refusing to pay said claim. After a hearing, she was found guilty of the contempt charged, and sentenced to be imprisoned until she should make the payment as directed. Upon being taken into custody, she sued out this writ to test the legality of the imprisonment.

We are of the opinion that the imprisonment is illegal. This court has appellate jurisdiction in "all such probate matters as may be provided by law." Const. art. 6, § 4. By section 963, Code Civ. Proc., an appeal may be taken from an order directing the payment of a debt or claim. The statute makes no limitation as to the amount of the debt or claim, and the fact that the claim in question here is less than $300 does not impair the right of appeal. And the failure of petitioner to file an appeal bond does not render her appeal ineffectual. Her bond as administratrix stands in place of an undertaking on appeal, not only for the purpose of perfecting the appeal, but also to stay proceedings upon the order appealed from. Code Civ. Proc., § 965; In re Sharp, 92 Cal. 579, 28 Pac. 783.

It is contended that the official bond of an administratrix does not operate as an undertaking on appeal unless an order is made pursuant to section 946, Code Civ. Proc., dispensing with other security. But section 946 applies to cases in which the executor, administrator, or guardian is party plaintiff or defendant in an action, and appeals from a judgment or order in such action; while section 965 applies to appeals from judgments and orders made in the probate proceedings. In such a case the law dispenses with an undertaking on appeal, for the reasons mentioned in the opinion of this court in Re Sharp, supra. The prisoner, having appealed and stayed all proceedings upon the order which she is charged with violating, cannot, pending her appeal, be punished for a failure to obey it. Prisoner discharged.

Modification of Decree —Application for Relief.

A decree entered in excess of a stipulation therefor, through fraud of plaintiff's attorneys, cannot be corrected after six months; Code Civ. Proc. § 473, providing that application to correct a judgment entered through inadvertence or mistake must be made within six months.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; A. A. Sanderson, Judge.

Action by the Dyerville Manufacturing Company against Martin Heller and others for an injunction. There was a decree for plaintiff upon a stipulation. Thereafter an order was entered modifying the decree, from which order plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Edmund Tauszky, for appellant. Rothchild & Ach, for respondents.

FITZGERALD, J. Appeal from an order modifying the judgment given for plaintiff in the above-entitled cause. The action was for an injunction to restrain the defendants from infringing its trade-mark, and for damages. The judgment, which was entered upon a stipulation between the parties, was filed August 7, 1891, and entered April 26, 1892. The proceedings for the modification thereof were instituted December 9, 1892, and the order granting the motion for that purpose was thereafter made, on the ground that "the decree awarded relief in excess of the stipulation and the prayer of the complaint, and had been inadvertently entered." The question to be determined on this appeal involves the power of the court to make the order.

Section 473, Code Civ. Proc., provides, among other things, that the court may, "upon such terms as may be just, relieve a party or his legal representative from a judgment, order or other proceeding taken against him through his mistake, inadvertence, surprise or excusable neglect: provided, that application therefor be made within a reasonable time, but in no case exceeding six months after such judgment, order or proceeding was taken." The grounds upon which the application was made were excusable neglect and fraud practiced upon the court by plaintiff's former counsel by procuring the judgment to be given in excess of the stipulation. The grounds upon which the modification was made by the court were that the judgment exceeded the stipulation, and that it had been "inadvertently entered." Under the provisions of the foregoing section, it is clear that the court had no jurisdiction to make the order appealed from, as the proceedings upon which it is based were not commenced until nearly eight months after the judgment was entered. But it is claimed that, as there was matter of record by which the amendment could be made, the court had power to make it, notwithstanding the rule as to time laid down in the section of the Code referred to. This claim, in so far as it applies to clerical misprisions, is undoubtedly correct. But where the judgment is entered as rendered, but rendered in excess of the stipulation, as is claimed to be the case here, such judgment is erroneous, and the error one of law committed at the trial, the remedy for which is either by motion for a new trial or by appeal. Egan v. Egan, 90 Cal. 15, 27 Pac. 22.

It is further claimed that, as the judgment was procured by fraud, practiced by plaintiff's attorney upon the court, the provisions of section 473, Code Civ. Proc., above quoted, do not apply. This point was expressly decided against respondents' claim in the case of Wharton v. Harlan, 68 Cal. 422, 9 Pac. 727. In that case the court, in discussing this question, uses the following language: "The notice of motion was filed and served more than six months after the judgment was entered. As an application under section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure, it was too late. The application for summary relief by motion must, by the terms of that section, be made within the six months. The application must be made within six months, even though the mistake, inadvertence, surprise, or excusable neglect has been caused or brought about by fraud practiced by the party in whose favor the judgment or proceeding was taken. After that period, the question of 'mistake,' etc. (whatever the remedy in equity), cannot be tried by affidavit." It therefore follows that the order appealed from should be reversed, as the court was without jurisdiction to make it. So ordered.

FROST v. GRIZZLY BLUFF CREAMERY CO. (No. 15,436.)

Appeal—Review of Instructions—Exceptions.

1. Where the record consists merely of the judgment roll and a bill of exceptions to the instructions, error in refusing instructions is no ground for reversal, nor error in instructions given, unless these are incorrect under any conceivable state of facts.

2. A general exception, unless under stipulation, will not lie to the court's instructions given on its own motion.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Humboldt county; G. W. Hunter, Judge.

Action by Benjamin A. Frost against the Grizzly Bluff Creamery Company for damages for maintaining a nuisance. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Chamberlin & Wheeler and J. N. Gillett, for appellant. J. H. G. Weaver and Frank McGowan, for respondent.

McFARLAND, J. This is an action to recover damages for a nuisance. The jury returned a verdict in the sum of $400, for which amount judgment was rendered for plaintiff. Defendant (a corporation) appeals from the judgment, and brings up the judgment roll, and a bill of exceptions, which merely shows the instructions given and refused, and the exceptions thereto. Nothing else appears. A reversal is asked solely upon alleged errors in giving and refusing instructions. In such a case a judgment will rarely be reversed. All intendments are in favor of sustaining it. If the averments in the complaint in the case at bar are true,—and we must assume them to be true,—the nuisance was a very aggravated one, and the amount of damages allowed was exceedingly small. There was no demurrer to the complaint. Its averments were denied without any point taken as to their legal sufficiency. No objection appears to any evidence offered by respondent. It does not appear what evidence was or was not introduced, and we cannot tell upon what theory the case was tried. Under these circumstances, the alleged error of the court below, in refusing certain instructions asked by appellant, cannot be considered as a ground for reversal. Nelson v. Lemmon, 10 Cal. 49; White v. Abernathy, 3 Cal. 426; Carpenter v. Ewing, 76 Cal. 487, 18 Pac. 432, and cases there cited. The same may be said of instructions given, unless they "would have been erroneous under any conceivable state of facts." Carpenter v. Ewing, supra.

Moreover, the main alleged errors relied upon by appellant occur in the instructions given by the court of its own motion, and to these there are no sufficient exceptions. The exceptions are in these words: "We except to the instructions the court gave for the plaintiff, to such as he refused to give for defendant, to such as he modified, and such as the court gave of its own motion." It would not be contended that all of the instructions given by the court of its own motion are erroneous, and the parts thereof considered erroneous should have been specifically pointed out, in the absence of a stipulation by respective counsel waiving all but a general exception. Hicks v. Coleman, 25 Cal. 147; Sill v. Reese, 47 Cal. 348; Robinson v. Railroad Co., 48 Cal. 425; Rogers v. Mahoney, 62 Cal. 613. In the latter case the court refers to the other authorities, and thus states the rule: "The whole charge cannot be excepted to generally. The exceptions should be sufficiently specific to call the attention of the court to the alleged error." The judgment is affirmed.

HOLLAND v. ZOLLNER. (No. 15,281.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 7, 1894.)

CANCELLATION OF DEED — MENTAL INCOMPETENCY —OPINION EVIDENCE.

In an action to set aside a deed for mental incapacity of the grantor, a nonexpert witness may be asked as to the grantor's appearance at a given time, with reference to his being rational or irrational, as the question calls for a fact, and not an opinion as to his mental condition, concerning which only experts and intimate acquaintances (Code Civ. Proc. § 1870, subd. 10) can express an opinion.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; John Hunt, Judge.

Action by Augusta Holland, administratrix of the estate of Henry Holland, deceased, against Alfred Zollner, to annul a deed on the ground of undue influence, and imbecility of intellect. There was a decree for plaintiff, from which, and from an order denying a new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Naphtaly, Freidenrich & Ackerman, J. W. Jellett, and A. Ruef, for appellant. Lloyd & Wood and A. Heyneman, for respondent.

SEARLS, C. This is an action to have a deed declared fraudulent and void, and that it be set aside, annulled, and declared of no effect. Plaintiff had a decree in her favor, from which, and from an order denying a motion for a new trial, the defendant Alfred Zollner appeals.

The plaintiff and Henry Holland intermarried at the city and county of San Francisco on the 16th day of July, 1885, prior to which time plaintiff was a widow, and the mother of four children, of whom the defendant Alfred Zollner is one. On the 2d day of February, 1891, Alfred Zollner obtained from Henry Holland a deed of conveyance of a lot of land on Montgomery avenue, San Francisco. At the same date, Alfred Zollner executed an agreement in writing, whereby he agreed to pay to Henry Holland, during the lifetime of the latter, the net proceeds arising from the rents and profits of the property conveyed, and, after the death of said Holland, to pay to the plaintiff herein, during her natural life, the sum of $100 per month. Henry Holland died on the 21st day of February, 1891, leaving surviving him, as his sole heir, his widow, the plaintiff herein, who was duly appointed the administratrix of his estate, and qualified as such before the commencement of this action. In response to the issues made by the pleadings, the court found that, at the date of the execution of the deed, Henry Holland was greatly enfeebled in body and mind, and wholly unable to transact any business; that he was of advanced age (72 years), of weakened mental faculties, indifferent to and incapable of the transaction of business of importance, physically and mentally prostrated, and wholly unable to give any valid consent to any contract, or to execute or deliver any valid deed, and remained in such condition to the time of his death, some 20 days later. The findings then proceed to state that the defendant Zollner, well knowing the premises, fraudulently designed and intended, and did fraudulently and designedly take an unfair advantage of the mental weakness of mind of said Holland, and fraudulently, and without consideration, procure the execution and delivery of the said deed so conveying the property to himself; that defendant procured said conveyance by Holland to himself by the exercise of undue influence over the former. The other defendant, Auguste Orton, was the tenant in possession of the premises conveyed by the deed in question, and was made a party defendant to the end that he might be enjoined, etc. He made default, and has not appealed.

At the trial, after testimony had been introduced on the part of plaintiff tending to show the enfeebled condition of Henry Holland, and his failure to notice his surroundings, his neglect to notice his friends, or to respond to conversation, etc., and that towards the end of October, 1890, he was by the advice of his physician, taken by his wife and her daughter to Bryon Springs, etc., thereupon Mrs. L. L. French was called as a witness on the part of plaintiff, and testified, in substance: That she was at Byron Springs when Holland and wife came there. That she became acquainted with them, and sat next Mr. Holland at table, and occasionally with them in the afternoon, and talked with them. That, at table, he behaved peculiarly,—would grab all the milk in reach, and drink four or five glasses of it in succession, as quickly as he could; would eat enormously at times, and then scarcely at all; would throw food offered him away, push things across the table. Was at times irritable to his wife and daughter, and at others unnaturally pleasant and agreeable, and at times would look so wild that his eyes would almost stand out of his head. Would shovel food into his mouth, and swallow it without chewing it. That, on one occasion, witness spoke to him, whereupon he stared and looked so wild that she left, and was glad to get away,—and other testimony tending in the same direction. Whereupon, plaintiff's counsel asked witness the following question: "Q. What was the apearance of this man at that time, with reference to his being rational or irrational?" To which question counsel for defendant objected upon the ground that it was incompetent, and upon the ground that it does not appear that the witness is a competent person to answer the question, or pass upon it,—the question as to his mental condition. "The Court: The objection is overruled, on the authority of People v. Lavelle, 71 Cal. 351," 12 Pac. 226. To which ruling, defendant, by his counsel, excepted. To the question proposed, the witness answered, "Irrational," and this ruling is assigned as error. A similar question was put to L. D. McKissick, who had testified similarly; like ruling had, and answer given, and exception noted. These alleged errors may be considered together.

These witnesses had been with Mr. Holland, at Byron Springs, but a single week, and it is not contended that they were within the category of "intimate acquaintances," who, under subdivision 10 of section 1870 of the Code of Civil Procedure, are entitled to give an opinion "respecting the mental sanity of a person, the reason for the opinion being given." Counsel for appellant rely upon Estate of Carpenter, 94 Cal. 406, 29 Pac. 1101, in support of their contention. In that case the question discussed was as to what constituted such a degree of intimacy as entitled the witnesses to give an opinion as to the mental condition of the testator. Temple, C., said: "The allegation of mental incompetency was supported, in a large degree, by the opinions of witnesses claimed to be intimate as to his mental condition. Objection was made in the case of each witness on the ground that the witness was not shown to be an intimate acquaintance within the meaning of subdivision 10 of section 1870 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which makes competent 'the opinion of an intimate acquaintance respecting the mental sanity of a person, the reason for the opinion being given.'" The learned commissioner then proceeds to discuss the meaning of the term "intimate acquaintance," points out the difficulty of "drawing a definite line between things which are separated only by degrees of difference," and concludes that in such cases "a very large discretion must be conceded to the trial court." In that case there was no question but that the witnesses had given opinions as to the mental sanity of the testator. They had testified as experts, and the question related to their competency as such. In the present case there is not, as I understand it, any claim that the witnesses were "experts," within the meaning of that term, as defined by section 1870, supra. The contention of respondent is that the question put to the witnesses did not call for an opinion as to the mental sanity of Holland, but was confined to an open, patent fact, indicated to all alike,—the nonexpert as well as the expert,—viz. did he appear to be rational or irrational? In confining the opinions of witnesses, respecting the mental sanity of a person, to the intimate acquaintances of such person, our Code has set at rest a question upon which diverse opinions have existed in different states. Except so far as modified by the statute, the law of evidence remains subject to such rules as experience has demonstrated to be best calculated to promote the ends of justice. As a general rule the opinions of nonexpert witnesses are not admissible in evidence. They must state facts, and not opinions deduced from the facts; leaving to the jury, whose province it is, to draw the proper inference from the facts when stated. To this general rule there are a number of exceptions, as clearly defined and as thoroughly established as the rule itself. One only of these exceptions need be mentioned here. It is as follows: "The opinions of ordinary witnesses, derived from observation, are admissible in evidence, when, from the nature of the subject under investigation, no better evidence can be obtained." Lawson, Exp. Ev. p. 3.

It is said the exception quoted applies to questions of identity, handwriting, quantity, value, weight, measure, time, distance, velocity, form, size, age, strength, heat, cold, sickness, and health; questions, also, concerning various mental and moral aspects of humanity, such as disposition and temper, anger, fear, excitement, intoxication, veracity, general character, etc. Note to Whart. Ev. § 513. The reason underlying the exception is that, from the very nature of the subject in issue, it cannot be stated or described in such language as will enable persons not eyewitnesses to form an accurate judgment in regard to it. De Witt v. Barly, 17 N. Y. 340. The paucity of language, and the incompetency of witnesses to describe graphically the photograph left upon the mind by observed facts, renders every effort to convey to a jury an adequate conception of the ultimate fact futile, except by announcing the conclusion in their own minds. A witness may describe a person as having gray hair, a wrinkled face, an uncertain gait, and by such other facts as indicate advanced years; and a jury, from such statement, could determine nothing as to his exact age, beyond the conclusion that he was an old man. Yet the witness who has detailed all the facts of which he was capable can give an opinion as to the age of the man he has described, which is almost exactly the truth. We identify men. We cannot tell how, because expressions of the face, gestures, motions, and even form, are beyond the power of accurate description. Love, hatred, sorrow, joy, and various other mental and moral operations, find outward expression, as clear to the observer as any fact coming to his observation; but he can only give expression to the fact by giving what to him is the ultimate fact, and which, for want of a more accurate expression, we call "opinion." To say that a man acts "rational" or "irrational" is but to describe an outward manifestation drawn from observed facts. It is the last analysis, the ultimate fact, deduced from evidentiary facts coming under observation, but so transitory and evanescent as to be, like drunkenness, easy of detection, and difficult of explanation. Such conduct is not so much a matter of judgment as of observation. The conclusion is reached, not as a sequence of knowledge in reference to occult mental conditions, but as a result of observed facts, patent to all, concerning which the nonexpert is as competent to judge as the trained specialist. No one will doubt but the facts in relation to the conduct of Holland were admissible in evidence, and that, could the witnesses have explained every look, gesture, expression, and motion, it would have been competent to do so. All that the exception we have quoted seeks to do is, in such cases, by reason of the impossibility of giving form to all these varied manifestations, to permit the witness, from necessity, to produce the result of the manifestation as a whole. People v. Lavelle, 71 Cal. 351, 12 Pac. 226, was a case in which the defendant was charged with an assault with intent to commit murder. One Keeney, a deputy sheriff, who was present at the time of the arrest, which immediately followed the assault, was asked the precise question put here, viz.: "What was the appearance of this man [the defendant] at that time, with reference to his being rational or irrational?" The question was objected to, the objection overruled, etc., and on appeal the ruling was assigned as error. In affirming the judgment, Myrick, J., said: "The evidence sought to be elicited was not the opinion of the witness as to the mental sanity of the defendant, based on an acquaintance with him, but was as to a fact, namely, his appearance at the time. The appearance of a person at a given time is one thing. The opinion of a witness as to the mental condition of that person, based on an acquaintance with him, is quite another." The ruling in that case is conclusive of the contention here in favor of the respondent.

Appellant's counsel have argued at considerable length the question of the insufficiency of the evidence to uphold the facts as found by the court. A review of the testimony here would be of no benefit to the appellant, or to the profession or public. I therefore content myself by saying that, after a careful perusal of the long statement on motion for a new trial, I am clearly of opinion the court below made no mistake in its findings of fact, and that, had it reached a different conclusion upon the testimony before it, the result might well have been challenged, as against the great preponderance of evidence. The judgment and order appealed from should be affirmed.

We concur: VANCLIEF, C.; HAYNES, C.

PEOPLE v. WYMAN. (No. 21,064.)

EMBEZZLEMENT—WHAT CONSTITUTES—EVIDENCE.

1. Where, on the decision of a contest before the United States land office, involving the right to purchase government land, the successful party has 60 days in which to make payment to such office, and 14 days thereafter sends to her attorney the money to make such payment, the attorney is not guilty of embezzlement because he fails within 13 days after receiving the money to make the payment, in the absence of any demand for a return of the money, or any directions by his client as to the time when he should pay for the land.

2. Where such client sent to the attorney part of the necessary sum in cash, and the balance in orders, the facts that when arrested, 13 days after the receipt of the money, he did not have all of it on his person, and up to that time had neglected to cash the orders sent, are insufficient to show that he had fraudulently appropriated the money to his own use.

3. On the trial of such attorney for embezzlement, evidence that, after his arrest and the filing of the information against him, he did not pay for the land or offer to return the money, is not admissible.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, San Joaquin county; Ansel Smith, Judge.

C. H. Wyman was convicted of embezzlement, and appeals. Reversed.

James H. & J. E. Budd and F. H. Gould, for appellant. Atty. Gen. Hart, for the People.

DE HAVEN, J. This is an appeal by the defendant from a judgment convicting him of the crime of embezzlement, and also from an order denying his motion for a new trial. The defendant was acting as the attorney for the prosecuting witness, Mrs. Annie Philp, in a contest before the United States land office involving her right to enter and purchase from the United States 160 acres of timber land. The case was finally adjudged in her favor, and the defendant, as her attorney, was notified of the fact by the register or receiver of the United States land office at Stockton on August 17, 1893, and was also further notified that the prosecuting witness would be allowed 60 days from that date—that is, until October 16, 1893—within which to make payment at that office for the land referred to in the notice. On the same day the defendant informed the prosecuting witness by letter of the result of the contest, and also requested her to send him $420 with which to make the required payment. In this letter he said: "Send at once, and it will go up with this month's returns, and your patent will come that much quicker." On August 28, 1893, the prosecuting witness sent to defendant from her home in Mariposa county a registered letter inclosing $233 in United States gold and legal tender notes, and an order on Scholle Brothers, San Francisco, for $103.75, and an order on the United States treasury for $83.33, making in all the sum requested by defendant. This letter and its contents were received by the defendant on August 31, 1893, and on the day following he went to Oakland, in the adjoining county of Alameda, and there remained until September 12, 1893, when he returned to Stockton, where he was arrested the next morning upon the charge of embezzlement, which is the subject of this prosecution. At the time of his arrest there was found on his person the order on Scholle Brothers for $103.75, a bank note and a United States legal tender note for $20 each, and four or five dollars in coin. The defendant's office and the United States land office at Stockton are in the same building. No demand was ever made upon defendant for the return of the money, and the prosecuting witness never had any communication with him in reference to it or the business of entering her land after sending him the money, and he never gave any explanation whatever as to the cause of his failure to cash the order on Scholle Brothers, and his neglect to make payment for the land. The information in this case, which was filed October 3, 1893, charges the defendant with having, on or about August 31, 1893, embezzled the $233 in money intrusted to him by his client, Mrs. Philp. The trial was had on October 20th of the same year, and up to that date the defendant had never paid for the land, or offered to return the money intrusted to him for that purpose.

The foregoing is, in substance, a statement of all the evidence in the case, and, in our opinion, it is not sufficient to justify the verdict. The complaint charging the defendant with the crime named in the information was laid before the magistrate, and the defendant arrested therefor, as early as September 13, 1893, and, in order to warrant the conviction of defendant, it was necessary for the people to prove that he had before that date fraudulently converted to his own use the money alleged to have been embezzled by him, and the evidence does not show this. In considering the question of defendant's guilt or innocence of the particular crime with which he is charged, his failure to make payment for the land after his arrest must be disregarded. That fact has no tendency whatever to show that defendant, prior to the filing of the information, converted the money therein referred to, and was improperly admitted in evidence. The only other facts relied upon to sustain the verdict are: First, that defendant neglected up to the time of his arrest, a period of 13 days, to cash the orders sent him, and to pay for the land which his client desired to purchase from the government; and, secondly, that, when arrested, he did not have on his person all of the money which had been intrusted to him for the purpose of making such payment, and did not offer to account for the same. These facts are clearly insufficient to prove that defendant had fraudulently appropriated the money of the client to his own use prior to the filing of the complaint upon which he was arrested. The fact that he did not have upon his person all of the money sent to him by his client was not of itself sufficient to justify the jury in finding or believing that he had fraudulently appropriated such money to his own use before his arrest, because such fact is not necessarily inconsistent with the fact that he may still have retained such money under his control, or subject to his order. The circumstance, to say the least, is inconclusive, affording only slight, if any, ground for suspicion, and is not strengthened by the other evidence in the case. Nor can the failure of the defendant to pay for the land prior to his arrest be regarded as a conversion by him of his client's money, much less as evidence of the fraudulent appropriation of such money to his own use. The money was sent to him to be paid over to the proper officer within the time allowed by law and the practice of the United States land office, so as to preserve the right of the client to purchase the land for which she had applied. The time within which to make such payment had not expired when defendant was arrested, nor until after the information against him was filed. In saying this, we have not overlooked the fact that the defendant, in his letter of August 17th, requested the witness to send him the money immediately, and, in effect, promised, if she would do so, to pay for the land during that month, so that its receipt would be noted in the official return of the United States receiver for that month; and, if she had complied with this request, perhaps it could be said that the defendant received the money under an agreement to pay it over during that month. But the prosecuting witness did not send him the money in time to make the payment during that month, and, in remitting, she gave no special direction as to the time when the defendant was to pay for the land. Under these circumstances, she must be deemed to have intrusted the money to defendant, as her attorney, to make payment for the land within the time allowed for that purpose, and so as to fully preserve her rights. The prosecuting witness never gave any different direction as to the time when the business should be transacted, and never made any demand for the money. It is very clear that, under these facts, the client could not, at the time of the filing of this information, have maintained a civil action against defendant for the recovery of the money so intrusted to him, and with much greater reason can it be said that such facts are not sufficient to show a fraudulent conversion or embezzlement of such money by the defendant.

The rule applicable to this case is correctly stated in Fitzgerald v. State (N. J. Sup.) 14 Atl. 747, as follows: "When the owner of goods which have been intrusted to another seeks redress for their conversion in a civil action, he is compelled to establish the fact of conversion by proof of the exercise of some dominion over the goods inconsistent with the right of the owner. Proof that the owner had demanded the goods, and that the person in possession had refused to return them, is accepted as evidence of conversion; but mere neglect to return, in the absence of a demand, has never been admitted as proof of conversion. Still less will the mere neglect to pay over proceeds lawfully received prove a fraudulent conversion thereof." If a demand had been made upon the defendant either to return the money to his principal or to make immediate payment into the United States land office, and he had refused, or if the time when under the terms of his employment he was to make such payment had expired at the time of his arrest, the case would be different, but, upon the facts disclosed by this record, the defendant was improperly convicted. Judgment and order reversed.

In re PEARSONS' ESTATE. (No. 15,510.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 1, 1894.)

EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS—SALES—RIGHTS OF EXECUTOR.

An executor sold land under a power in the will for part cash, the balance to be paid on confirmation of the sale. The sale was affirmed, and the executor tendered a deed. The purchaser appealed from the order, there being a bona fide objection to the title. The executor moved for a resale, but it was afterwards agreed that the motion should be continued until the appeal was decided, and that, if the order was affirmed, the purchaser should pay the balance of the price. Pending the appeal, the executor remained in possession, paid taxes, and received the rents. Held, on a confirmation of the order, that the executor was not entitled to receive interest from the date he made tender of the deed or to taxes.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; C. W. Slack, Judge.

In the matter of the estate of Hiram A. Pearsons, deceased. E. J. Moore, executor, sold land under a power contained in the will. The sale was affirmed, and the purchaser appealed from the order of confirmation. The order was affirmed, and the executor refused to deliver the deed until the balance of the purchase money, together with interest thereon from the date of the tender of the deed, was paid. On application by the purchaser, an order was made requiring the executor to execute conveyance on payment of the unpaid purchase money, without interest thereon, and from the order the executor appeals. Affirmed.

J. H. Moore, for appellant. W. S. Goodfellow, Rosenbaum & Scheeline, and Naphtaly, Friedenreich & Ackerman, for respondent.

McFARLAND, J. This is an appeal of E. J. Moore, executor of the will of Hiram A. Pearsons, deceased, from an order of the court below requiring him to complete the sales of several pieces of real property made by him to John F. English and others, respondents herein, and confirmed by the court March 18, 1892, and to execute to them deeds of conveyance of said property upon their payment of the balance of the purchase money.

On January 28, 1892, the appellant, as executor, sold the said property at auction to the respondents, under a power of sale contained in the will of said Pearsons, deceased. The terms of the sale were cash in gold coin, 10 per cent. to the auctioneer at the time of sale, and balance on confirmation of sale by the superior court. When the matter of confirming the sale come up before the court on March 18, 1892, the respondents herein objected to the confirmation, on the ground that, under the will, the executor had no power to sell the property without a previous order of the court; but the court made an order confirming the sale. Thereafter, on April 18, 1892, appellant tendered to each of the respondents a deed of the property sold to him, and demanded payment of the balance of the purchase money, which amounted to $33,345, and notified them that, on default of immediate payment thereof, "such recourse will be taken as is afforded by law." Payment not having been made, the appellant, on April 28, 1892, served and filed in court his affidavit and motion for an order directing a resale of said property. Respondents appealed to this court from the order of March 18, 1892, confirming said sales. On March 23, 1892, the parties made a written agreement and stipulation, in which, after a recital of the foregoing facts, it was stipulated that the appellant herein "shall consent that his motion of resale be continued until after said appeal to the supreme court shall be determined;" and that, if the order confirming the sale should be affirmed by the supreme court, the respondents herein should pay to the appellant, "within thirty days after the determination of said appeal against them, the unpaid balance of the purchase price of the lots of land purchased by them respectively as aforesaid, on receipt of the deeds of said properties, respectively." This stipulation, as originally drafted, contained the following clause: "With interest thereon from the date of said order of confirmation at the rate of five per cent. per annum;" but this clause was erased before execution, and there was inserted in its stead, in the handwriting of the attorney of the purchasers, the final words of the stipulation, viz.: "On receipt of the deeds of said properties, respectively." During the pendency of said appeal the present appellant, Moore, remained in possession of all the property, made leases thereof, received the rents, and fully controlled it, without any consultation with the respondents herein. He also during said time paid some taxes levied against said property. The said appeal was determined by this court on June 13, 1893, by a decision affirming the order confirming said sales. In re Pearsons' Estate, 98 Cal. 603, 33 Pac. 451. On July 18th the purchasers, respondents herein, tendered to the appellant the unpaid balance of said purchase money, and demanded deeds of conveyance of said properties. The appellant refused to deliver the deeds until respondents should have paid the balance of the purchase money, "together with interest thereon from the date of the tender" of his deeds made on April 18, 1892, as aforesaid, and "all taxes paid by him since the date of said sale," he agreeing to account for the rents. Thereupon respondents made application to the court for an order requiring appellant to complete said sales, and execute deeds of conveyance to respondents, upon their payment of said unpaid purchase money; and the court made the order without requiring them to pay said interest or taxes. From said order the said executor appeals.

We will pass over the point made by respondents that the order is not appealable, and all technical points made by them. Appellant's point now made—that the tender was not in gold coin—is not tenable, for it is clear that the only objection made to the tender was that it did not include interest and taxes. The real question is, were respondents compelled, under the circumstances, to pay said interest and taxes? And we think that they were not.

The sale involved in the case at bar was not strictly a judicial sale. "The purchaser from an executor at a sale under a power in the will deals with him in making the purchase as he would with any other vendor." In re Pearsons' Estate, supra. In an ordinary case of a contract for the sale and purchase of land, when an action has been brought by the vendor for specific performance, a court of chancery will sometimes allow interest on the purchase money from the time when the contract ought to have been consummated, although the vendor has remained in possession and in receipt of the income of the land, when the circumstances show such allowance to be equitable. Such allowance is not, however, an absolute legal right of the vendor. Where there is a bona fide objection to the title, and during the delay caused by its judicial investigation the vendor remains in possession, and receives the rents or profits of the land, such rents or profits, in the absence of an express contract upon the subject, should frequently be considered in equity as all that the vendor is justly entitled to during this delay. In the case at bar, respondents' objection to the title was certainly not a trivial one; for the opinion of this court (98 Cal. 603, 33 Pac. 451) shows that their said objection raised a question worthy of grave and elaborate consideration. We do not think that, if appellant were suing for specific performance, equity would be called upon, under the circumstances, to allow him, during the delay caused by the litigation, anything more than the rents and profits of the land. But appellant did not sue for specific performance. After having tendered deeds to respondents, he did not keep the tender good, but notified them that he would proceed to resell the property, and, of course, would hold them for damages if the property sold for less than their bid and the expenses of the previous sale, under section 1554 of the Code of Civil Procedure. Moreover, under the stipulation above mentioned, it was clearly agreed by all parties that the whole matter should rest and remain in statu quo until after the decision by this court of respondents' said appeal; and that the contract should be in abeyance until such decision should have clearly established the rights in the premises of each party to the contract of sale. Under the stipulation, the consummation of the contract was suspended by the act of the parties until after the determination of the appeal. The stipulation did not provide for interest; and, in fact, it appears that respondents expressly refused to execute it when it did contain such a provision. Under these circumstances, appellant did not hold the land as trustee for respondents, nor were the latter trustees of the purchase money for the appellant. The time for the consummation of the contract had not come. Of course, the taxes are in the same category. The order appealed from is affirmed.

PERPOLI v. GRAND LODGE OF LEGION OF THE WEST. (No. 15,337.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 1, 1894.)

MUTUAL BENEFIT SOCIETIES—SPECIAL ENDOWMENTS.

1. Where a mutual benefit society issues to each of its members of a certain class special endowment coupons, entitling him, at the maturity of a coupon, to the whole amount of one assessment from every member of that class, the number of such assessments being regulated annually by the grand lodge of the society, and paid into a special fund, a member whose coupon falls due, with others, at a time when there is not enough in said fund to pay them all in full, can only recover his pro rata share of the fund.

2. A mutual benefit society, being trustee for its members of a certain class of a special benefit fund, can assert their rights to a pro rata share therein against one of their number who seeks judgment for more than his share.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; John Hunt, Judge.

Action by Pietro Perpoli against the grand lodge of the Legion of the West on an endowment coupon. Judgment for plaintiff for $45. Plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Rogers & Chilstrom, for appellant. F. Wm. Reade, for respondent.

DE HAVEN, J. The plaintiff sought by this action to recover a judgment against the defendant for the sum of $600 upon a coupon maturing September 7, 1891, attached to a special benefit certificate, entitling him to participate in the special benefit fund of the defendant in an amount to be computed in accordance with its laws. The plaintiff is a special benefit member of the sixth class, belonging to one of the subordinate lodges of defendant, and the laws of defendant provide: "If the member is a special benefit member of the sixth class at the time of maturity of the coupon, he shall receive the whole amount of one assessment from every special benefit member in good standing at the date of such maturity." The court below found "that the defendant was and is a mutual benefit association, organized for the purpose, in consideration of certain moneys paid to it, of paying at the death of its members a stipulated sum of money to a designated nominee, subject to its constitution and by-laws. * * * That each installment of said endowment was and is paid to each member out of a fund created for that special purpose, and held by the defendant in trust for the purpose of said payment." This fund is known as the "Special Benefit Fund," and is derived from assessments made upon special benefit members of the defendant. The number of these assessments is regulated by the grand lodge at its annual meetings. The court further found "that there was some $2,200 in the special benefit fund at the time of the maturity of plaintiff's coupon; that the said fund was subject to two prior attachments upon claims of similar character to plaintiff's, for the sum of $600 each, with costs, and to plaintiff's attachment for $600 and costs; that there are other remaining members who have claims upon the said sum largely exceeding the sum of $2,200." As a conclusion of law from the foregoing facts, the court found that, inasmuch as the special benefit fund held by defendant is not sufficient to pay all the coupons of the same class as that of plaintiff, and maturing at the same time, the fund should be divided equally between all the holders of such maturing coupons; and that the plaintiff was only entitled to recover in this action his proportionate part of such fund, amounting to the sum of $45, and thereupon gave judgment in favor of plaintiff for said sum of $45. The plaintiff appeals.

The conclusion reached by the learned judge of the superior court is clearly right. The plaintiff is not entitled to recover the entire amount of his coupon to the exclusion of members of the same class as himself, and who possess an equal right to share in the special benefit fund, under the constitution and laws of the defendant. Nor is the case changed by reason of the fact that the other members are not before the court asserting in their own names their right to participate in the fund in controversy. The defendant, as trustee of this fund in which such members are entitled to share, may assert such rights for them, and resist plaintiff's right to recover more than his proportionate share of such fund. Judgment and order affirmed.

BODE et al. v. LEE et al. (No. 14,094.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 1, 1894.)

APPEAL—PLEADINGS—TROVER—LIMITATION—EVIDENCE.

1. On appeal from an order denying a new trial, though the pleadings may be referred to, to ascertain the issues, and review the rulings on evidence objected to as outside such issues, the court cannot decide whether the complaint was sufficient to support the judgment, or whether a demurrer thereto was properly overruled.

2. Warehousemen have an entire cause of action, in trover, against persons who have bought goods stolen from their warehouse, though such goods may have belonged to divers bailors.

3. In trover, for tin stolen from plaintiffs, and sold to defendants, through a series of years, one defendant, while testifying, presented a statement, drawn from their books, of all the tin they had bought from the alleged thief for five years. Plaintiffs offered this as evidence, and it was admitted, over defendants' objection of limitation as to the transactions of the first two years. Held no error, the jury being instructed as to the effect of the statute on such evidence, after all the evidence was received.

4. Plaintiffs' defaulting manager testified that the shortage of tin in their warehouse arose from his irregular sales; that all such sales were to defendants. One of defendants testified to dealings with said manager for more tin than plaintiffs claimed. Held, that the identity of the tin was sufficiently proven.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; T. H. Rearden, Judge.

Action by George C. Bode and another, trading as Bode & Searle, against John Lee and others, trading as John Lee & Co., for damages for conversion of personalty. Judgment for plaintiffs. From the order denying a new trial, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Garber, Thornton & Bishop, for appellants. John H. Dickinson (Henry E. Monroe, of counsel), for respondents.

HARRISON, J. The plaintiffs were the proprietors of a bonded warehouse in San Francisco, and had one R. P. Scott in their employ as foreman or manager of the warehouse. In February, 1886, they discovered that Scott had been unfaithful to his trust for a number of years, and had privately and corruptly sold various articles of merchandise that had been stored in their warehouse. A portion of the merchandise so sold by him consisted of boxes of sheet tin, which were purchased by the defendants, and upon the discovery of the fact the plaintiffs brought this action to recover from the defendants the value of the tin thus received by them. The complaint alleges the character of the business conducted by the plaintiffs; the relation held to them by Scott; the knowledge of these facts by the defendants, and that, with such knowledge, the defendants had conspired and confederated with Scott for the purpose of wronging and defrauding the plaintiffs out of these boxes of tin, and had procured Scott to fraudulently remove them from the warehouse at divers times within the four years last past, and, as a consideration therefor, had paid him for said property a sum of money greatly below its market value, with the knowledge that he had fraudulently obtained the property as the employe of the plaintiffs, and had thus stolen and embezzled it; that in pursuance of said conspiracy the defendants had come into the possession of 1,626 boxes of tin, of which the plaintiffs were entitled to the immediate possession, and for the value of which they were responsible to the owners; that said fraudulent conversion occurred between the 1st day of January, 1879, and the 10th day of February, 1886; and that the transactions set forth in the complaint were not discovered by the plaintiffs until the 10th day of February, 1886. Upon this complaint the plaintiffs asked judgment against the defendants for the wrongful conversion, and that they be adjudged guilty of fraud, and that execution issue against their persons. To this complaint the defendants demurred upon the ground that the cause of action was barred by the statute of limitations; that the complaint was ambiguous, uncertain, and unintelligible; and that the complaint did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. The demurrer was overruled, and the defendants answered, taking issue upon the averments in the complaint, and alleging that they had purchased the tin from Scott in good faith, under the bona fide belief that he was the owner thereof, and had paid therefor its full market value. The cause was tried by a jury, and a verdict rendered in favor of the plaintiffs for the sum of $7,339.75. A motion for a new trial was made by the defendants, and denied, and from the order denying a new trial an appeal has been taken. No appeal has been taken from the judgment.

1. An appeal from an order granting or denying a new trial does not involve any consideration of the correctness of the judgment. That question can be determined only by an appeal from the judgment itself. The motion for a new trial is in the nature of a distinct proceeding, and is to be heard upon an independent record, distinct from the record upon which the judgment depends. In the present case this record consists of a statement of the case prepared after the trial. Upon the hearing of this motion, reference may be had to the pleadings (Code Civ. Proc. § 660), but the correctness of the order must be determined by the record upon which it rests. This "reference" to the pleadings is for the purpose of ascertaining the issues in the case, and determining the correctness of any rulings of the court upon objection to the introduction of evidence on the ground that it was not within such issues; but whether the complaint is sufficient to support the judgment, or whether the court erred in overruling a demurrer to the complaint, can be considered only upon an appeal from the judgment. Neither of these matters is involved in the "re-examination of an issue of fact after a trial and decision by a jury or court." Id. § 656; Brison v. Brison, 90 Cal. 323, 27 Pac. 186; Evans v. Paige (Cal.) 36 Pac. 406.

2. It is strenuously urged by the appellants that the plaintiffs were limited at the trial to establishing a single conversion of tin, and could not introduce testimony in support of their complaint showing that the tin for which they sued had been received by the defendants at different times. Without determining whether this objection should not have been taken by special demurrer to the complaint, upon the ground of uncertainty, we think that the appellants should at least have made this ground a special objection at the trial when the evidence was offered.

Such evidence cannot be regarded in any other light than as a variance from the allegations of the complaint, and it is very evident from the record in this case that the defendants were not misled by its introduction. Code Civ. Proc. § 469. If the objection had been made when the evidence was presented, the plaintiffs might have amended their complaint. The defendants, however, did not make this objection to any evidence of this character which was offered by the plaintiffs; and in fact this evidence was first brought to the notice of the jury in the cross-examination by the defendants of one of the plaintiffs, who was testifying as a witness in his own behalf. While the plaintiff Searle was being examined with reference to the shortage in the tin in the warehouse, he stated, in reply to a question by the defendants' counsel, that there was more than one party short of tin in his warehouse; and thereupon the defendants' counsel objected "to any further testimony, upon the ground that the complaint states only one cause of action, whereas the proof shows that there were as many causes of action as there were parties short of tin. Plaintiffs sue as bailees, and they have as many causes of action as there were bailors. The Code requires each cause of action to be stated separately." This objection was overruled, but the witness did not give any evidence of the character objected to until he was asked in reference thereto upon his cross-examination by the defendants. The objection that was made is, however, untenable. The plaintiffs, as bailees of the tin, had the right to its recovery from any one who had fraudulently obtained it through the embezzlement of Scott, and it was immaterial to the defendants whether they were the bailees of one or more bailors. Their cause of action was as entire and single as would be that of an owner of property whose title was derived through different vendors.

3. Much of the argument of counsel has been directed to the question of the statute of limitations, the appellants claiming that the plaintiffs were not entitled to recover for any tin that was abstracted from the plaintiffs' warehouse prior to three years before the commencement of this action. The sufficiency of the complaint in this respect is extensively discussed; but, as we are not at liberty to pass upon that question on this appeal, it is unnecessary to consider this part of the argument. This defense was pleaded in the answer; and at one stage of the trial, in answer to the following question put to one of the defendants, "In those transactions, did the name of the Greenwich Dock Bonded Warehouse, or of Bode & Searle, appear upon any of the writings connected with them?" the defendants objected that the plaintiffs "have no right to prove that we got any tin previous to the three years prior to the commencement of this suit. Action is barred upon all received before that time." This witness did not, however, give testimony that the defendants had received any tin prior to three years before the commencement of the action, except in the following manner: At a later stage of his examination a list of the tin received by the defendants from April, 1881, to February, 1886, that had been made out from their books, was presented by the witness, while giving his testimony, as "a statement of all the tin we bought from Scott, and the time it was bought." It was offered in evidence by the plaintiffs as a part of the testimony of the witness. The defendants objected to that portion of the list which showed that which was bought between April, 1881, and December, 1882, "because no recovery can be had for that. It is barred by the statute of limitations." But their objection was overruled, and the statement was admitted in evidence. There was no error in this ruling. The statement had been prepared at the instance of the defendant witness, and was produced by him for the purpose of showing the nature of the transactions between his firm and Scott. It was not rendered inadmissible by reason of its containing entries of transactions that had occurred prior to 1883. It often happens in the trial of a cause, where the statute of limitations is pleaded as a defense, and when the cause of action depends upon a series of continued transactions, that these transactions are so interwoven as to render it impossible to limit the evidence to a particular point of time. It is also frequently the case that the sufficiency of this defense will depend upon the establishment of other facts at the trial, and is to be determined by the jury, under proper instructions, after all of the evidence has been introduced. In such cases an objection to any piece of evidence, on the ground that it relates to a transaction claimed to be barred by limitation, is unavailing, for the reason that it cannot be known until after the determination of other facts whether this period of time constitutes a limitation. The proper practice, in such cases, is to allow the evidence to go before the jury, and to have them properly instructed with reference to the statute of limitations, and its application to the facts of the case before them. In the present case the defendants did request the court to instruct the jury that the plaintiffs could not recover for any tin purchased by them prior to the 18th of February, 1886. This instruction was refused by the court, and its ruling is now assigned as error. The appellants have not given any reason for fixing this date as the point when the statute began to run, and we are unable to see that the court erred in refusing to give the instruction. The plaintiffs had alleged in their complaint that they discovered the frauds for the first time on the 10th day of February, 1886. It does not appear, however, that the verdict of the jury includes any tin received by the defendants prior to this date. The court instructed the jury to the effect that the plaintiffs could recover only such damage as they had sustained as bailees of the tin, and that, if they had settled with their bailors, they could recover only such amount as they had paid in such settlement, not exceeding the actual value of the tin. The testimony upon this point was that the plaintiffs had paid to Nicholson $7,042.75, and to Balfour, Guthrie & Co. $297,—making, in the aggregate, $7,339.75,—and the jury rendered their verdict for this amount. There was no evidence that any of the tin of these bailors was received by the defendants prior to April 18, 1886.

4. The court instructed the jury that the plaintiffs, in order to recover, must show that Scott sold to the defendants the identical tin for which they sought judgment in this action, and the appellants urge that this instruction was disregarded by the jury; that the evidence fails to show that the tin for which the plaintiffs were short in their warehouse, and for which they settled with their bailors, was ever received by the defendants from Scott. Naturally, the evidence to connect the defendants with the shortage of the tin in the warehouse, and to bridge the intervening space between its embezzlement by Scott and its receipt by them, is fragmentary, and devoid of the accuracy of mathematical demonstration; but we think that the evidence before the jury was sufficient to authorize them to connect the two, and will uphold their verdict. Scott testified: "The shortage in tin in this warehouse arose from my irregular sales. All I disposed of irregularly was to John Lee & Co." (the defendants). One of the defendants testified that their dealings with Scott amounted to over $20,000 within five years, though most of the transactions were since 1883; and the list of tin bought by them from Scott, which he produced in evidence, showed a greater number of boxes than was claimed by the plaintiffs. We think that in view of this testimony, and of the testimony concerning the manner in which the transactions with Scott were had, the burden was thrown upon the defendants to show that the tin thus purchased from Scott was not a portion of that for which the plaintiffs found a shortage in their warehouse, and settled with their bailors. There was evidence before the jury tending to show that the defendants were not entirely innocent in their dealings with Scott, and the jury were not required to be too strict in demanding proof against them of facts which it was within their power to disprove, but for which they made no attempt.

5. There are certain specifications of errors of law in the admission of evidence, and in refusing certain instructions which were asked by the defendants, but they are not of a character to require comment. The substance of the instructions thus refused, which were proper to be given, had already been given to the jury in other language, and the evidence which was received against the objections of the defendants could not have changed the result. The case seems to have been fully and carefully tried upon its merits. A great deal of evidence upon the various issues was introduced by the respective parties, and submitted to the jury, with extended and elaborate instructions from the court, evidently given at the instance of the respective parties, and to which no exception was taken. These instructions seem to cover the propositions contended for by the appellants, and to have fully and fairly directed the jury in their deliberation upon their verdict; and, as we find no error in the record which affects the substantial rights of the parties, we think the action of the court below must be affirmed, and it is so ordered. The order is affirmed.

O'CONNOR v. HOOPER. (No. 15,205.)

ACTION FOR WORK IN GRADING STREET—EVIDENCE—NONSUIT—GROUNDS OF MOTION.

1. A contract between O. "and certain owners of property, lots, and lands fronting on L. street, * * * each contracting severally, parties of the second part," provided that O. should do certain grading on L. street at prices named, and that such second parties, "each for himself and not for the others," should pay O. "their pro rata of the total cost, * * * each one paying therefor according to the ratio that their respective frontage bears to the whole." It was signed by O. and by the others as follows: "H., for grading only, 127 feet 8¼ inches. W., for grading only to center of street fronting my lot, 65 feet. C., for grading front of my lot to center of street, 62 feet 8¼ inches." Held, in an action by O. against H. to recover for such work, that the contract was admissible as against an objection that it was signed by plaintiff as an entire contract, whereas the other parties severally limited the obligation of each to pay for a specified part.

2. Since such contract was not illegal or invalid for any reason, it was not inadmissible because the work was not authorized by the board of supervisors.

3. The contract providing that the payment by each property owner should be in proportion to his frontage, a certificate of the city engineer, who it was agreed should estimate the amount of work, which recited that he found the work "to official line and grade. Exc. 5,616 cu. yds.," was admissible as against an objection that it did not show "how much of the excavation was to be made in front of defendant's lot and to the center of the street."

4. The fact that there was evidence that the survey and field notes from which the number of cubic yards was estimated in the city engineer's office were made by such engineer before he came into office did not render the certificate inadmissible as "not made by the city engineer," there being no evidence that the person who signed it was not city engineer at the time he issued it.

5. A motion by defendant for nonsuit is properly denied if made, not on the ground that the evidence admitted did not support plaintiff's cause of action, but only on the grounds on which portions of the admitted evidence were objected to when offered, to the admission of which evidence he excepted, since errors in admitting evidence cannot be reviewed on a motion for nonsuit.

Action by James J. O'Connor against John A. Hooper to recover a sum alleged to be due plaintiff on a contract for grading on Laguna street, in the city and county of San Francisco. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

VANCLIEF, C. It is alleged in the complaint, substantially, that on the 1st day of September, 1891, the defendant was indebted to the plaintiff in the sum of $937.55, for work and labor theretofore done and performed by plaintiff at defendant's instance and request, in grading on Laguna street, between Clay and Washington streets, in the city and county of San Francisco; and that defendant has refused to pay said sum, or any part thereof. By the answer of the defendant, each allegation of the complaint is specifically denied. The cause having been tried without a jury, the court found that the defendant was indebted to plaintiff for the alleged work and labor, including interest, in the sum of $687.91, for which sum, with costs, judgment was rendered against defendant. The defendant appeals from the judgment on the judgment roll, containing a bill of exceptions; but the bill of exceptions specifies no particular in which it is claimed that the evidence admitted is insufficient to justify the decision, and therefore raises no such question.

1. Defendant's motion for nonsuit was not made on the ground that the evidence which had been admitted did not substantially tend to prove all the facts essential to plaintiff's cause of action, but only on the same grounds upon which portions of the admitted evidence had been objected to when offered, and to the admission of which defendant duly excepted, so that the exception to the order denying the nonsuit added nothing to the exceptions before taken to the admission of the evidence, and does not raise the question whether the admitted evidence tended to prove all the material allegations of the complaint; and, since errors in admitting evidence cannot be reviewed on a motion for nonsuit, it follows that the nonsuit was properly denied.

2. The plaintiff offered as evidence the following instrument:

"This agreement, made and entered into on this —— day of July, A. D. 1891, by and between James J. O'Connor, of the city and county of San Francisco, state of California, party of the first part, and certain owners of property, lots, and lands fronting on Laguna street, between Clay and Washington streets, in the said city above mentioned, whose names are hereunto subscribed, each contracting severally, parties of the second part, witnesseth that the said party of the first part, for and in consideration of the covenants of the said parties of the second part hereinafter expressed, promise, covenant, and agree to and with the said parties of the second part that he will furnish all the materials and perform the work of constructing in a good and workmanlike manner of grading to the official grade said above-named street; also to macadamize the same, and to construct rock gutter ways, and to lay redwood curbs where not already laid or where granite curbs are not laid, at the following prices, viz.: Grading, per cubic yard, $.85 (eighty-five cents); macadamizing and rock gutters, per front foot, one dollar and thirty cents; redwood curbs, per front foot, thirty cents. Estimate of the number of cubic yards to be made by the city and county surveyor, all incidental expenses to be paid by the party of the first part. And the said parties of the second part, in consideration of the premises, each for himself and not for the others, promise, covenant, and agree to and with the said party of the first part that they will pay to said party of the first part, upon the completion of the work aforesaid to the satisfaction of the superintendent of public streets, highways, and squares, their pro rata of the total cost of the above-described work, each one paying therefor according to the ratio that their respective frontage bears to the whole frontage here represented. In witness whereof, the said parties have hereunto set their hands and seals, the day and year aforesaid.

"[Signed] Jas. J. O'Connor, 2927 Clay street.

"[Signed] John A. Hooper, for grading only, 127 feet 8¼ inches.

"[Signed] Robert Watt, for grading only to center of street fronting my lot, 65 feet.

"[Signed] M. E. Castle, for grading front of my lot to center of street, 62 feet 8¼ inches."

To the introduction of this instrument the defendant objected, on the grounds (1) that the contract for grading, macadamizing, curbing, etc., was signed by plaintiff, the party of the first part as an entire contract, whereas the parties of the second part severally limited the obligation of each to pay for only a specified part of the grading; and (2) that no authority from the board of supervisors, nor resolution of intention to do the work, was shown.

I think the objection was properly overruled. The instrument expresses three distinct contracts, by which each of the parties of the second part promised to pay to the party of the first part his pro rata of the total cost of the grading only, "according to the ratio that his frontage bears to the whole frontage," at the rate of 85 cents per cubic yard, the whole frontage being 510 feet 9 inches, and the frontage of defendant, for which he promised to pay, being 127 feet 8 inches. The effect of each of these contracts is the same as if it had been written on a separate paper. As written, the instrument is of the nature of a subscription contract, whereby the obligation of each subscriber is limited and several, and not joint.

As to the objection that the work was not lawfully authorized by the board of supervisors, it is only necessary to say that, whether so authorized or not, the contract for doing it does not appear to have been illegal, nor for any reason invalid. Yet it was proved that by resolution of the board of supervisors, the mayor was "authorized to enter into private contracts for the performance of certain street work, for a portion of the cost of which the city is assessable at the same rates as agreed upon by the property owners, to wit: * * * With J. J. O'Connor, to grade the official line and grade Laguna street, between Washington and Clay streets, in front of Lafayette Park." The evidence shows this to have been the same work described in the contract in question, and that the city contracted with plaintiff to do its proportion of the grading, and paid him for it at the rate of 85 cents per cubic yard.

3. The contract provides that the estimate of the number of cubic yards is to be made by the city and county surveyor. To prove the number of cubic yards, plaintiff offered as evidence the following instrument: "Duplicate, No. 337. San Francisco, July 11, 1891. I certify I have examined the work of grading Laguna street, from Clay to Washington streets, and find the work to official line and grade. Exc. 5,616 cu. yds. C. S. Tilton, City Engineer." Defendant's objection to this was that it did not show "how much of the excavation was to be màde in front of defendant's lot and to the center of the street." This objection was properly overruled, for the reason that the defendant promised to pay for the grading in the proportion that the frontage of his lot bore to the whole frontage on the improvement. To estimate what sum he should pay, it was only necessary to know the extent of his frontage, the extent of the whole frontage, and the whole number of cubic yards of grading. The number of cubic yards of grading in front of his lot was not a factor in the calculation. After the certificate of the city engineer had been read in evidence, defendant moved to strike it out, on the ground "that it was not made by the city engineer." The evidence relied upon to support this ground was the testimony of Nicholas King, as follows: "I am a deputy city and county surveyor, and have been so for five years. I was deputy under Mr. Tilton. The certificate dated July 11, 1891, signed 'C. S. Tilton, City Engineer,' and already in evidence, was issued by our office, showing the amount of grading on Laguna street from Clay to Washington. * * * I did not do this work of surveying on Laguna street, and do not know who did. * * * This is the only certificate that was given in reference to this work. * * * The work was done by Mr. Tilton, under his direction, before he came into office. We only made an examination of the work. * * * Ques. The city and county surveyor never made any survey of this property? Ans. Only an examination. Ques. Only an examination of Mr. Tilton's field notes? Ans. Yes, sir. Ques. That was for the superintendent of streets? Ans. Yes, sir." The court denied the motion, and it does not appear that in doing so it erred. The evidence does not even tend to prove, as contended by counsel, that Tilton was not city engineer at the time he signed and issued the certificate, though it does tend to prove that the survey and field notes from which the number of cubic yards was estimated in the office was made by or under him before he came into office. But the ground of the motion is not that he made the survey without authority, nor that it was improperly made, as to which, however, there is no evidence, except the fact that the field notes were in the office of the city and county surveyor, and were there used as official data from which to estimate the amount of the grading, and upon which estimate the certificate in question was issued by Mr. Tilton after he came into office. But it is a sufficient answer to the objection that the bill of exceptions contains no evidence that Mr. Tilton was not city engineer at the time he issued the certificate, this being the only ground upon which the objection was made. I think the judgment should be affirmed.

McNAMARA v. MACDONOUGH et al. (No. 15,123.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 1, 1894.)

VICE PRINCIPAL—FELLOW SERVANTS—INCONSISTENT INSTRUCTIONS.

1. One employed by the architect of a building to construct the scaffolds on which the bricklayers and hod carriers shall work is, in the construction thereof, a vice principal, and not a fellow servant of a hod carrier.

2. Inconsistency between instructions given at request of plaintiff and those given at request of defendant, arising from the latter being too favorable to defendant, cannot be complained of by him.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; A. A. Sanderson, Judge.

Action by Terence McNamara against Kate

Macdonough and others. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendants appeal. Affirmed.

E. F. Preston, for appellants. D. J. Toohy and Mich. Mullany, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. Action to recover damages for a personal injury suffered by plaintiff, alleged to have been caused by the negligence of defendants in constructing a scaffold on which they employed plaintiff to work as hod carrier, and by the breaking and falling of which plaintiff was injured. The cause was tried by a jury. Verdict and judgment for plaintiff in the sum of $4,500. Defendants appeal from the judgment, and from an order denying their motion for a new trial.

At the time of the accident the defendants were constructing a building known as the "California Hotel and Theater," on Bush street, in the city of San Francisco. Some time before the accident the defendants departed from this state, and did not return before the commencement of this action; but during their absence they were directly represented here by Mr. E. F. Preston, as general superintendent of the construction of the building. Mr. Preston employed J. M. Wood as architect and general manager upon the ground. James McIntire was employed as foreman of the work, and he generally employed the laborers,—masons, bricklayers, hod carriers, etc.; but the architect employed George Scarf, a carpenter, to construct all the scaffolds on which the bricklayers and hod carriers were to work, and Scarf constructed all such scaffolds from materials furnished by defendants. As to whether the materials furnished for scaffolds were suitable for that purpose, and whether the particular scaffold, by the falling of which plaintiff was injured, was negligently and insecurely constructed, the evidence was substantially conflicting, but quite sufficient, under the rule applicable here to conflicting evidence, to justify a verdict in favor of the plaintiff on both these issues. All the mechanics and laborers who worked on the building were employed and paid by the defendants, through their agents, by the day, week or month; that is to say, no part of the work was done by job contract, excepting, perhaps, the work of the architect. There is no evidence of any contract, understanding, or custom to the effect that the bricklayers or hod carriers were to construct the scaffolds on which they were to stand while doing their work; and no evidence that they did construct any of such scaffolds, except as one or more of them may have been ordered to assist Scarf, in which case they worked under Scarf's direction, and did only what he ordered them to do. In constructing the scaffold on which plaintiff was injured, Scarf was assisted by Thomas McGowan, a hod carrier employed on the building, who testified: "My business there was that of a mere laborer attending on the mechanics; and, in that capacity, I waited upon Mr. Scarf and attended on him while he built the scaffold that broke down. * * * Q. Did you have any management or superintendence or direction of this scaffold? Ans. Not the slightest. I was a common laborer, and had to do as I was told." And there was no evidence in conflict with this testimony. The scaffold in question was constructed inside of three walls of an elevator shaft, the front side of which was open, the shaft being about nine feet square. The scaffold covered the whole space inside of the shaft, except a few inches next to the walls. The bricklayers and hod carriers went to work upon it immediately after it was constructed; and within an hour or two thereafter, while the plaintiff and a bricklayer were working upon it, it fell, and with it the plaintiff and bricklayer fell to the bottom of the shaft, a distance of about 18 feet, whereby the plaintiff was seriously, and perhaps permanently, injured. The evidence tends to show that the defects and insufficiency of the scaffold were not apparent or visible to the plaintiff; that his means of knowledge of such insufficiency were not equal to those of the defendants, by whose agency the scaffold was constructed; and that he did not know that the scaffold was insufficient or unsafe, but trusted and relied upon the defendants having performed their duty in the construction thereof. So that it may be said, as a legal conclusion, that there was no evidence of contributory negligence.

At request of plaintiff, the court gave the following instruction: "It was the duty of the defendants to furnish a suitable and safe scaffold, both as to the materials used, and the mode of the construction thereof, such as a reasonable and cautious and prudent man would adopt, in view of the use for which the same was intended to be used, and in view of the fact that the mechanics and workmen treading upon the same, and carrying their loads of brick and mortar, depended upon the material and construction thereof for their personal safety. And if you find from the evidence that the scaffold which broke down, and caused the injury complained of, was not constructed in a safe and suitable manner, and composed of suitable and safe materials, in view of the purpose for which it was intended, and the use to which it was to be put by the workmen, including plaintiff, you will find a verdict for the plaintiff, and assess the damages in his favor, and against the defendants, at such sum—not to exceed $25,000—as you shall deem reasonable and proper, under all the circumstances of the case, and the evidence adduced on the trial, if you should find, also, from such evidence, that the plaintiff did not know, or had no equal means of knowledge with defendants, of ascertaining whether the scaffold was constructed in a suitable or safe manner for the work intended, or constructed of safe, sound, and proper material, and further find that the plaintiff did not know, or could not have known, under all the circumstances, that his employment on such scaffold involved danger to himself. This instruction I give you on behalf of the plaintiff, with such modifications as I think are proper, and I will instruct you further on as to that matter." The court, of its own motion, afterwards elaborated, and added to, the above instruction, as follows: "The law requires every person to use his natural faculties. Whatever any man might have seen, whatever he might have heard, he is presumed to have heard; and this plaintiff is chargeable with negligence in the use of this scaffolding, if he had an opportunity equal to the defendants, to see and inspect the same before its use, and understood the risk to which he was exposed thereby. That an employer who provides appliances, such as a scaffold, as in this case, must see that it is suitable and fit for the use for which it is intended. This rule is, however, subject to this limitation: that when a person works upon a platform or scaffold, as the plaintiff did in this case, and such platform or scaffold is insufficient for the purpose for which it is used, or for any reason unsafe or dangerous to work upon, and such person so uses it or works upon it with a knowledge, or means of knowledge, equal to that of the employer, that it is defectively constructed, unsafe, and dangerous to work upon, then, in that case, he takes the risk incident to such employment, and cannot recover against such employer for injuries sustained which arise out of accidents resulting from such defective, unsafe, and dangerous condition of such scaffold." At request of defendants' counsel, the court instructed the jury as to the law of contributory negligence and fellow servants. The principal points made by appellants, and the only points requiring consideration, are—First, that the evidence is insufficient to justify a verdict of negligence on the part of the defendants in the construction of the scaffold, which is sufficiently answered in the foregoing statement of the case; second, that the court erred in giving the instruction above set out, at request of plaintiff, with the additions thereto by the court.

The objections to the instruction are that it assumes that Scarf, who constructed the scaffold, was not a fellow servant, by whose negligence the accident happened, and that there was no contributory negligence on the part of the plaintiff, and also that it is inconsistent with the instructions given at request of defendants, defining what constitutes fellow servants, and to the effect that if the injury to plaintiff was caused by the negligence of a fellow servant, or if the negligence of plaintiff contributed to the injury, the verdict should be for the defendants. In the absence of any evidence tending to prove contributory negligence on the part of the plaintiff, it was proper for the court to assume that there was none, but the instruction in question did not so assume. On the contrary, it assumed that the plaintiff might have been negligent in going upon the scaffold, if his knowledge, or means of knowledge, of the danger was equal to that of his employers, and that if he did so he could not recover. This was sufficient, even assuming that there was evidence tending to prove that he had, or with proper care might have had, notice of the danger. No instruction as to the law of fellow servants was applicable to the evidence, except, perhaps, an instruction to the effect that the law of fellow servants had no proper application to Scarf, who, in constructing the scaffold, represented the defendants, whose duty it was to exercise ordinary care in furnishing for the plaintiff a reasonably safe place in which he was to work, as well as safe machinery and appliances with which he was to work, and that Scarf's relation to the defendants, while constructing the scaffold, was that of "vice principal," as it is sometimes called by courts, in which relation his negligence is deemed the negligence of the defendants, and not that of a fellow servant with plaintiff, even though his work promoted the erection of the building. Congrave v. Railroad Co., 88 Cal. 369, 26 Pac. 175, and cases cited; Daves v. Southern Pac. Co., 98 Cal. 19, 32 Pac. 708; Burns v. Sennett, 99 Cal. 363, 33 Pac. 916; Railroad Co. v. Baugh, 149 U. S. 369, 13 Sup. Ct. 914; Alledge v. Railway Co. (Cal.) 34 Pac. 720; Bowen v. Railway Co., 95 Mo. 269, 8 S. W. 230; Nixon v. Lead Co. (No. 15,204; filed May 16, 1894) 36 Pac. 803. The facts of the case at bar bring it fairly within the rule of the cases here cited, for a clear understanding of which these late cases should be especially consulted. There is no error in the instructions above quoted, to the prejudice of the defendants; and if the instructions given at request of defendants are inconsistent with those, in the respects claimed by counsel for appellants, or otherwise erroneous, they are so to the advantage of the appellants, and the respondent alone could have been injured by them. The order and judgment are affirmed.

DENNISON v. CHAPMAN. (No. 15,336.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 5, 1894.)

Change of Venue—After Default Opened.

When a defendant's time to appear has been repeatedly extended, and he has finally suffered default, the court, in opening the default, can impose reasonable conditions; and, after allowing him 10 days "to answer upon merits," it may properly deny him a change of venue.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; John Hunt, Judge.

Action by W. E. Dennison against E. W. Chapman for damages for breach of contract. From an order denying defendant's motion for change of venue, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Maxwell & McEnerney, for appellant. George A. Rankin, for respondent.

McFARLAND, J. This is an appeal by defendant from an order of the court below denying his motion for a change of place of trial. The action was commenced in the superior court of San Francisco August 26, 1892, and summons was served on appellant September 2, 1892; and by various orders his time to answer was extended to and including October 31, 1892. On that day, being the last day for answering, appellant filed a motion for a change of venue to El Dorado county, which he claimed as his place of residence; but no answer or demurrer was filed. The motion was afterwards denied, without leave to renew it. On November 3, 1892, default was regularly entered against appellant. Afterwards he moved to set aside the default; and on November 18, 1892, the court ordered that the motion be granted, "and defendant allowed ten days to answer upon merits." On the last of the 10 days appellant filed an answer, and also another motion for a change of venue. The court denied the second motion, and from the order denying it this appeal is taken.

We think the order appealed from should be affirmed. It is not necessary to inquire whether the first motion was a nullity because premature, and whether, under any circumstances, a second motion could have been entertained without leave having been given to renew when the first was denied. The appellant, after his time to appear had been repeatedly extended, finally suffered default. The court, in opening the default and allowing appellant to appear notwithstanding his laches, had undoubtedly the power to impose reasonable terms. It is clear that the court did impose the condition that he should not come in for the purpose of further delay, or to file dilatory pleas, but should answer upon the merits; and it is equally clear that the condition, under the circumstances, was not unreasonable. The order is affirmed.

ELDRED v. WHITE et al. (No. 15,264.)

JUDGMENT—EQUITABLE RELIEF—PLEADING.

1. A bill to set aside a judgment of foreclosure, entered 13 months previously, on the ground that an attorney appeared for plaintiff (then defendant) without authority, must show why plaintiff did not file his bill sooner, or proceed, under Code Civ. Proc. § 473, for leave to answer to the merits of the original action, or exhaust his other remedies at law.

2. It is not enough to aver that plaintiff stated the facts of the former case to certain attorneys, and was by them advised that he has a good defense, without averring that he has such a defense, and setting out the facts constituting it.

3. A bill to set aside a foreclosure judgment should show that such judgment worked injustice or prejudice, or was without jurisdiction, or is irregular on its face.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Mendocino county; R. McGarvey, Judge.

Action by Horace A. Eldred against George E. White and others to set aside a judgment of foreclosure. Judgment for defendants. Plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

J. A. Cooper and J. H. Seawell, for appellant. T. L. Carothers and Henley & Swift, for respondents.

McFARLAND, J. This is an appeal by plaintiff, upon the judgment roll, from a judgment in favor of defendants. The action was brought on the equity side of the court, to set aside and annul a judgment and decree of foreclosure rendered against plaintiff, in the superior court, on April 23, 1890, upon three certain promissory notes and a mortgage made and executed by plaintiff to one Jacob Updegraff, and assigned by him to White, defendant herein. The main ground upon which appellant rests his claim for relief is that in the foreclosure suit an attorney at law appeared for appellant (defendant therein) without authority, and filed a demurrer for him; that afterwards, by stipulation of attorneys therein, alleged to have been forged, the demurrer was withdrawn, and judgment entered against appellant; and that no summons in said suit was ever issued or served on appellant. There are also some averments about certain unauthorized changes made in the complaint in the foreclosure suit, which we do not deem material. This present action was not commenced until 13 months after the date of the judgment in the foreclosure suit; and no reason is shown why it was not commenced sooner, or why appellant did not proceed, under section 473, Code Civ. Proc., to obtain leave "to answer to the merits of the original action," or why he has not exhausted other remedies at law, before invoking the aid of a court of equity. There is no averment or finding that he did not know of the former judgment at the time of its rendition. Although there is a general averment in the complaint that appellant stated the facts of the cause in which the former judgment was rendered to certain attorneys, and was advised by them that he has a good defense, there is no averment that he has such defense, nor of any facts constituting such defense. There is no averment or finding of the insolvency of the attorney who appeared for appellant in said cause, who was himself a defendant in said cause, and is not charged with having willfully or fraudulently appeared for appellant.

It is not averred or found that appellant did not make and execute the notes and mortgage, or that the judgment was taken for too much, or that it was unjust; and the court found that appellant has not thereby "sustained any damage." It is not claimed that appellant was not generally within the territorial jurisdiction of the court rendering the former judgment, or that said judgment is not regular and valid on its face. We think that under these circumstances the judgment should be affirmed. "Courts of chancery do not lightly interfere with judgments at law. It is only for the prevention of fraud, or to relieve from substantial injury or gross injustice, that its high and extraordinary power of interference by injunction is ever resorted to. It is never exerted merely for the correction of informalities or irregularities in legal or judicial proceedings. He who seeks to avail himself of such defects must prosecute his remedies at law. From a court of equity he can receive no countenance. A court of chancery, too, looks well to the consequences of its acts; and the case must indeed be a strong one, which would induce it to nullify a judgment at law, and thus, as here, put it in the power of a debtor to plead the statute of limitations to a debt which he does not deny to be justly due." Gregory v. Ford, 14 Cal. 143. "In order to obtain equitable relief against a judgment alleged to have been fraudulently obtained, it must be averred and shown that there is a valid defense on the merits." White v. Crow, 110 U. S. 183, 4 Sup. Ct. 71.

The only pretense that appellant has a meritorious defense to the former action is found in an assertion in his brief that one of the notes is apparently barred by the statute of limitations. But the bar of the statute is not set up in the complaint, and defendants had no opportunity to deny it, or to plead facts showing that it did not exist; and there is no evidence brought here by appellant upon the record on which he chooses to rely. He complains that the court did not make any finding as to the said matter of limitation, but there was no such issue. If the court had made a finding about the only averment which appellant made as to merits, to wit, that appellant had stated the facts to an attorney, who advised him that he had a defense, and had found such allegation to be true, such finding would have been of no consequence. Moreover, the case is one in which appellant should have asked for relief by motion in the original case; and if he had been prevented from asking relief there within the statutory time, by want of knowledge of the rendition of judgment, he should have averred that fact in his complaint. It would be unjust and inequitable to now annul the judgment, after such a lapse of time, and allow the appellant to avoid the payment of his just debt by pleading the statute of limitations in a subsequent action. The judgment is affirmed.

DE HAVEN, J. I concur.

BEATTY, C. J. I concur in the judgment upon the ground that the complaint does not show any excuse for the failure to proceed by motion in the original action.

HASSEY v. SOUTH SAN FRANCISCO HOMESTEAD & RAILROAD ASS'N et al. (No. 15,387.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 5, 1894.)

PRACTICE—DISMISSAL FOR WANT OF PROSECUTION —REVIEW ON APPEAL.

1. The superior court has power to dismiss an action therein pending for want of prosecution.

2. Where plaintiff has done nothing for 11 years towards bringing a cause to trial, and defendant's motion to dismiss has been pending 2 years, a dismissal for want of prosecution will not be disturbed.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; W. H. Levy, Judge.

Action by Francis A. Hassey against South San Francisco Homestead & Railroad Association and others to foreclose a mortgage. From an order dismissing the action for want of prosecution, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

A. C. Freeman, for appellant. R. H. Lloyd, Newlands, Allen & Herrin, and C. E. Nougues, for respondents.

SEARLS, C. This action was brought in the district court of the fourth judicial district in and for the city and county of San Francisco, state of California, on the 12th day of November, 1868, to foreclose a mortgage upon certain lands in South San Francisco. Defendants filed their answer on the 1st day of August, 1870, setting up facts which, if true, constituted a defense to the action. The case was transferred to the superior court in and for said city and county, and on the 9th day of April, 1892, was, on motion of counsel for defendants, dismissed for want of prosecution. Plaintiff appeals from the judgment of dismissal, and fortifies his appeal by a bill of exceptions.

The motion to dismiss the cause was noticed for hearing on the 3d day of January, 1890, and was based upon the pleading and affidavits on file and the affidavit of H. F. Williams, one of the defendants, which was served with the notice. The motion was not heard until March, 1892. The affidavit of Williams, in addition to a defense to the action, tended to show that, from the date of the answer in 1870, plaintiff had taken no steps to bring the cause to trial, or evinced any desire so to do, and that no action had been taken in the cause except that in 1882 the presiding judge of the superior court assigned it to department No. 7 of said court. The affidavit further shows that a large number of the defendants (of whom there were, say, 200) died, etc. On behalf of plaintiff it was shown by affidavits that the cause was, prior to 1889, several times set for trial, and on each occasion was continued by consent of Mr. Sharp, attorney for defendants, and, as plaintiff believed, there was an understanding between said Sharp and plaintiff's attorney that it should be set for trial only when it was mutually convenient for them, and that no time came when it was convenient for Mr. Sharp to try the action. The firm of Sharp & Lloyd were attorneys of record for defendants. Sharp died in May, 1878. It further appears that, in 1889, plaintiff gave to the firm of Lloyd & Wood, attorneys, notice that he would apply to have the cause set for trial, and that thereupon Lloyd appeared in court, declared that he knew nothing of the case, that Sharp had really been the attorney therein for defendants, and asked for time to notify the defendants, that they might engage counsel, etc.; whereupon it was postponed, and defendants notified, who procured counsel, and moved to dismiss before the motion was finally disposed of.

Two propositions are well settled by the previous rulings of this court: (1) That the superior court had power to dismiss an action therein pending for want of prosecution. Kubli v. Hawkett, 89 Cal. 642, 27 Pac. 57; Pardy v. Montgomery, 77 Cal. 326, 19 Pac. 530; Saville v. Frisbie, 70 Cal. 87, 11 Pac. 502; Kornahrens v. His Creditors, 64 Cal. 492; Lander v. Fleming, 47 Cal. 614; Simmons v. Keller, 50 Cal. 38; Chipman v. Hibberd, 47 Cal. 638; Grigsby v. Napa Co., 36 Cal. 585. (2) That the superior court having the power to dismiss in its discretion an action for the want of prosecution, this court, on appeal, will not go beyond the inquiry whether or not such discretion has been abused. Kornahrens v. His Creditors, supra; Grigsby v. Napa Co., supra. In the present case we find no sufficient showing of an abuse of discretion to warrant a reversal. Concede, what is evidently true, that a case should not be dismissed on motion of a defendant who has requested the postponement (Cowell v. Stuart, 69 Cal. 525, 11 Pac. 57), and that the delay for many years to bring the cause to trial was by consent or at the request of Sharp, the attorney of defendants, and it is hard to perceive how the case is materially altered. Sharp died in 1878, and thereafter, for 11 years, plaintiff remained quiescent. Again, when in 1889 defendants moved for a dismissal, and for two years permitted their motion to stand over without bringing it to a hearing, plaintiff seems to have taken no action toward procuring a trial. Under such circumstances, the court below was right in dismissing the action. The power of the court to dismiss an action under section 581 of the Code of Civil Procedure, or independent of that section, has been too often exercised and upheld by this court to leave the question an open one. The judgment appealed from should be affirmed.

We concur: BELCHER, C.; HAYNES, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment appealed from is affirmed.

STREETEN v. ROBINSON. (No. 15,260.)

POWER OF OFFICERS TO BIND CORPORATION—EMPLOYMENT OF COUNSEL.

1. Where the directors of a corporation, by resolution, authorize its vice president to sign all legal documents relating to its business, he is empowered to retain an attorney for the corporation, and to pay him for his services.

2. Where the services of an attorney are rendered a corporation, a settlement had and payment made without objection on the part of the corporation or any of its officers, it cannot recover back the money so paid, even though its vice president had no authority originally to employ him.

Action by James M. Streeten, assignee of the American Bridge & Building Company, against C. P. Robinson. From a judgment for plaintiff, and from an order denying a motion for new trial, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

S. C. Denson, for appellant. T. M. Osmont, for respondent.

SEARLS, C. This is an action by Streeten, as assignee in insolvency of the American Bridge & Building Company (a corporation), to recover from the defendant the sum of $8,967.52, averred to have been received by defendant to the use of said insolvent, and by him converted to his own use. The cause was tried by the court, and findings in writing filed in defendant's favor, upon which he had judgment, from which and from an order denying a motion for a new trial plaintiff appeals. According to the findings, the insolvent, on the 8th day of October, 1890, received from the government of the United States a check or draft drawn upon the subtreasury at San Francisco, for $8,967.52, which draft, properly indorsed, was delivered to defendant for collection, collected by him; and, with the consent of said insolvent, $5,000 was retained by him in payment for services rendered by him as an attorney for said insolvent, said sum being an agreed fee allowed him by said insolvent, and the residue was paid to said insolvent and to one Charles C. Rohlffs, by its direction and authority. Defendant is an attorney at law, engaged in the practice of his profession in San Francisco. As such attorney he was employed by, and rendered legal services to, the insolvent, for which a settlement was had, and a fee of $5,000 was agreed upon and paid as above stated. The contention here grows out of the following facts: The contract for the professional services of defendant was made by John P. Sheldon, vice president of the insolvent, the president being absent in Mexico at that time and during the period covered by the services in question. The draft was indorsed and delivered to defendant for collection by order of said vice president, and the settlement had with defendant as to the amount of his fee, the payment thereof, and the disposition of the residue of the money, were all had with, and done by the consent and order of, said vice president. The board of directors of the insolvent took no action in the premises from the beginning to the ending of the business, for which reasons appellant contends the retainer of defendant, the settlement, allowance, and payment of his fee for services, etc., were and are invalid, null, and void; and hence that the evidence showing that the employment and settlement was by the vice president, without the sanction or authorization of the directors, does not support the findings that those things were done by the corporation. There was testimony tending to show that Thomas Thomson, the president, and John P. Sheldon, the vice president, of the insolvent, owned all but three shares of the stock of the corporation; that they together attended to its business, managed its affairs, and made contracts; and that, when the president was absent, Sheldon acted as manager. There had been no meeting of the directors since May, 1890. In 1885 a resolution was passed by the board of directors, by which the president or vice president was given full power to sign any and all legal documents relating to the business of the company, after which time they, or one of them, seem to have made all contracts on behalf of the company and to have managed its affairs.

At common law it was well settled that corporations aggregate were incapable of making contracts, or of appointing agents or attorneys, except by a deed or power in writing under their corporate seal. With the progress of time, corporations have not only increased in number, but their activities have extended to nearly every class of business known to the commercial and industrial world. As a consequence of these changed conditions, and to secure that celerity of action essential to the conduct of business by modern corporations, these rules have been so far modified that, as was said by Bronson, C. J., in Gillett v. Campbell, 1 Denio, 522, "corporations, like individuals, may appoint agents, and make most of the contracts which fall within the scope of their general powers without the use of a seal." The authority of the president or other head of a corporation to employ an attorney when the exigencies of his company require it has been repeatedly recognized. Bank v. Gilstrap, 45 Mo. 419; Turner v. Railroad Co., 51 Mo. 501; Southgate v. Railroad Co., 61 Mo. 89; Insurance Co. v. Oakley, 9 Paige, 496; Mumford v. Hawkins, 5 Denio, 355; Pixley v. Railroad Co., 33 Cal. 183. Crowley v. Mining Co., 55 Cal. 273, was similar in principle, and the reasoning there, and the authority of the cases cited, seem conclusive here. We must not lose sight of the fact that the contract here was executed, —that the engagement was made by the vice president, who, in the absence of the president, conducted the business affairs of the corporation,—the services rendered, a settlement had, and payment made without objection on the part of the corporation or any officer thereof, and that this is not an action upon an executory contract, but a suit by the assignee to recover the money so paid upon an executed agreement. If, therefore, it be conceded that the vice president had no authority to engage the services of the respondent, it does not follow that a recovery can be had in this case. Pixley v. Railroad Co., supra, is conclusive of this question. The judgment and order appealed from should be affirmed.

We concur: VANCLIEF, C.; TEMPLE, C.

FITZGERALD v. FITZGERALD et al. (No. 15,357.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 5, 1894.)

APPEAL—DELAY IN TAKING—DISMISSAL.

An appeal, not having been taken within the statutory time, will be dismissed.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Santa Clara county; John Reynolds, Judge.

Action by Fitzgerald, administrator, against Fitzgerald and others. Judgment for defendants, and order denying new trial. Plaintiff appeals. Appeal from judgment dismissed. Order affirmed.

Archer & Bowden and J. H. Campbell, for appellant. Wilcox & Patton, for respondents.

McFARLAND, J. Plaintiff appeals from the judgment, and from an order denying his motion for a new trial. The appeal from the judgment, not having been taken within the statutory time, must be dismissed. The only question presented on the appeal from the order denying a motion for a new trial is this: was the evidence sufficient to sustain the facts found by the court? The facts found were these: "First. Walter Fitzgerald, deceased, did not in his lifetime enter into any agreement or have any understanding with the defendants, or either or any of them, that they would enter into a copartnership of any character. Second. No copartnership business was in fact entered upon or conducted by the said defendants, or either or any of them, with or for the said Walter Fitzgerald in his lifetime." We have thoroughly examined the evidence, and we think it fully sufficient to support said findings. A detailed statement here of the testimony as disclosed in the transcript would serve no useful purpose. The appeal from the judgment is dismissed, and the order denying the motion for a new trial is affirmed.

We concur: FITZGERALD, J.; DE HAVEN, J.

Ex parte CHATFIELD. (No. 21,128.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 4, 1894.)

HABEAS CORPUS—PROBABLE CAUSE FOR COMMITMENT.

On application for discharge on habeas corpus, asked on the ground that petitioner was committed for obtaining money under false pretenses, without probable cause, in that the false pretenses were not proven by corroborating circumstances in addition to the testimony of one witness, as required by Pen. Code, § 1110, the evidence must be taken as establishing all that it tends to prove.

Department 1.

Application of Chatfield for discharge on habeas corpus. Discharge denied.

S. C. Denson, for petitioner. Piexotto, Dist. Atty., for respondent.

PER CURIAM. Petitioner was examined in the police court of the city and county of San Francisco on a charge of obtaining money under false pretenses, and was committed for trial to the superior court. He asks to be discharged on habeas corpus, under subdivision 7 of section 1487 of the Penal Code, upon the ground that he was committed without reasonable or probable cause. His contention is that the evidence was not sufficient to warrant his being held, in that the alleged false pretense was not "proven by the testimony of two witnesses, or that of one witness and corroborating circumstances," as required by section 1110 of the Penal Code. There was, as appears by the record, but one witness to the false pretense,—the prosecuting witness; but after a careful examination of all the evidence upon which the commitment was based, and applying, as we must, the rule that the evidence is to be taken as establishing all that it tends to prove, we are not prepared to say that there are no corroborating circumstances within the purview of the section relied upon. For these reasons the petitioner must be remanded, and it is so ordered.

MALLOY v. BOARD OF EDUCATION OF CITY OF SAN JOSE. (No. 15,353.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 7, 1894.)

BOARD OF EDUCATION—POWERS—CONTRACT WITH TEACHER.

1. A provision in a city charter authorizing the board of education to enact rules for the conduct of its proceedings does not empower it to change a rule in the charter that a majority of its members shall constitute a quorum, and that a majority of those present at a meeting may transact business.

2. A vote of the board of education of a city in favor of employing a certain person as teacher does not constitute a contract with such person, and mandamus will not lie to compel her employment by the board.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Santa Clara county; W. G. Lorigan, Judge.

Petition by Alice B. Malloy for a writ of mandamus to compel the board of education of the city of San Jose to meet, and declare her elected teacher. Judgment for petitioner, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

S. F. Lieb and Wm. B. Hardy, for appellant. Morehouse & Tuttle, for respondent.

BELCHER, C. The charter of the city of San Jose provides that the board of education of the city shall consist of eight members, and that "a majority of the board shall constitute a quorum for the transaction of business, but any smaller number may adjourn from time to time. The board may enact rules for the conduct of its own proceedings," and it shall have power "to employ and dismiss" teachers, and to fix and order paid their salaries or compensation. St. 1873, p. 395, §§ 3, 50, 52. Prior to January 5, 1893, a rule was adopted by the board, and was then in force, providing that "no measure or proposition shall be valid unless passed by five votes, except motions to adjourn, to postpone, to reconsider, to commit, to lay on the table, to amend, or the previous question." On January 5, 1893, there was a regular meeting of the board, but only seven of its members were present. There was then a vacancy in the corps of teachers of the city, and the members present regularly proceeded to ballot for the election of a teacher to fill the vacancy. Seven ballots were cast, and four of them were for the respondent, Alice B. Malloy. But notwithstanding a majority of the members present, who constituted a quorum for the transaction of business, voted for respondent, the board then and there refused, and ever since has refused, to declare her elected to fill the vacancy, or to permit her to engage in keeping the school. She possessed all the qualifications for the position of teacher required by law, or the rules and regulations of the board, and has at all times been ready, willing, and able to perform the duties of teacher. Before filing her complaint, she duly demanded of the board that it do its duty in this behalf, and declare her duly elected to fill said vacancy, but it refused to do so. On February 3, 1893, respondent commenced this proceeding, alleging the facts, and praying that a writ of mandate be issued, commanding the said board, and each and every member thereof, to immediately meet as a board of education, and declare her elected teacher, etc. The answer denied that on the 5th day of January, 1893, or at any other time, the defendant board of education regularly, or at all, proceeded to, or did, elect respondent a teacher; denied that it is, or ever was, the duty of the board to declare her elected as a teacher in the said schools; and averred that the board never employed her as a teacher. The court below found the facts to be substantially as above stated, and, as conclusions of law therefrom, "that plaintiff was duly and regularly elected teacher, * * * and that it is the duty of said board to declare her so elected, and to cause the school superintendent of said schools of said city of San Jose to assign her to said position, and that she is entitled to a peremptory writ of mandate directed to the said board of education," etc. Judgment was accordingly so entered, from which the defendant appeals.

On behalf of the respondent, it is contended that the authority given the board to enact rules for the conduct of its own proceedings did not authorize it to overthrow or change the rule, declared by the statute, that a majority of the board should constitute a quorum for the transaction of business; and this is undoubtedly true. It may be assumed, therefore, that a majority of the members present at the meeting referred to had power to transact any business then legitimately before them, and requiring action. It is further contended that, as four of the seven ballots cast were in favor of respondent, she was duly elected to fill the position of teacher, and, having been so elected, the board had no right to refuse to declare the result, and hence she was entitled to the relief awarded her. The board, as we have seen, was authorized to employ teachers, but in what way the employment might be effected was not prescribed. The question, then, is, did the board, by the ballots cast, employ the respondent as a teacher? If not, it is manifest that she cannot maintain this action. Employment implies a contract on the part of the employer to hire, and on the part of the employe to perform services; and, until such a contract is mutually entered into, it can have no binding obligation upon either party. The words "to employ" teachers can mean nothing more, therefore, than that the board was clothed with power to contract with suitable persons to engage in the work of teaching in the public schools of the city for a fixed salary or compensation. The record shows that immediately after the ballots relied upon as constituting employment were cast, and presumably before respondent could have had any knowledge of the matter, the board, "then and there," refused to declare her elected. The ballots were only an expression of choice on the part of the members casting them, and had no greater force or effect than an oral vote would have had. At most, they amounted only to an offer of employment, which respondent had a right to refuse, and the board had a right to revoke or cancel at any time before acceptance. But when the board refused, then and there, to declare respondent elected, it did in effect revoke and cancel the offer, and leave nothing thereafter for her to accept; and whether, in doing so, the board acted under the supposed requirement of its rule, or by law, or independently of it, is quite immaterial. We conclude that the court below erred in granting the writ of mandate, and advise that the judgment and order be reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to dismiss the action.

We concur: HAYNES, C.; SEARLS, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment and order are reversed, and the cause is remanded, with directions to the court below to dismiss the action.

PEOPLE v. BRADY. (No. 21,071.)

CRIMINAL LAW—EVIDENCE—STATEMENTS OF CONFEDERATE.

Where defendant, in the presence of witness, by arrangement with his partner in crime, agreed that witness should accompany his partner, who should tell witness where the stolen property was, and that witness should get it, and turn it over to defendant's partner, statements made to witness by such partner, in defendant's absence, as to where the property may be found, are admissible against defendant.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; Lucien Shaw, Judge.

Joseph Brady was convicted of robbery, and appeals. Affirmed.

N. C. Bledsoe, for appellant. Atty. Gen. Hart and Wm. H. Layson, Dep. Atty. Gen., for the People.

PER CURIAM. The defendant appeals from a judgment and conviction of robbery, and asks a new trial upon various grounds. It is conceded that a robbery was committed, but it is claimed that the evidence at the trial was insufficient to identify the defendant as one of the robbers. Upon examination of the record, we consider the evidence amply sufficient in that regard. The robbery was committed by three men. It is now contended that the judgment must be reversed by reason of the admission in evidence of the statements of one of the robbers made to a third party, and not in the presence of the defendant, the day after the offense was committed. It is an elementary principle of law, which has been recognized by many of the decisions of this court, that the declarations and statements of a co-conspirator, made after the accomplishment of the conspiracy, in the absence of the defendant, are inadmissible. People v. Moore, 45 Cal. 19; People v. English, 52 Cal. 212; People v. Aleck, 61 Cal. 137; People v. Gonzales, 71 Cal. 569, 12 Pac. 783; People v. Irwin, 77 Cal. 494, 20 Pac. 56; People v. Dilwood, 94 Cal. 89, 29 Pac. 420. But the present objection and exception do not furnish a case coming within the principle of law declared in the foregoing authorities. Fairly construed, the circumstances as shown by the record are these: The defendant, in the presence of the witness, and by mutual arrangement with his alleged co-conspirators, agreed that the witness should accompany one of his partners in crime, who should inform him (the witness) where the stolen property was concealed, and that thereupon the witness should secure the possession of the property, and turn it over to the co-conspirator. In pursuance of this plan, and while the two were on the way to the spot where the property was concealed, the co-conspirator described the location of the place, and the stolen property was subsequently found at that point. It is now insisted that the statement made to the witness, in the absence of the defendant, as to the location of the stolen property, should not have been admitted in evidence. We think, under the foregoing circumstances, the defendant has no right to complain of the evidence admitted. The case stands exactly as though he himself had described to the witness the location of the stolen property. There is nothing additional in the record demanding our attention. Judgment and order affirmed.

BAKER v. BRICKELL. (No. 15,435.)

Supplemental Complaint—Entering Judgment.

A supplemental complaint, which Code Civ. Proc. § 464, provides must allege facts material to the case occurring after the former complaint, does not so do by alleging that, since the commencement of the action, defendant, at his own expense, caused the decree to be entered, in a suit in which plaintiff was defendant and B. was plaintiff, without the consent or authority of B.; the former complaint, which sought to have a trust in lands declared in favor of plaintiff because of fraud in the suit of B. against plaintiff, which was to quiet title to said lands, having alleged that said decree quieting title in B. was ordered and signed by the court, and the evidence showing that it was signed and filed before the commencement of plaintiff's action, and that, before that time, defendant had acquired B.'s title; as B. could not then impair the effect of the decree or prevent its entry.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; John Hunt, Judge.

Action by Adam S. B. Baker against John Brickell. Judgment for defendant. Plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Fox & Kellogg, for appellant. E. J. & J. H. Moore and A. N. Drown, for respondent.

BELCHER, C. The plaintiff brought this action to establish a trust in certain lands in the city and county of San Francisco against the defendant Brickell. Maria Baker Batchelder, the mother of plaintiff, was made a party defendant but failed to appear, and her default was duly entered. The case was tried, and judgment given and entered in favor of the plaintiff. From that judgment, and an order denying his motion for a new trial, Brickell appealed to this court, where the judgment and order were reversed, and the cause remanded. Baker v. Brickell, 87 Cal. 329, 25 Pac. 489, 1067. When the case went back to the trial court, the plaintiff filed an amendment to his complaint, and also a supplemental complaint. The defendant demurred to the supplemental complaint, and his demurrer was sustained. The case was then again tried, and the findings and judgment were in favor of the defendant, from which judgment, and an order refusing him a new trial, the plaintiff prosecutes this appeal.

In the opinion delivered on the former appeal the facts of the case are very fully stated, and the law applicable thereto is declared. And in the late case of Whelan v. Brickell (Cal.) 33 Pac. 396, an action prosecuted by the administrator of the estate of plaintiff's father, that decision is referred to and approved. In the record presented on this appeal the facts are the same as on the former appeals and the decision on that appeal must therefore be treated as the law of the case, and be followed here. The amendment to the complaint stated no new facts, and added nothing material to the amended pleading. The averments were simply of rights resulting from facts already stated. The demurrer to the supplemental complaint was properly sustained.

In his original complaint plaintiff alleged that in May, 1876, an action was commenced against him, then a minor about 14 years of age, in the name of his mother, Maria Baker Batchelder, as plaintiff, to quiet her title to the land now in controversy, and that in August, 1876, "a judgment and decree of the court was ordered and signed, quieting the title of the plaintiff in said action against this plaintiff as defendant therein." The complaint makes various charges of fraud on the part of the defendant Brickell in the institution and prosecution of that action, which, as found by the court in this case, were wholly without foundation and false. An appeal was taken by the defendant in that case, and in May, 1889, the judgment was affirmed. Batchelder v. Baker, 79 Cal. 266, 21 Pac. 754. The supplemental complaint "avers that since the commencement of this action, and during the progress of the first trial thereof, * * * said defendant Brickell, at his own cost and expense, and without the consent or knowledge or authority of said Maria Baker Batchelder, caused said decree in said action" of Batchelder v. Baker "to be entered, and that such entry was the first entry of said decree ever made, and was more than ten years after the signing thereof, and that such entry of said decree was ordered by the attorneys herein of said Brickell, and, being so ordered and made without the consent or knowledge or authority of said Maria Baker Batchelder, was and is fraudulent and void, and of no force or effect whatever; and that for the reasons above stated, and in plaintiff's complaint in this behalf stated, all proceedings in said action last named were and are fraudulent and void."

A supplemental complaint must allege "facts material to the case occurring after the former complaint." Code Civ. Proc. § 464. No facts material to the case are alleged in the supplemental complaint here. In the original complaint it is stated that a judgment and decree of the court were ordered and signed, and the evidence introduced by the plaintiff shows that findings and decree were signed by the judge and filed September 1, 1876. It was then and thereafter the ministerial duty of the clerk to enter and docket the judgment, and to prepare and file the judgment roll (sections 633, 668, 670–672, Code Civ. Proc.), and he could not, by neglecting to perform that duty, destroy or impair the effect of the judgment (Casement v. Ringgold, 28 Cal. 335; Estate of Newman, 75 Cal. 213, 16 Pac. 887; Estate of Cook, 77 Cal. 220, 17 Pac. 923, and 19 Pac. 431). It was therefore immaterial who set the clerk in motion to discharge this ministerial duty, or who paid him his fees therefor. He might perform his duty of his own motion, or the court could direct him to do it, or any party interested in having it done could procure him to do it. Here it appears that Brickell was interested in having the judgment entered, for it is charged in the complaint that through the mortgages which Mrs. Batchelder and her husband had given him, and the foreclosure of those mortgages, and the sale by the sheriff under the decree of foreclosure and the purchase at such sale, he had acquired all the estate or interest of Mrs. Batchelder in and to the lands in question. This was in November, 1878, and the "consent," "knowledge," or "authority" of Mrs. Batchelder that the judgment be entered in January, 1887, was clearly not necessary. She could not, by withholding her consent or authority, tie the hands of the clerk and prevent the entry. Although nominally in her favor, the judgment had become a muniment of title to her successor in interest, and she could not impair its effect. On the authority of the former decision in this case, the judgment and order appealed from should be affirmed.

We concur: TEMPLE, C.; VANCLIEF, C.

LANCASTER et al. v. MAXWELL et al.

(No. 15,017.)

APPEAL—NOTICE TO CODEFENDANT — WHEN NECESSARY.

Where, in an action to foreclose mechanics' liens, it is decreed that the land, buildings, etc., of the owner, be sold to satisfy the liens, and that if the proceeds of sale are not sufficient to pay the liens the deficiency shall be docketed as a personal judgment against the contractor, a notice of appeal by the owner from the judgment, and from an order denying a motion for a new trial, must be served on defendant contractor, under Code Civ. Proc. § 940, providing that such notice must be served on every "adverse party."

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; Eugene R. Garber, Judge.

Action by J. R. Lancaster and others against Thomas Maxwell and C. B. Gregory to foreclose mechanics' liens. From a judgment for plaintiff, and from an order denying a motion for a new trial, defendant Gregory appeals. Dismissed.

Ash & Mathews, for appellant. W. Mathews and A. D. Lemon, for respondents.

McFARLAND, J. This is an action to foreclose certain mechanics' liens. Defendant Gregory is the owner of the buildings involved, and defendant Maxwell was the original contractor. Both defendants suffered default. The liens sued on grew out of labor and materials done for, and furnished to, the contractor, Maxwell. By the judgment it was decreed that the land, buildings, etc., of Gregory, be sold, and the proceeds appropriated to the payment of the amounts found due upon the liens, and that, if such proceeds should not be sufficient to pay all the liens, "the deficiency thereof shall be docketed as a personal judgment against said defendant Thomas Maxwell." The defendant Gregory appeals from the judgment, and also from an order denying her motion to set aside her default, made upon the grounds of surprise, excusable neglect, etc. The notice of appeal was not directed to, nor served upon, the codefendant, Maxwell, and, for that reason, respondents move to dismiss the appeal.

The court did not abuse its discretion in refusing to set aside the default; and while we have looked through the transcript and briefs, and see no reason why the judgment should, under any view, be reversed, it is not necessary to discuss the other points suggested, because we think that the appeal should be dismissed. A notice of appeal must be served on every "adverse party" (section 940, Code Civ. Proc.), and adverse parties are those who are "interested in the judgment, and would be affected by its reversal." O'Kane v. Daly, 63 Cal. 319. "Every party whose interest in the subject-matter of the appeal is adverse to, or will be affected by, the reversal or modification of the judgment or order from which the appeal has been taken, is, we think, an 'adverse party,' within the meaning of these provisions of the Code, irrespective of the question whether he appears, upon the face of the record, in the attitude of plaintiff or defendant or intervener." Senter v. De Bernal, 38 Cal. 637. And it is quite clear that in the case at bar the interest of Maxwell would be "affected by the reversal" of the judgment. Appellant seeks particularly a reversal of that part of the judgment which decrees her property to be sold to satisfy the liens, and it is apparent that such reversal would be adverse to the interest of Maxwell. The appeal is dismissed.

PEOPLE v. MARTIN. (No. 21,030.)

False Pretenses—Particeps Criminis—Evidence.

1. The false pretenses charged being statements that a large judgment had been obtained against prosecutrix, the fact that prosecutrix made the transfer to avoid paying said judgment, even if it constituted her particeps criminis, could not bar the state's right to prosecute.

2. An assignment of notes, mortgages, etc., by their owner, accompanied by their delivery, even if intended by said owner to create a trust in her own favor, passes the title as well as the possession, and, if induced by false statements of the assignee, is foundation for a prosecution for obtaining property on false pretenses, rather than for larceny.

3. The state, having introduced a contract between prosecutrix and defendant for the transfer of the property, valid on its face, and not annulled by any decree in equity, is not estopped to impeach it by showing that the property was in fact obtained by false pretenses.

4. The transfer having been made under a contract, the information should charge as the property obtained, not the contract, but the valuables transferred thereunder; since, even if the contract were property, it was simply a means to the end desired.

5. The state's theory was that defendant had worked on prosecutrix to make her believe that she was in imminent danger from her enemies and their hired detectives, who desired to seize her property and person. There was evidence that defendant had suggested her moving to another bedroom in defendant's house, for fear of being chloroformed. Held, that prosecutrix's testimony that one morning she had found the gas burner, which she had turned off the night before, partly turned on, and had been made sick by the gas, was relevant, if not of much weight.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Alameda county; W. L. Greene, Judge.

Mary E. Martin, convicted of obtaining property by false pretenses, appeals. Affirmed.

Welles Whitmore and M. C. Chapman, for appellant. Atty. Gen. Hart and Dist. Attys. Chas. E. Snook, Geo. W. Reed, L. S. Church (E. M. Gibson, of counsel), for the State.

GAROUTTE, J. The appellant was convicted of obtaining money and other personal property from one Sarah E. Leonard by false and fraudulent pretenses. The information is laid under section 532 of the Penal Code, and the false pretenses upon which it is based consisted in the representations to said Leonard by the defendant that a judgment in a large sum of money had been obtained against her in the state of New York, and that her property would be seized and sold to satisfy such judgment. The information further states that said Leonard believed such statements, and so believing, and in order to avoid the application of her property to the satisfaction of such judgment, she was induced to and did transfer and deliver said property to defendant. The information contained various allegations other than those just noticed, and a demurrer was offered thereto upon various grounds, but we think the information well drawn, and our consideration of the alleged defects therein will be limited to the contention of appellant that the allegations we have in substance quoted therefrom constitute a bar to the prosecution of the accused. Possibly the state might be barred from conducting a criminal prosecution by reason of the acts of its duly-constituted officers representing the state in such matters; but it is a novel proposition that the acts and conduct of a private individual, even though such individual be what is termed in law the "prosecuting witness," could under any imaginable circumstances bar the state from the prosecution of a criminal. Appellant states her position as follows: "If, at the time that Sarah E. Leonard placed her property in the possession of the defendant, she believed that there was a valid and existing judgment for $17,000 or $18,000 against her in the state of New York, and she placed her property out of her hands to avoid its being applied towards the satisfaction of such judgment, her intentions were dishonest, and she was herself guilty of a criminal offense, and became particeps criminis." The case of McCord v. People, 46 N. Y. 472, appears to support the doctrine insisted upon by appellant, but the great weight of authority is to the contrary. It is said by the court in Com. v. Morrill, 8 Cush. 571: "Supposing that to be otherwise, and it should appear that Lynch (the party defrauded) had also violated the statute, that would not justify the defendants. If the other party has also subjected himself to a prosecution for a like offense, he also may be punished. This would be much better than that both should escape punishment because each deserved it equally." The doctrine of the foregoing case is approved by Mr. Bishop in his work on Criminal Law (8th Ed. § 469). The principle is also declared in the same work at sections 256 and 257. See, also, Cummins v. People (Colo. Sup.) 27 Pac. 887. From any aspect of the case the contention has no sound support. If the party defrauded is also guilty of a violation of the law, he, too, should be prosecuted, rather than his offense should serve as a shield to the other's crime. The offense is committed against the public, and not against the individual. The guilty party is prosecuted in the interest of the people of the state, and not in the interest of the party defrauded of his property. There is no principle of law that will bar the state from prosecuting a criminal because some other person is a particeps criminis. But, viewing the facts of this case in the light of the indictment, the defrauded party committed no offense whatever. How could she possibly do so, when the pretenses were all false, and the whole thing was but a scheme of lying and deceit? If such be a crime, she transferred no property to evade its application upon a money judgment which stood against her, for there was no such judgment. Her intention to make a transfer for that purpose avails nothing, for a person's intentions alone violate no law.

It appears from the testimony of the defrauded party, Leonard, that by reason of the statements of the defendant as to the existence of a judgment for a large amount against her in the state of New York, and for the purpose of preventing the seizure of such property upon executions based upon such judgment, she transferred and assigned to the defendant, in addition to other property, one mortgage and bond for the sum of $4,000, four certain bank books evidencing deposits in the sum of $7,381, in the name of Sarah E. Leonard, in certain banks located in the city of Rochester, N. Y., it further appearing that the defendant subsequently secured the money represented by such books. Section 1110 of the Penal Code provides that in a case like the present one, where the false pretense is oral, it must be proven by the testimony of two witnesses, or of one witness and corroborating circumstances. Without entering into a discussion of the interesting question as to whether corroborating circumstances may not be shown by the evidence of the same witness who testifies directly to the false pretense, we are well satisfied that other evidence in the record is amply sufficient to furnish the corroboration demanded by the statute. The entire conduct of the defendant, taken in connection with her statements to third parties, especially her declarations to J. J. Norman, Mrs. Hagan, and to Charles N. Leonard, when she went to the state of New York for the purpose of realizing upon the $4,000 mortgage and bond, furnish the corroborating evidence contemplated by the law.

It is insisted that, if the evidence in the case disclosed defendant guilty of an offense, it is the offense of grand larceny, and not the statutory crime of obtaining property from another by false pretenses. Conceding the distinction between these two offenses to be as claimed by defendant's counsel, to wit, that in grand larceny the owner of the property does not intend to part with the title and possession of it, while in the offense of obtaining property by false pretenses the owner does intend to part with the title and possession, still, tried by such a test, the evidence in this case determines that the information is properly laid. The proper assignment of notes, mortgages, and bank books by the true owner thereof, accompanied by a delivery, not only passes the actual possession, but transfers the title to the assignee. Looking at this question in its most favorable light for the accused, it is at least apparent that the title to this property by the assignment thereof passed to her in trust.

The prosecution offered in evidence an agreement and assignment entered into between the defendant and the prosecutrix at the time the alleged false pretenses were made, wherein the property described in the information was transferred and assigned to the defendant in consideration of an agreement upon her part to support and care for the prosecutrix during the remainder of her life. It is now insisted that, this contract showing upon its face a valid transfer of the property to the accused, the prosecution is bound by the evidence, and is estopped and barred from proving a different state of facts, and that, until that contract is set aside by a court of equity upon some ground in equity, this prosecution cannot be maintained. The contention is directly in line with the principle insisted upon by the accused upon a former branch of the case, where it was claimed that the acts of Leonard had barred the prosecution of the defendant. The parties to that contract and the parties to this prosecution are not the same. The state is a party to the prosecution, but no party to the contract. If the contract, when offered by the people, is conclusive as against them, it certainly would be a perfect defense if offered by the accused; but it is not possible that the people, in the prosecution of a defendant charged with crime, can be estopped in any such manner. The contract is simply a piece of evidence in the case, and stands upon the same plane as any other piece of evidence, and is weighed in the same scales. As tending to assist the cause of the defendant, the contract by its terms indicates that the prosecutrix parted with this property to the defendant in a lawful way, and for a lawful purpose, and that crime, or even fraud, was an entire stranger to the transaction. But the complaining witness testified that her reasons for parting with her property were those set forth in the information, and this conflict in the evidence was a matter purely for the jury's consideration. The defendant's guilt of the offense charged must appear to the jury beyond a reasonable doubt, from all the evidence placed before it; and this contract but bears its part in furnishing light—be that light strong or weak—upon the ultimate fact as to the guilt or innocence of the defendant. The rules of evidence in civil cases, as to a direct or collateral attack upon the contract by any of the parties to it, are entirely inapplicable to anything involved in this case.

We see no variance between the allegations and the proof, as to portions at least of the property described in the information, and a variance as to any particular piece of property is in no way fatal to an affirmance of the judgment. The information and the evidence appear to be in line as to the bond and mortgage, and, even conceding that the bank books were not transferred to the defendant, still the money deposited in the banks and evidenced by the books was transferred, and such fact was alleged in the information. Under instructions from the prosecutrix, the money was collected by the First National Bank of Oakland and paid to the defendant. If it was not all actually paid to her, it was deposited to her credit in the bank, and subject to her order alone, and this was in all respects equivalent to payment.

It is further insisted that the written contract entered into between these parties, and to which reference has already been made, was obtained from the defrauded party by reason of the false pretenses; that such contract of itself was property; that the property described in the information was transferred to the defendant by virtue of the terms of that contract, and not by reason of the false pretenses; and that, consequently, the prosecution should have been based upon a procurement of the contract by the false pretenses, and not upon a procurement of the property described in the information. This principle is contended for upon the ground that the pretenses are too remote from the obtaining of the property. After an examination of many cases, we are well satisfied that sound reason and a great preponderance of authority is opposed to this view. It is said in Reg. v. Martin, L. R. 1 Cr. Cas. 56: "It is impossible to contend seriously that the case is not within the statute because the chattel is obtained under a contract induced by the false pretense." Desty, in his American Criminal Law (section 149H), states the rule to be as follows: "The false pretense must be the operative cause of the transfer of the property, and there must be a causal relation between the pretense and the transfer that must directly cause the transfer. That the goods were obtained immediately through a contract to which the false pretenses induced the prosecutor to consent is no defense if a causal relation exists between the contract and the false pretense." And Wharton and Bishop state a similar doctrine. If this contract or assignment is such that it may be treated as property, and thus form the basis of a prosecution for obtaining it under the pretenses relied upon in this case, as is claimed by appellant, then we can only say that such claim shows the accused to be guilty of an additional offense, rather than that it creates a bar to the present prosecution. The creation of this instrument, whatever it may be termed, as we view the matter, was but one step towards the commission of the crime of which the defendant has been convicted. It was a part of the machinery employed in obtaining the property. It was but the first act of the play, for it was not the purpose of the accused simply to procure an execution of the instrument. Actual possession of the property was the important thing, and the creation of the writing was but a means to the end. This instrument creates no bar to the present prosecution, and the property described in the information was secured by defendant by means of the false pretense she is shown to have made.

Under objection of the defendant, the prosecutrix testified that she got up one morning and felt quite sick, and, upon examination, she discovered the gas to be turned on slightly in her room, and that she was positive it was turned off when she retired the previous night. This incident occurred when she was stopping at the Jones street house with defendant. Previously to this event she had removed to this room from a front room, owing to the suggestion of the defendant that there were a great many windows in the front room, and for that reason she was in danger of being chloroformed by detectives. The entire tenor of the defendant's conversations addressed to the complaining witness was that she was continually surrounded by danger, and that her enemies and hired detectives were ever on the alert for the purpose of both despoiling her of her property and forcibly seizing her person. It is the theory of the prosecution that this course of conduct upon the part of the defendant was all a sham and a lie, and carried on for the purpose of frightening the prosecutrix, and thereby more effectually to keep her under absolute control, that she might be more readily looted of her property, for, at these times, the defendant was posing as the one friend who was protecting her in the midst of her enemies. As a part of such scheme, and as directly in line with the suggestion of a change of room and the liability of being chloroformed, this incident of the gas escaping was offered in evidence. The evidence is somewhat remote, and the incident not directly traceable to the accused, but these objections go to its weight rather than to its admissibility, and we perceive no error in the ruling of the court in this regard. We have examined the additional assignments of error based upon the rulings of the court as to the admission and rejection of evidence, and hold none of them to be well taken. For the foregoing reasons, it is ordered that the judgment and order be affirmed.

ROBINSON v. EXEMPT FIRE CO. OF SAN FRANCISCO. (No. 15,383.)

DIVISIBLE CONTRACT—ACTION FOR BREACH—DAMAGES—EVIDENCE.

1. Where defendant agreed to pay plaintiff a certain sum each week that he was sick and disabled, the contract was divisible, and plaintiff was not entitled to recover benefits accruing between the commencement of the action and the trial, but only such as had accrued when the action was commenced.

2. Where the sickness of plaintiff is a matter in issue, a witness who has observed him and talked with him under various circumstances may give his opinion as to whether plaintiff was or was not apparently well.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; A. A. Sanderson, Judge.

Action by T. B. Robinson against the Exempt Fire Company of San Francisco for sick benefits. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

Davis Louderback, for appellant. Geo. D. Collins, for respondent.

VAN FLEET, J. The defendant and appellant is an organization, with certain fraternal and charitable features, whose membership is composed of exempt firemen. Its by-laws provide for the payment of sick benefits to any member who from sickness or accident becomes unable to earn a livelihood. The plaintiff, a member of the organization, brings this action to recover a considerable amount claimed to be due him for sick benefits, and which defendant refused to pay. Trial was had before a jury, and verdict and judgment went for plaintiff. From the judgment and an order denying its motion for a new trial, defendant appeals.

1. The action was commenced in November, 1885, but was not tried until November, 1893. At the trial the court, against the objection of defendant, admitted evidence offered by plaintiff upon the theory that plaintiff was entitled to recover for benefits accruing intermediate the commencement of the action and the date of trial; and the court also charged the jury in accord with this theory, and refused an instruction requested by defendant limiting the plaintiff's right to recover to the benefits accrued at the date of commencing his action, to all of which defendant excepted. These rulings, we think, were clearly erroneous. The idea upon which the lower court seems to have proceeded and the contention of defendant is that the contract sued on is entire, and not severable; that it imposed a duty upon defendant to pay benefits so long as plaintiff remained sick and disabled; that, the defendant having made default before suit, this default worked a breach of the entire contract; and that all damages accruing subsequently from that sickness must be deemed to have originated in the default, to have proximately resulted therefrom, and can be recovered in the action although accruing subsequently to its commencement. But we think respondent mistaken as to the character of the contract between the parties. The contract is not entire in the sense used by respondent. It is, to the contrary, in its nature severable. The obligation it casts upon defendant is distinctly separable into independent parts. It requires defendant to pay plaintiff a certain sum each week that he is sick and disabled. The right of plaintiff to this payment for any one week accrues at the end of that week, and he is entitled to sue immediately upon default in its payment. Such default, however, does not breach the entire contract; the contract still subsists as to future benefits, and the default only affects the rights of the parties as to the benefit accrued. It is obvious that it does not work a breach as to the future benefits, since, as to such, the liability of the defendant has not become fixed, but remains contingent upon the condition of the plaintiff being such as to entitle him to demand them. The accidental circumstance that the plaintiff in this instance continued disabled from the same cause subsequent to the bringing of his action, and that defendant continued to default in payment of benefits, can in no way affect the construction to be put upon the contract. Each default was a separate cause of action in itself, and the damage accruing to the plaintiff therefrom did not flow proximately or otherwise from any previous default. The successive defaults of the defendant, and the damage resulting to plaintiff from each, were as separate and apart as though arising from entirely distinct and widely-separated causes of disability. Mr. Parsons, speaking on the subject of the rule of damages applicable to a contract that is severable into parts, says: "It may happen that the injury complained of is the breach of a contract that extends over a considerable space of time, and includes many acts, or it is a tort divisible into may parts. The question then arises whether the action should be for the whole breach or the whole tort, and damages be given accordingly. This must depend upon the entirety of the contract or of the tort. If it be a whole, formed of parts, which are so far inseparable that, if any are taken away, there is no completed breach or tort left, all must be included in the demand and in the damages. But, if they are separable into many distinct breaches or torts, then an action may be brought as if each stood alone, and damages recovered." 3 Pars. Cont. c. 8, § 6. This we take to be a correct statement of the rule. If the default of defendant in the payment of any one week's benefits carried with it a breach of the whole contract, defendant could sue for and recover all damages proximately flowing from that breach; and this is the extent to which the authorities relied upon by respondent go. But the breach being separable, as we have seen, and not entire, plaintiff is only entitled to recover those benefits accrued at the commencement of the action.

2. It became a subject of material inquiry at the trial as to the state of health of plaintiff during the period for which he claimed benefits, the main defense of defendant resting upon its denial of the sickness or disability of plaintiff. Many witnesses were examined upon the subject, and a large number of exceptions are urged by defendant to rulings of the court in excluding evidence. The rulings complained of are all upon one general feature of the evidence; that is, as to the physical appearance and apparent state of health of plaintiff. It would not conduce to brevity nor subserve any useful purpose to notice these rulings in detail. Many of them were correct, but some we deem erroneous. Of the latter, one instance will serve to point the rule which should be observed by the lower court on a new trial: A witness who knew plaintiff quite intimately, and saw him frequently, and had conversations with him about his health during the period covered by his claim against defendant, was asked this question: "Well, now, when you saw him on these occasions walk along, when he noticed you, was he or was he not apparently well?" Plaintiff objected to the question as calling for the opinion of the witness, and the objection was sustained. We think the question was competent, and should have been allowed. It is true, as contended by respondent, that, to a certain extent, the question tended to elicit the opinion of the witness; but it called at the same time for the fact of the plaintiff's physical appearance, as a result of the witness' observation, and that fact the party was entitled to lay before the jury. There are many cases where a witness, though not an expert, may be permitted to state the result of his observation, notwithstanding it involve in a sense his opinion or judgment, such as the apparent state of health of a person, whether a person is drunk or sober, or other characteristic or state which manifests itself to the apprehension of the common observer. It is sometimes difficult to distinguish between that which is purely matter of opinion, and so not admissible, and that which partakes of the nature of a fact by reason of being the result of personal contact and observation by the witness, but this difficulty does not in any sense militate against the rule. There are many matters of importance to the investigation of truth that could not be established or presented to the jury if this were not the rule. Lawson, in his work on Expert and Opinion Evidence, at page 480, lays down the rule that health or sickness is provable by opinion, and cites many authorities from many states to sustain the principle. In City of Shawneetown v. Mason, 82 Ill. 337, it was held that the fact of disease, when perceptible to the senses, may be testified to by any witness. So, in the case of Parker v. Steamboat Co., 109 Mass. 449, the plaintiff sued a common carrier for personal injuries, and, on the trial, her daughter was permitted to testify that her mother "was decidedly worse than she was two months after the accident." The testimony was held proper, the court saying: "The witness had the means of observing the plaintiff from time to time, and her testimony was as to facts within her observation, and not a mere expression of opinion reached by a process of reasoning and deduction. She stated what she saw,—that the plaintiff was not able to do as much work and was not as well as she was two months after the accident." The same principle has been upheld in this state in a number of cases. See People v. Lavelle, 71 Cal. 351, 12 Pac. 226; People v. Wreden, 59 Cal. 392; and Estate of Carpenter, 94 Cal. 416, 29 Pac. 1101. In the instance stated, and several others of like character, we think the court should have allowed the evidence.

3. The court did not err in relieving plaintiff from the effect of his stipulation submitting the case on motion for nonsuit, and allowing him to file an amended complaint. It was a matter purely in the discretion of the court, and, upon the showing made, we cannot say the discretion was abused. Ward v. Clay, 82 Cal. 502, 23 Pac. 50, 227. Neither did the court err in its ruling as to the statute of limitations, nor on the doctrine of ultra vires. As to the latter question, we are satisfied that the objects contemplated by and provided for in the by-laws are clearly within the language of the act conferring upon defendant control of the fire department charitable fund. We have carefully examined the record, and find no other error. For the reasons above given, the judgment and order denying a new trial are reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

GREENEBAUM et al. v. TAYLOR. (No. 15,-251.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 5, 1894.)

Conversion of Fixtures—Damages—Evidence.

1. A demurrer to a complaint as "ambiguous, unintelligible, and uncertain" will be overruled unless the complaint is defective in each and all the points mentioned.

2. In an action of trover, a description of the property as "all the saloon fixtures on the premises No. 424 M. street," giving city and county, is sufficient.

3. In an action for the detachment and removal of saloon fixtures, it is proper to exclude evidence of the value of the fixtures when removed from their position, and considered without reference to their intended uses.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; Charles W. Slack, Judge.

Action by Alfred Greenebaum and another against J. W. Taylor for conversion. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

The property alleged to have been converted was described in the complaint as "all the saloon fixtures contained in and being on the premises No. 424 Montgomery street, in the city and county of San Francisco."

J. C. Bates, for appellant. H. N. Clement, for respondents.

McFARLAND, J. This is an action to recover the value of certain personal property alleged to have been converted by defendants. The verdict was for plaintiffs in the sum of $475, for which sum they had judgment. Defendant appeals from the judgment, and from an order denying a new trial.

The demurrer to the complaint was properly overruled. It was upon the ground that the complaint "is ambiguous, unintelligible, and uncertain," for the reason that it does not contain a sufficient description of the property sued for. It is clearly not ambiguous or unintelligible; therefore, if it were uncertain as to description, the demurrer did not reach it. Kraner v. Halsey, 82 Cal. 209, 22 Pac. 1137; White v. Allatt, 87 Cal. 245, 25 Pac. 420. We think, however, that the description is sufficient.

The property in suit consisted of bar fixtures put by respondents into a saloon on premises owned by a third party, and appropriated and converted by appellant; and whether, as between the owner of the building and respondents, they could have been removed by the latter, is a question which does not arise here. Appellant removed part of the property, detached other parts of it, and removed them from their position in the saloon, against respondents' wishes, and refused to deliver them to respondents, or pay for them. This was a conversion. There was sufficient proof of a demand. We see no error committed by the court in ruling upon the admissibility of evidence on the issue of the value of the property. It was proper to consider the cost of the property as a circumstance tending to show value. Angell v. Hopkins, 79 Cal. 181, 21 Pac. 729. And it was no error to exclude evidence of the value of the fixtures when removed from their position, and considered without reference to the uses for which they were intended. We see no error in that part of the charge to the jury to which appellant excepted. There is no reason to think that the amount of the verdict is excessive. The question whether an attorney's fee for trying the case could be allowed does not arise. There are no other points which need to be noticed. We see nothing in the record that would warrant a reversal. Judgment and order affirmed.

DE LONG v. WARREN. (No. 14,924.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 13, 1894.)

CHANGING STREET GRADE—FAILURE TO MAKE COMPENSATION—DAMAGES.

Under Const. 1879, art. 1, § 14, providing that private property shall not be taken "or damaged" for public use without just compensation having been first made, damages peculiar to property of an abutting owner may be recovered of one who fills earth into a street to conform to a new grade to which it had been lawfully changed, though he is duly authorized to do so.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; William T. Wallace, Judge.

Action by Elida De Long against C. A. Warren. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. Affirmed.

J. C. Bates, for appellant. Henley & Swift, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. This action was brought to recover damages caused by the regrading of a street upon which plaintiff is an abutting proprietor. The complaint was not verified. The answer denied all the allegations of the complaint, and averred that the acts complained of consisted in the performance by him of the work of grading Frederick street, between De Long avenue and Ashbury street, in the city and county of San Francisco; that the work was done in a good and workmanlike manner, and not otherwise; and that the damage to the property of plaintiff, if any, is by reason of the lot of the plaintiff being below the official grade of said street as established by the board of supervisors. The court found that the plaintiff was the owner of a lot having a frontage of 185 feet on Frederick street, in the city and county of San Francisco, and extending to the center of said street; that on June 1, 1890, the defendant entered upon said street, and dumped rock, sand, gravel, and other material into and upon the street in front of plaintiff's lot, and raised the grade five feet above what it was previously; that plaintiff was injured thereby, her grounds lessened in value, etc., to the extent of $350, which injury and damage is peculiar to her property, and does not affect the property of any other landed proprietor, etc.; that defendant is continuing and threatens to continue said trespass, etc., and will do so unless restrained. The court concluded the acts a nuisance, and rendered judgment in favor of plaintiff for $350, and enjoined defendant from further and like acts in the premises. Defendant appealed from the judgment and from an order denying a motion for a new trial.

We are of opinion the judgment and order appealed from should be affirmed. Conceding, without deciding, that defendant could, without pleading the facts in justification of his acts, show that the grade of Frederick street had been lawfully changed by the board of supervisors, and raised above the former official grade, and that defendant was duly authorized to fill the street to such new grade, and that such filling constituted the grievance of which plaintiff complains, and the fact is still patent that by the alteration of the grade, and filling the street to conform thereto, the property of the plaintiff was damaged, and that such damages were, as found by the court, "peculiar to her property, and do not extend to or affect the property of any other landed proprietor on said street." Section 14 of article 1 of the constitution of California, adopted in 1879, is as follows: "Private property shall not be taken or damaged for public use without just compensation having been first made," etc. Under our former constitution, which provided that "private property shall not be taken for public use without just compensation," it was held in this state, in uniformity with the decisions in most other states with like clauses in their constitutions, that persons appointed or authorized by law to make or improve public streets are not answerable for consequential damages, if they act within their jurisdiction, and with care and skill. Shaw v. Crocker, 42 Cal. 435; Northern Transp. Co. v. Chicago, 99 U. S. 635. Under the clause of the present constitution above quoted the rule is reversed, and in Reardon v. City and County of San Francisco, 66 Cal. 492, 6 Pac. 317, it was held the municipal corporation was liable for such special consequential damages resulting from a street improvement as the adjoining land proprietors suffered over and above the common injury to the other abutters on the street, or the general public. The point decided there is conclusive of the questions here, and need not be elaborated. The other points made are either unimportant or unsupported by the record. The judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

SHANAHAN v. TOMLINSON et al. (No. 15,466.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 13, 1894.)

ADVERSE POSSESSION—CLAIMS AGAINST TRESPASSER.

Section 325, Code Civ. Proc., providing that title by adverse possession cannot be established unless the party claiming it has occupied the land for five years, and paid all taxes thereon during that time, applies only to actions between the holder of the legal title and the party claiming adversely, and not to actions by an adverse claimant against a trespasser.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Humboldt county; G. W. Hunter, Judge.

Action by J. K. Shanahan against Milton Tomlinson and another to recover possession of a piece of land. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Chamberlin & Wheeler, for appellants. Buck & Cutler, for respondent.

McFARLAND, J. This is an action to recover possession of a certain piece of land. Judgment went for plaintiff, and defendants appeal from the judgment.

The court found that, from 1878, plaintiff was in the uninterrupted and quiet possession of the land in contest, having it inclosed, and using it for pasturage, and part of the time for purposes of cultivation, until January, 1892, when defendants, without right or title, entered upon said land, and ousted plaintiff therefrom, and since then wrongfully withheld the possession thereof from plaintiff. Appellants contend that these findings are not sustained by the evidence, but we are satisfied that this contention cannot be maintained. The evidence, although somewhat conflicting, was of such a character as to put the determination of the facts entirely within the province of the court below.

Appellants, in their assignment of errors, say that "there is no proof in the case that plaintiff has ever paid any taxes on the land in dispute prior or subsequent to April, 1878;" and in their brief they say that the findings are defective because they do not show that taxes were paid. No point as to the payment of taxes seems to have been raised at the trial, or called to the attention of the court. But, assuming that the point is here properly raised, this is not a case to which the provisions of section 325 of the Code of Civil Procedure, about the payment of taxes by one claiming adverse possession, applies. That provision applies to a case in which there is a contest between the holder of the legal title and a party who claims that he has been in possession for five years "adversely to such legal title." See section 321. In the case at bar, respondent is not claiming by adverse possession against the holder of the legal title. He is simply protecting his possession against one who entered thereon without right or title; and prior possession is always sufficient ground for the maintenance of ejectment against a naked trespasser. The judgment is affirmed.

McSHERRY v. GULLIVER et al. (No. 15,473.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 7, 1894.)

STREET ASSESSMENTS—LIABILITY OF LOT OWNERS—INEQUALITIES—ESTOPPEL.

1. A street assessment is not objectionable, as being unequal, because the charge for laying and curbing sidewalks was against only two lots while the charge for regrading and macadamizing, etc., was on the whole district; the resolution of intention showing that the work as to curbing and sidewalks was to be confined to the portions of the district in which curbing and sidewalks had not been laid.

2. In an action to enforce a street assessment against part of a lot defendant cannot contend that, the assessment having been made on the lot as an entirety, a release given as to the other part, on payment of its proportionate share by the owner of such part, was fatal to the right of recovery against defendant as owner of the residue, where it appeared that defendant requested the street superintendent to assess the lot as an entirety, and that the latter, not knowing the owners, assessed it as an entirety, and to unknown owners.

3. One who failed to appeal to the city council as provided by Acts 1885, p. 156, for irregularity in a street assessment is precluded from urging before the supreme court an irregularity which might have been corrected on such appeal.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; E. R. Garber, Judge.

Action by Hugh McSherry against Harriet E. Gulliver and another to recover for street assessment. From a judgment for plaintiff, and an order denying a new trial, defendant Wood appeals. Affirmed.

J. M. Wood, for appellant. D. H. Whittemore and Parker & Ells, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. This action is brought to recover from the defendants a street assessment levied upon a lot having a frontage of 110 feet on the easterly side of Fillmore street, and between Vallejo and Broadway streets, city and county of San Francisco. The lot in question was assessed to unknown owners. Defendants answered separately. Defendant Harriet E. Gulliver, in her answer, set up ownership in herself in severalty of four feet of frontage in the lot on Fillmore street, averred her willingness to pay the assessment on said four feet frontage, and that she had in fact made such payment. She further averred that her codefendant was the attorney of plaintiff, and that, with a view of defrauding her, he procured the lot to be assessed as one parcel of land. Defendant Wood denied the allegations of the complaint. The court found that defendant Gulliver was the owner of a portion of the lot having a frontage of four feet, and that defendant Wood was the owner of the residue thereof, having a frontage of 106 feet; that defendant Gulliver had paid her proportion of the assessment; and that the assessment was made upon the lot as a whole by the street superintendent, at the request and demand of defendant Wood, who was the agent of the plaintiff herein. The court rendered judgment against the defendant Wood for the amount of the assessment less the amount levied against the four feet of which defendant Gulliver was the owner, from which judgment, and from an order denying a new trial, said defendant Wood appeals.

At the trial plaintiff introduced in evidence the original assessment, diagram, warrant, and affidavit of demand and nonpayment, together with the indorsements thereon showing the due recording thereof, etc., to the introduction of which counsel for defendant objected upon the grounds: (1) That the assessment was not equal nor uniform. (2) That the item of $137.50 for laying plank sidewalks was not distributed on all the frontage within the district assessed, but was imposed upon only a part of the lots of land benefited and to be charged. The objections were overruled, and an exception taken, which ruling is assigned as error. We see no merit in the alleged error. The only apparent inequality consists in the showing on the face of the assessment that the charge for laying redwood curbs and sidewalks is only against lots 3 and 4, while the charge or assessment for sewering, regrading, and macadamizing, etc., is upon the whole district. The resolution of intention shows that as to the latter the work was to extend from Vallejo to Broadway street, while as to curbing and sidewalks it was to be confined to the portions upon which such curbing and sidewalks were not laid. This the board had a right to do, and, in the absence of a showing to the contrary, the presumption will be indulged that no sidewalks were laid except in front of the lots as shown in the assessment. Diggins v. Brown, 76 Cal. 318, 18 Pac. 373, and Gately v. Bateman, 7 Pac. Coast Law J. 364, cited by appellant in support of his contention, were decided under the act of 1872, and have no application under the act of 1885, as amended in 1889. St. 1889, p. 157.

The further point is made by appellant that, the assessment having been an entirety, the release or dismissal as to a part was fatal to the right of recovery against defendant as to the residue. Whatever the general rule may be, we think the doctrine invoked is not applicable to the present case, for the reasons:

First. The complaint avers the assessment of the lot with a frontage of 110 feet on Fillmore street, and that it is owned by defendants, Wood and Gulliver. The answer of Wood, while it denies most of the allegations of the complaint, expressly admits as follows: "Except the allegation of the ownership by the defendants, Jos. M. Wood and Harriet E. Gulliver, of the land in the complaint described, and as to such ownership defendant admits the same." There was, therefore, no issue as to ownership as between plaintiff and defendant Wood.

Second. The court finds that defendant Wood requested and demanded that the street superintendent assess the lot as a whole, and, as the latter appears not to have known the owners, he so assessed it, and to unknown owners. In such a case, defendant Wood should not now be permitted to assert that the lot was improperly assessed in such respect.

Third. The assessment being for a fixed sum per front foot, and the defendants owning in severalty each a given number of front feet, it was capable of segregation without doing injustice to either owner, and bears no analogy to a case in which a foreclosure is sought against a portion only of the owners of undivided interests in a lot against which a like assessment is levied.

Fourth. The defendant having failed to appeal to the city council, as provided by section 11 of the act of 1885 (St. 1885, p. 156), on account of irregularity in the assessment, is precluded from urging here an irregularity which might have been corrected on such appeal. Dorland v. McGlynn, 47 Cal. 47; Himmelmann v. Hoadley, 44 Cal. 276, and cases there cited.

The other objections need not be noticed. The judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

BRADLEY et al. v. ANGLO-AMERICAN GAS CONTROL CO. et al. (No. 15,449.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 5, 1894.)

CANCELLATION OF CONTRACT—LICENSE TO SELL PATENTED ARTICLE.

Under section 3412, Civ. Code, providing that "a written instrument which if left outstanding may cause serious injury to a person against whom it is void or voidable, may upon his application be so adjudged, and ordered to be delivered up and cancelled," plaintiff, who granted to defendant the sole and exclusive right to sell a patented machine in certain states, with a provision for the termination of the agreement in case the latter failed to faithfully prosecute the introduction or sale of the article, could sue to cancel the agreement when defendant, having made an agreement with the proprietor of a rival machine, with the intention that the introduction and sale of plaintiff's machine within a portion of the territory covered by plaintiff's agreement should be thereby prevented, repudiated plaintiff's right to then terminate the agreement, threatening to obtain an injunction to restrain sales by plaintiff in such territory.

Geo. A. Johnson, for appellants. J. P. Langhorne and Pomeroy & Pomeroy, for respondents.

HARRISON, J. The plaintiffs, being the proprietors of letters patent issued to one Stott for a certain gas regulator or governor, entered into an agreement February 7, 1891, with the defendant Gaden, by which they granted to him and his assigns the sole and exclusive right, during the life of said letters patent, to buy, sell, rent, and otherwise dispose of the said governor, for use within the state of California and other states constituting the Pacific slope. Gaden did not receive the right to manufacture the governors, but it was provided that he should purchase from the plaintiffs all that he might require, and that, in case he failed to faithfully prosecute their introduction or sale, the plaintiffs might terminate the agreement, and resume and enjoy all rights under it as fully as if had never been made. Gaden assigned an interest in the agreement to the defendant Anglo-American Gas Control Company, and this corporation continued to act under the agreement until May, 1892, since which time it has ceased to purchase any of said governors; and in January, 1893, Gaden informed the plaintiffs that they would no longer use this governor in San Francisco. In pursuance of an agreement between these defendants and the other defendant, the Gas Consumers' Association, the interest in said agreement, so far as it relates to San Francisco and the counties of Alameda and Marin, has been assigned to the last-named defendant. The complaint alleges that the Gas Consumers' Association is a rival and competing corporation, and that the assignment to it and the agreement between it and the other defendants are for the purpose of freezing out and wrecking the Stott patents in the city of San Francisco and the counties of Marin and Alameda, and were made in the interest of this rival corporation, and are in violation of the provisions of the aforesaid agreement that Gaden and his assigns would faithfully introduce the said governors into the aforesaid territory, and that the effect of the transfer to the Gas Consumers' Association is to exclude the Stott machines from this territory, and to entirely deprive the plaintiffs of any market therein. The plaintiffs thereupon notified the defendants that, on account of their failure to diligently and faithfully push the introduction and sale of the said Stott machines, the said agreement was terminated, and that they resumed all the rights they had before it was entered into; but, notwithstanding such notice, the defendants still claim all the rights and interests secured to them by said agreement, and that said notice by the plaintiffs is inoperative, and threaten to bring an injunction suit against the plaintiffs if they should attempt to deal in or sell the said Stott machine within the foregoing territory. The plaintiffs thereon have brought this action to obtain a judgment for the cancellation of said agreement, and that it shall cease to have any force or binding effect, and that the defendants be perpetually enjoined from claiming anything by virtue thereof, and for damages. A demurrer to the complaint was sustained, and the plaintiffs have appealed.

The relief sought by the plaintiffs is authorized by the terms of section 3412, Civ. Code, which provides that "a written instrument in respect to which there is a reasonable apprehension that if left outstanding it may cause serious injury to a person against whom it is void or voidable, may upon his application be so adjudged, and ordered to be delivered up or cancelled." By the terms of the agreement between the plaintiffs and Gaden, the plaintiffs parted with the "sole and exclusive" right to sell and dispose of the Stott machines throughout the Pacific slope, and, so long as this agreement remained in force, the plaintiffs would have no right to enter this territory and dispose of any of their machines. The condition upon which this right was granted was that the grantee would make faithful efforts to introduce and sell the machines within the same territory. An agreement by the grantee with the proprietor of a rival machine, with the intention that the effect of such agreement should prevent the introduction and sale of the Stott machine within a portion of this territory, is such a violation of the agreement with the plaintiffs as to justify them in treating it as terminated. The clause in the instrument giving to the plaintiffs the right to terminate the agreement upon a violation of this provision does not prevent the plaintiffs from seeking its cancellation by a judicial determination. The claim by the defendants that, notwithstanding their violation, they possess all the rights conferred by the agreement, and dispute the right of the plaintiffs to terminate it, gives to the plaintiffs a reason for invoking judicial action. Whether this claim by the defendants is made by reason of their dispute of the facts alleged, or of the right of the plaintiffs notwithstanding these facts, does not appear, but the plaintiffs have the right to a judicial declaration that the agreement has been violated by the defendants, and a consequent judgment for the cancellation of the agreement. The threat of the defendants that they will endeavor to enjoin the plaintiffs from disposing of the machines within the specified territory constitutes a reasonable apprehension that the instrument may cause injury to the plaintiffs. If the defendants had consented to the termination of the agreement when the plaintiffs gave notice thereof, there would be no occasion for an action, but their repudiation of the right of the plaintiffs to terminate the agreement renders the action appropriate. Even if the plaintiffs could successfully defend against any suit by the defendants for an injunction, by showing a prior violation of the agreement by the defendants, such remedy is not as complete as is afforded by the present suit. The territory covered by the agreement embraces several states, and the attempt by the plaintiffs to introduce their machines throughout this territory would subject them to the necessity of defending a suit in each of these states, whereas the present action strikes at the basis of each of those suits, and in one controversy determines the rights of the parties for them all. Whether the plaintiffs are entitled to any damages will depend upon the proofs that may be made. If the allegations of their complaint are insufficient to entitle them to introduce such proofs, it does not impair its sufficiency to establish their right to the equitable relief, nor is it any objection to the complaint that a judgment for damages and for preventive relief is sought in the same action. The judgment is reversed, and the court below is directed to overrule the demurrer.

In re IRVINE'S ESTATE. (No. 14,988.)

Review on Appeal—Weight of Evidence.

In an action against an administrator to recover a balance due on a note of decedent, alleged to have been fraudulently compromised by the administrator for less than the full amount, it appeared that $3,980 was the full amount due. Claimant testified she had received only $3,100, but could not remember the dates or amounts of the various payments. Witnesses by whom the money was paid testified that the full amount had been paid her, giving dates and amounts. A written release of the administrator, signed by claimant, in consideration of $3,730, acknowledged to have been received, and a receipt for $250 on account, were introduced. Held, that there was no such conflict of evidence as would prevent the court from setting a judgment for plaintiff aside.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; J. V. Coffey, Judge.

Petition by Eudora V. Smith, in the matter of estate of William Irvine, deceased, for a balance due on a promissory note of deceased. There was judgment for petitioner, from which, and from an order denying a new trial, the administrator appeals. Reversed.

For opinion in department, see 33 Pac. 1128.

J. M. Seawell, J. B. Reinstein, and Geo. A. Rankin, for appellant. H. N. Clement and G. W. Haight, for respondent.

HARRISON, J. The decedent in his lifetime made a promissory note to Annie M. Bascom, for the sum of $3,600, and, to secure its payment, made a mortgage upon certain lands in San Francisco, standing of record in his name. This mortgage was not placed of record until after the death of the mortgagor, and subsequent to its execution he made an agreement for the conveyance of the land to one Connolly. The money for which the note was made belonged to Eudora V. Smith, the petitioner herein; but for personal reasons the note and mortgage were executed to her mother, Mrs. Bascom. A claim upon the note and mortgage was presented to the administrator of the decedent's estate, but was rejected, for the reason, as claimed by him, that there had been an agreement on the part of the petitioner for a reduction of the rate of interest, and also that there was an unadjusted claim against her in behalf of the estate for services as her attorney. No action was ever brought by her upon the claim after its rejection, nor did she ever present any other claim against the estate. Subsequent to the rejection of the claim, Connolly brought an action against the administrator for the performance of the aforesaid agreement of sale. In that action Mrs. Bascom was made a party defendant, and she, in her answer, alleged the execution of the note and mortgage; and it was adjudged therein that Connolly was entitled to a conveyance from the administrator, but that the mortgage of Mrs. Bascom was a first lien upon the land, and that the land be sold by the sheriff, and out of the proceeds she be paid the sum of $3,980. The property was not sold under this judgment, but out of the proceeds of a private sale of the property made by Connolly the amount of the judgment was turned over to the administrator of Irvine's estate, to be applied in its satisfaction, it being recognized as an obligation of that estate. In his final account the administrator credits himself with having paid this amount to the petitioner, and this account was settled and allowed by the court. December 21, 1888, the petitioner filed her petition in the matter of said estate for an order setting aside the order settling the account, setting forth therein that, by reason of certain false representations made to her, she had been induced to agree to a compromise of her claim against the estate, and that the administrator, instead of paying her the sum of $3,980, as claimed by him in his account, had paid her only $3,100, and that the balance of $880 had not been accounted for except to the extent of $250, which in his account he had, without right, charged as attorney's fees collected from her. These averments of the petitioner were denied by the administrator, and the matter was heard by the court, who found as facts that certain representations which were untrue in fact were made to the petitioner, and that she, believing them to be true, "was induced to compromise and settle, and did compromise and settle, her claim against the estate of said decedent, and agreed to accept in full payment thereof $500 less than the amount justly due and payable to her thereon;" and, as a conclusion of law, found that she was entitled to have paid to her out of the assets of said estate in the hands of the administrator the sum of $500, and for said purpose the order settling the final account should be set aside. A motion for a new trial was denied, and afterwards a decree was entered setting aside the order settling the account, and directing the payment to the petitioner of said sum of $500 out of the funds of said estate. From this order and decree an appeal has been taken.

The court does not find in direct terms that the petitioner did not receive from the administrator the full amount of her claim, but it is fairly to be inferred that such was intended to be its finding. The only evidence in support of such finding is that of the petitioner herself, and an examination of her testimony fails to support the conclusion of the court, her only statement to this effect being that she settled the claim for $3,100; that the way in which she remembered that she got only $3,100 was that she knew that she had loaned $3,600, and got only $3,100, and did not get any interest. She also testified that she did not remember in what sums this amount was paid, nor the dates at which she received it; that she never wrote down the amounts that she received and added them up, and was not able to state the different amounts that she had received, or by whom they were paid to her. Testimony was given on behalf of the administrator to the effect that the sum of $250 was agreed upon by the petitioner as the amount due from her to the estate for attorney's fees, and the court finds this to be the fact. There was also the testimony of the witnesses by whom the money was paid, that the full amount of the balance, viz. $3,730, had been paid to the petitioner, giving the different sums and the dates and form in which this amount had been paid to her. If there had been no other evidence, the finding of the court must have been sustained, as its conclusion upon conflicting testimony; but the testimony of the petitioner was contradicted by her own written statements made at the time of the payment, and which must be regarded as superior to her testimony given nearly six years later, dependent upon a memory acknowledged by herself to be defective.

There were introduced in evidence two written instruments executed by Mrs. Bascom, viz. a satisfaction of the judgment, in which was an acknowledgment that the sum of $3,980 had been paid to her by the administrator, and a release by her of the administrator from all claims, in which Mrs. Bascom also acknowledged that the sum of $3,730 had been paid to her by the administrator. Although the note and mortgage had been made in the name of Mrs. Bascom, the money belonged to Mrs. Smith, the petitioner herein, and the business in reference thereto with the administrator of the estate, and throughout the litigation, had been entirely transacted by Mrs. Smith, who had also procured these releases from Mrs. Bascom. There was also introduced in evidence a release of all claims against the administrator and his attorney, executed by Mrs. Smith, which she expressed therein was made by her in consideration of the sum of $3,730, that day paid by the administrator to Mrs. Bascom. The defective character of Mrs. Smith's memory was shown in many parts of her testimony. She testified with reference to the Connolly judgment: "I never heard of it until recently; never until I read it here. I didn't know anything about the judgment. If I had known that the court had ordered that judgment should be paid in full, I would not have presented strangers with $500 that I could not afford to lose." Yet there was introduced in evidence a written receipt for the sum of $250, signed by herself for Mrs. Bascom, on the day the judgment was entered, "on account of judgment in my favor, and against the estate of William Irvine, for the sum of $3,980, in the case of Connolly vs. Marye, as administrator, etc., in the superior court of the state of California, in and for the city and county of San Francisco." A similar recognition and knowledge of this judgment appear in the aforenamed satisfaction and release that were executed by Mrs. Bascom, and of which the petitioner had full knowledge at the time of their execution. The rule is well established that oral testimony in contradiction of the plain terms of a written instrument, or of written admissions, should be clear, full, and precise, and that the weight to be given to any such testimony diminishes with its distance from the date of the instrument which it purports to contradict or overcome. This contemporaneous evidence on the part of Mrs. Smith is so directly at variance with her oral testimony upon the same subject given so many years later, and is so corroborative of the testimony on the part of the administrator, that we think her oral testimony did not create a substantial conflict with that given on the part of the administrator, and that the above finding of the court was contrary to the evidence. The court did not itself accept the testimony of Mrs. Smith as satisfactory, since, as it was conceded that the sum of $3,980 was due upon the note and mortgage, and she testified that she only received $3,100, there was no testimony which could form the basis of a finding that $500 was the amount that had not been paid to her. The judgment and order are reversed.

We concur: BEATTY, C. J; FITZGERALD, J.; McFARLAND, J.

DE HAVEN, J. I concur. Upon a more careful consideration of this case, since its reargument, I am entirely satisfied that the conclusion reached in the foregoing opinion of Mr. Justice HARRISON is correct, and that there is not such a substantial conflict in the evidence as to justify this court in sustaining the findings of the superior court upon that ground.

BERTZ v. TURNER et al. (No. 15,307.)

DISSOLUTION OF ATTACHMENT—JOINDER OF PLAINTIFF IN INSOLVENCY PROCEEDINGS.

An attachment is not dissolved by the subsequent joinder of plaintiff in a proceeding to have the debtor declared an insolvent.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; J. C. B. Hebbard, Judge.

Action in attachment by Jacob Bertz against James F. Turner and Alfred Clarke.

From an order denying a motion to dissolve the attachment, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Oliver P. Evans, for appellants. Wilson & McCutchen, for respondent.

TEMPLE, C. This appeal is from an order refusing to dissolve an attachment. In the notice of the motion to dissolve it was stated: "Said motion will be made on the ground that plaintiff, Bertz, has united with others to declare Clarke insolvent, and that said Bertz cannot occupy the position of attaching creditor and petitioner in insolvency at the same time in regard to the same debt and same debtor. The motion will be made on the affidavit of Alfred Clarke, served and filed herewith." No other document or evidence was produced at the hearing, except the affidavit referred to. It states that Bertz brought his action September 26, 1891, and on said day caused an attachment to be issued against the property of defendant Alfred Clarke. That October 2, 1891, a petition was filed by C. W. Mott and others to obtain an adjudication of insolvency against Alfred Clarke, and Clarke was ordered to appear and answer said petition. That on October 29th the said Jacob Bertz obtained leave to unite, and did unite, his claim which is in suit in this action with said Mott and others in the insolvency proceedings, and said Bertz has ever since participated in said insolvency proceedings. That thereby the attachment levied was dissolved by operation of law.

This being the only showing, the court could not do otherwise than to refuse to dissolve the attachment. It does not appear that the writ of attachment has ever been levied, or what Bertz did in the way of participating in the insolvency proceedings, or that there has been an adjudication of insolvency. If the plaintiff had levied an attachment, and thereby obtained security for his debt, he could not prove his debt in the insolvency proceeding, except as provided in section 44 of the insolvent act. Whether it would prevent his joining with others in forcing a debtor into insolvency need not now be determined. The mere filing of such petition would not dissolve an attachment.

There was no showing on the hearing of the motion to the effect that the indebtedness due plaintiff was secured, nor that the note on which Clark was indorser was held only as security for other indebtedness, which was also otherwise secured, nor that there had been a previous motion to dissolve the attachment on other grounds, which motion had been denied. The bill of exceptions contains some papers which might show that such a motion had been previously made, but, as it is expressly stated that such papers were not read or considered on the hearing of the motion from which this appeal is taken, they cannot be considered here. Hyde v. Boyle, 93 Cal. 1, 29 Pac. 247.

Appellant says he has another appeal pending here, and that this court will take judicial notice of its own records. For some purposes the court will do so, but an appellant cannot in that way, nor could he by uniting the two appeals, have his cause heard on evidence not produced at the hearing below. The order should be affirmed.

We concur: VANCLIEF, C.; BELCHER, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the order is affirmed.

PEOPLE'S HOME SAV. BANK v. SUPERIOR COURT OF CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO. (No. 15,734.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 11, 1894.)

BANKS—INSOLVENCY—APPOINTMENT OF RECEIVER.

Under the bank commissioners' act (St. 1877, p. 744), as amended by St. 1886-87, p. 90, authorizing the attorney general, upon receiving a report from the bank commissioners that it is unsafe for a certain bank to continue business, to bring an action to enjoin it from doing any further business, and authorizing the court, if, after a hearing, it deems it necessary, to issue the injunction, and to direct the commissioners to take such proceedings against it as may be decided upon by its creditors, the court has no power, on an ex parte hearing, to enjoin the bank from doing business, and appoint a receiver therefor.

In bank.

Petition by the People's Home Savings Bank for a writ of prohibition against the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco, restraining it from enforcing an injunction and order. Writ allowed.

Delmas & Shortridge, for petitioner. Jas. Alva Watt and Atty. Gen. Hart, for respondent.

BEATTY, C. J. On the 1st of May, 1894, the people of the state of California, upon information of the attorney general and upon complaint of the bank commissioners, commenced an action against the above-named petitioner (a corporation), and against the individuals composing its board of directors, by filing a complaint in the superior court, wherein it was alleged, among other things, that this petitioner, one of the defendants therein, was a corporation created and organized under the laws of the state of California for the purpose of accumulating the savings and funds of its stockholders, depositors, and others; that between the 14th and 27th of April, 1894, said bank commissioners made an examination of the affairs of said corporation, which disclosed the fact that it was insolvent, and that its board of directors had been guilty of various irregular practices and acts of fraud, by which the interests of its depositors and stockholders had been seriously prejudiced, all of which they at once reported to the attorney general, together with their opinion that it was unsafe for said corporation to transact business; that after receiving said report the attorney-general made an examination which confirmed all the statements of the bank commissioners. And said complaint then proceeded with formal allegations of the various matters specified in the commissioners' report, which, if true, undoubtedly made out a strong case of negligence, incompetence, mismanagement, and fraud upon the part of the directors of the bank, and very clearly demonstrated that the interests of the depositors and stockholders would be seriously jeopardized by their continuance in control of the bank. Wherefore, the plaintiff prayed: "(1) That the court appoint some competent person to act as temporary receiver during the pendency of this action, with full power and authority to take possession of all the stocks, bonds, mortgages, notes, securities, papers, vouchers, and property of the defendant, People's Home Savings Bank, and to safely keep and preserve the same, and the banking premises now occupied by said bank, until the further order of this court. (2) That the court enter a final decree and judgment for the relief hereinafter specified, and for the appointment of a permanent receiver to take possession of all the stocks, bonds, mortgages, notes, securities, papers, vouchers, and property of the defendant corporation, and to collect the assets and moneys due to said corporation defendant, and to carry out such orders in reference to the payment of the creditors as the court may from time to time direct. (3) That, upon the hearing of this case, this court order, adjudge, and decree that it is unsafe for the parties interested in the business of the corporation defendant that said corporation shall continue to transact business, and that it is unsafe for such corporation to transact business, and that such corporation, its officers and directors, and each of said directors, be enjoined and prohibited from transacting any further business, as far as said corporation shall be concerned, and that this court shall enjoin and prohibit the transaction of any further business by such corporation, and in the meantime, and until said cause shall be heard, and until the further order of this court, that such corporation defendant shall be enjoined and prohibited from transacting any further business, so far as said corporation shall be concerned, and that said corporation and directors, and each of them, shall be enjoined from the transaction of any further business of such corporation. (4) That the bank commissioners of the state of California be directed, upon the issuance of the foregoing injunction, to call together the creditors of the said corporation defendant herein, and, further, that said bank commissioners take such proceedings against said corporation thereafter as may be decided upon by the creditors of said corporation. And plaintiff further prays for such other and further relief as to the court shall seem meet and proper, and good equity require, and for costs of suit."

Immediately upon the filing of this complaint the judge of the superior court made two ex parte orders,—one for an injunction, and the other for a receiver,—as follows: "The plaintiff in the above-entitled cause having commenced an action in the superior court, in and for the city and county of San Francisco, against the above-named defendants, and having prayed for an injunction and restraining order against the said defendants, requiring them to refrain from certain acts in said complaint more particularly mentioned, on reading said complaint in said action, duly verified by the oath of W. H. Knight, C. H. Dunsmoor, and J. B. Fuller, members of the board of bank commissioners of the state of California, and it satisfactorily appearing to me, therefrom, that it is a proper case for an injunction, and that sufficient grounds exist therefor, and this being a case in which an undertaking is not required by law, it is therefore ordered by me, judge of said superior court, that, until further order in the premises, you, said defendants, and each of you, and all your counselors, attorneys, solicitors, agents, directors, and officers, and all others acting in aid or assistance of you, and each and every of you, do absolutely desist and refrain from the transaction of any further business whatsoever." "On reading the complaint in the above-entitled action, and upon motion of Wm. H. H. Hart, attorney general of the state of California, it is ordered that John F. Sheehan be, and is hereby, appointed temporary receiver to take possession of the assets of said defendant corporation, and he is hereby authorized, as such receiver, to take possession of all the stocks, bonds, mortgages, notes, securities, papers, and vouchers and property of said defendant corporation, and to safely keep and preserve the same until the further order of this court; and he is hereby authorized, as such receiver, to make collections of such sums due and becoming due to said defendant corporation as may be necessary for the preservation of its assets; said appointment of said receiver to continue until the further order of this court. And it is ordered that the said John F. Sheehan, before entering upon the discharge of his duties as such receiver, execute a bond in the sum of $50,000, conditioned for the faithful discharge of his duties as such receiver; the sureties to be approved by the judge of this court; said bond to be made payable to the state of California." On the same day upon which these orders were made, the receiver so appointed attempted to take possession of the banking premises, and all the books, papers, and property of the petitioner therein contained, and threatened petitioner and its directors with proceedings for contempt of court if they refused to yield possession. Petitioner, by its attorneys, thereupon called the attention of the superior court to what it claims was an excess of its jurisdiction in making such orders, but its motion to vacate was overruled, and thereupon they filed this petition here for a writ of prohibition, commanding said court and its receiver to desist and refrain from further proceedings upon said injunction and order. The respondent, the judge of the superior court, having filed his answer to the petition, admitting the facts above stated, and all interested parties having been heard, and the cause submitted, the sole question to be decided is whether the superior court exceeded its jurisdiction in making the orders above set forth. No objection is made to the form of the proceeding, and the two orders for an injunction and receiver have been treated as if they were one; each being supplementary to, and an essential part of, the other.

We think it clear that the superior court, in making these orders, exceeded its jurisdiction. The only authority for instituting the action is to be found in section 11 of the bank commissioners' act passed March 30, 1878 (St. 1877–78, p. 744), as amended March 10, 1887 (St. 1886–87, p. 90), and that section contains nothing to warrant these proceedings. By its provisions the attorney general is empowered, in his discretion, upon receiving a report from the bank commissioners that it is unsafe for a banking corporation to continue business, to commence an action against the corporation in the proper court to enjoin and prohibit it from transacting any further business; and the court in which the action is tried, if, after a hearing, it is of the opinion that the bank cannot safely continue business, must issue the injunction prayed for, and must then direct the commissioners to take such proceedings against the corporation as may be decided upon by its creditors. This is the whole extent of the power conferred upon the attorney general and the court by the statute, and the proceeding is purely statutory. The attorney general is authorized to proceed against the corporation alone, and for the sole purpose, in effect, of winding up its business. In other words, he represents the interest of the people in a matter of public concern. The state, which has granted to its creature the privilege of doing a banking business, by his intervention revokes that privilege for violation of the conditions, express and implied, upon which it was granted. It does not pretend to constitute itself the guardian of merely private rights of individual stockholders or creditors of the corporation, and has not empowered the attorney general, in its name, to maintain an action in their behalf against the directors of the corporation, for violation of their trust, as has been attempted in this case. His function, as agent of the state, is, as above stated, simply and solely to revoke the privilege granted by the state, of doing a banking business; and before the court can issue its injunction for that purpose the corporation is entitled to a hearing, and an opportunity to contest the allegations against it. And even after the injunction of the court is issued, as we have lately held in Long v. Superior Court, 36 Pac. 807, the corporation continues in existence for the purpose of liquidation, and, unless some further proceeding is instituted by or on behalf of its creditors or stockholders, will conduct such liquidation through its own officers and employes, subject only to the supervision of the bank commissioners, and their direction and control in certain specified particulars. The terms of the act are very clear and explicit to this effect, and the only argument advanced to justify the proceedings here in question, which clearly transcend the statute,, is that unless something is added by construction to the terms of the act, and a larger power given to the attorney general and the bank commissioners, the stockholders and depositors of a banking corporation will be left without any means of protection against such acts of mismanagement and fraudulent spoliation as are charged in this case. But this argument, even if well founded, would not justify us in interpolating into the statute something that the legislature has omitted. And, besides, the argument is, on its own premises, self-destructive, for, if the existence of a legal remedy could be inferred from the mere necessity of it, there must have been a remedy for such abuses before the bank commissioners' act was passed, for the necessity was as great then as now, and, if there was an equitable remedy then, the same remedy still remains, for the bank commissioners' act has not taken it away; and therefore the assumption upon which the argument is founded is wholly unwarranted. And again, if it is true that neither the courts nor the legislature had ever thought of devising any means of protecting the stockholders and depositors of a banking corporation against the mismanagement, waste, and spoliation of its funds prior to the act of 1878, upon what ground are we to conclude that the legislature then determined to provide a remedy, when no hint of such an intention is to be found in the terms of the statute? The most that can be said is that the law, in this respect, is no better since the statute than it was before. But it has never been held that creditors and stockholders of banking corporations have no remedy, independent of the bank commissioners' act, against the abuses here charged. We know of no case in which this court has held that they were without a remedy in a court of equity, and certainly nothing of the sort was decided in the only case to which we have been cited by counsel. French Bank Case, 53 Cal. 495. All that was decided in that case was that a court of equity has no jurisdiction, in a suit by a private person against the corporation alone, to appoint a receiver to wind up its business; the practical effect of such a decree being a dissolution of the corporation, a result which, it was held, could be accomplished only at the suit of the state. But that an action might be maintained against the directors of a corporation, in a proper case, was expressly conceded. We see no reason, therefore, to enlarge by construction the provisions of a statute which was never designed to put the protection of private interests under the exclusive care of the state, and we are compelled to hold that the ex parte orders of the superior court, above set out, were unauthorized and void, and that further proceedings thereunder should be prohibited. Let a peremptory writ of prohibition issue, as prayed for.

LYNN v. SOUTHERN PAC. CO. (No. 15,341.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 11, 1894.)

CARRIERS—INJURY TO PASSENGERS—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE.

1. Where a passenger is thrown from the platform of an overcrowded excursion car by the swaying of the train in passing a curve at a rapid rate, the jury are justified in finding defendant guilty of negligence.

2. A passenger is justified in taking passage on a crowded excursion train where defendant does not warn persons not to do so; and, even though such warning was given, he was not affected by it if he did not hear it.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; A. A. Sanderson, Judge.

Action by Mauritz E. Lynn against the Southern Pacific Company for personal injuries received while a passenger on defendant's railroad train, and caused by its negligence. From a judgment for plaintiff, and from an order denying its motion for a new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

W. H. L. Barnes, for appellant. Cope, Boyd, Fifield & Hoburg, for respondent.

GAROUTTE, J. This is an action to recover damages for injuries received by the plaintiff while a passenger upon the road of the defendant. The injuries were of a permanent character and very serious, and the verdict of $7,500 is not assailed as being excessive. The defendant appeals from the judgment and order denying a motion for a new trial. The record discloses no exceptions taken to the introduction or exclusion of testimony. Neither are there any exceptions taken to the charge of the court. A motion for a nonsuit was made and denied, and this appeal is now before us upon the question as to the sufficiency of the evidence to support the verdict of the jury. There being no exceptions to the charge of the court,—and it is possible no just exception could have been made thereto,—the law by which we are to be guided in considering the merits of this appeal is settled, and all investigation upon that point foreclosed; for the law of the case, as far as the decision of this court is concerned, is the law that guided the jury in its deliberations in the trial court.

The undisputed facts of the case may be stated as follows: Upon the 30th day of May, 1891, a legal holiday, the plaintiff was a passenger upon the defendant's train of cars traveling from San Francisco to Shell Mound Park, having purchased a return ticket. The train was an excursion train, there being a picnic at the aforesaid park. Late in the afternoon he boarded a train to return to the city, but, owing to the great number of people desirous of returning to the city at that time, he, in company with many others, were unable to secure room inside of the cars, and thereupon stood upon the platform. The exact cause of the accident is a disputed question, but in course of the return trip the plaintiff fell from the platform, and was badly injured.

That portion of the charge of the court which is material to the present investigation is as follows: "I instruct you, therefore, that if, from all the evidence given before you, you believe that the said train stopped at Shell Mound station, the plaintiff was justified in taking passage thereon, unless you also believe the defendant or its servants gave warning to persons there in waiting not to take passage thereon, and that such warning was understood, or ought to have been understood, by the plaintiff; and, if he took passage thereon without such warning given, he was rightfully a passenger on said train, and it was then the duty of the defendant to furnish him room and accommodations inside of the passenger car; and, further, if you believe that the plaintiff did not in fact hear or know of any warning given, if you believe any was given, then he cannot be affected by such warning, and was justified in taking passage on that train. Keeping in mind what I have already said to you, I further instruct you that if, from all the facts and circumstances given in evidence before you, you find and believe that plaintiff was lawfully upon that train as a passenger, within the rules just stated to you, upon the return passage from Shell Mound, and that the defendant failed to furnish him room inside the car, by reason of its crowded condition, and that he was obliged to and did for that reason stand and ride upon the platform, and if you believe that, while he was so standing and riding on the platform, the defendant, by its servants, negligently and carelessly managed and ran its said train at such a rate of speed so that, by reason thereof, in passing over a curve in said railroad, * * * that the car upon the platform of which plaintiff was so standing was, by reason of such careless, negligent management of the train, and by such rate of speed, so swayed, shaken, jarred, and jolted that the plaintiff, without any fault or negligence on his part, but by or in consequence of the negligence of the defendant, as charged in the amended complaint, was thrown off from said car and the platform thereof to and on the ground, and thereby injured, your verdict will be for the plaintiff. I also instruct you that if a railroad company receives upon its cars more passengers than it can furnish accommodations for inside the cars, and for that reason some are compelled to stand and ride on the platform, it is the duty of the company to take that condition of things into account in the management of the train and the rate of speed with which it is run. It cannot act in disregard of the actual state of things which it permits or suffers. In that case, the obligation of the railroad company to passengers whom it receives upon crowded cars is that it will furnish such increased and more watchful and solicitous care, skill, and attention as the crowded condition of the cars require. If, therefore, the crowd of passengers applying for passage or crowding upon the cars is so great that it cannot be controlled by the train officers, and thereby overcrowds and overloads the train, it is the right of such officers to hold the train until they can secure the proper control of it; and as between the company and the passengers on board, to whom tickets have been sold for the trip, entitling them to travel thereon, it is the duty of the train officials to do so, and to furnish room inside to all such persons. If they, however, proceed upon the trip without doing so, it is their duty to use the utmost care and diligence of very cautious persons for the safe carriage of the passengers, having regard to the actual location upon the train which the latter are compelled to take. The omission to use such degree of care is negligence on the part of the company."

The verdict must be sustained upon all questions where a substantial conflict of evidence is presented by the record. Measured by this test, respondent's evidence must be taken as true; and it follows that this train was traveling at a very rapid rate of speed, and while so moving, owing to the fact that it was running upon a curved track or over cross tracks, or for both of these causes, a severe jar or jolt was occasioned, which caused respondent to fall from the platform, underneath the wheels of the car. In this regard the plaintiff testifies as follows: "The train on this occasion ran faster than it ever did before. It ran very fast. * * * It ran down to the mole very fast. In my experience it ran faster than it usually did going down there. It continued at that rate of speed up to the time I fell. * * * At the point where I was jolted off, the train was going unusually fast." The manner of the accident is thus described by him: "The way I experienced it, the car was kind of going half over off the track, and gave a sudden jolt, and the way in giving this jolt I lost my hold behind me of this iron rod I had hold of, and I felt myself going, and I fell off, and that was all I knew of it. One of the jolts was made near the switch there [pointing to the diagram]. Well, it seemed the wheels struck, and kind of threw the car half-way over like. That was the sensation I had, and I could hear everybody scream. It broke my hold. I don't remember what situation I went off in, or how I struck." The witness Miss Hilda Treanor says: "After the train left Shell Mound and came down to the Oakland mole, it was running very fast. I remember about the time Mr. Lynn fell off, or was thrown off, the train seemed to lurch a little bit. When he was thrown off, I heard an outcry among the ladies inside of the car. About that time I heard a great many exclamations of surprise; for instance, 'Gracious!' and 'My gracious!' and words meaning the same thing. The lurch of the train partly threw down the persons who were standing within the aisle of the car. It had the same effect upon them as it had upon me. It threw them down. I mean by that I would have fallen upon the floor but for the people standing around me. They went over on the seats against people who were sitting in the seats. As far as I can recollect, people were unbalanced, and I myself would have fallen on the floor had there not been somebody I fell against. As it was, I did not fall right over; and, as far as I noticed everybody standing in the aisle, the same thing happened to them." Captain William Treanor says: "The train seemed to be running extremely fast, as I thought, as it came down the Oakland mole. * * * The train gave a very heavy lurch, and knocked a number of people down who were standing in the aisles where I was. I was standing up, and the young lady just inside the door, and we both got knocked down and fell over. I was facing the forward end of the car, and both of us got knocked over to the right. The women screamed. Some of them said the car must have jumped the track. I cannot remember that the car slowed up prior to that time. * * * The train ran faster than I have been in the habit of feeling trains run. * * * I thought it ran faster than I had ever seen it run on that road. * * * But where I saw the lurch down on the mole, I could not positively define the point. It was running at an extraordinary fast rate of speed." The testimony of these witnesses is controlling upon these questions, and applying the law given by the trial court to the jury as to the great care which should be exercised by a common carrier where the cars were so heavily overloaded as in the present case, the jury were entirely justified in saying that the defendant was guilty of negligence in running its train at the rate of speed that this train was moving; especially in view of the defects in the track or roadbed, whatever they may have been, that caused the jar or jolt to the cars which, as we have seen, so greatly disturbed the passengers. The defendant should not have allowed so many passengers to have gone upon its cars, and, if it was unable to prevent them from so doing, it had the right to refuse to move the train under such circumstances; but if it did not pursue that course, and undertook to transport all passengers that were on board, whether within the cars or upon the platforms, it was under obligations to exercise the additional care commensurate with the perils and dangers surrounding the passengers by reason of the overcrowded condition of the cars.

Was the plaintiff guilty of contributory negligence? In view of the instructions of the court, it is clear that he was not. In speaking as to the claim of the defendant that warning was given, the court instructed the jury: "If you believe the plaintiff did not in fact hear or know of any warning given, if you believe any was given, then he cannot be affected by such warning, and was justified in taking passage on that train." The plaintiff testified in unequivocal terms that he did not hear or know of any warning given, and many other passengers testified to the same effect with reference to themselves. The evidence in this regard is sufficient to create a substantial conflict as to whether in fact the passengers were warned not to crowd the train, and that a second train would soon arrive; but, beyond the question of conflict of evidence, the plaintiff says he heard and knew of no such warning; and, under the law given to the jury which we have just quoted, he had a right under those circumstances to go upon the train; and, if there was no room within the car, he then had a right to stand and ride upon the platform; and, being so situated by the force of circumstances over which the defendant, as we have seen, had complete control, he was a lawful passenger, with all the rights of any other passenger, and entitled to the same care and consideration at the hands of the company. The fact that he was compelled to stand upon the platform, and was thus more unfortunate and more inconvenienced than his friends who were able to crowd within the car, is wholly immaterial. Their legal rights were the same. The duties and obligations of the defendant to them were the same.

It is claimed the verdict is contrary to law, in this: that the court charged the jury that if they found as a fact that other cars, reasonable in number and seating capacity, were produced by the defendant within a reasonable time, prior to or after the time at which plaintiff took his position on the car, and on which plaintiff might have safely ridden, and that plaintiff was apprised thereof, an eager desire on his part to take the overcrowded car in order to reach his destination was not a reasonable cause of necessity. The evidence covered by the instruction substantially stated above is not such as to make the question one of law. It may be said that the evidence is fairly conflicting, both as to the additional accommodations to be furnished and that the plaintiff was apprised thereof. Again, all presumptions are in favor of the verdict; and, if the court's charge includes instructions of law sufficient to support the verdict when applied to the evidence found in the record, then the verdict must be upheld, even though there be no sufficient evidence to support the verdict upon some other theory of the case covered by other instructions of the court. It follows that if the evidence, when considered in the light of the law we have quoted, is sufficient to support the verdict, then the verdict cannot be against law.

We also think the motion for a nonsuit was properly denied. Much that we have already said as to the sufficiency of the evidence to support the verdict is opposed to appellant's contention in this regard. As we have seen, the evidence established a want of proper care in the running of the train at a high rate of speed, and doubly so when we consider that defects in the track or other causes existed which caused the severe jolting and jarring of the cars. Neither was the plaintiff guilty of contributory negligence in riding upon the platform under the circumstances depicted by his evidence. The law given to the jury by the court upon this point is entirely sound. For the foregoing reasons, it is ordered that the judgment and order be affirmed.

KELLEY et al. v. PLOVER et al. (No. 15,401.)

APPEAL—RECORD—MECHANICS' LIENS.

1. An objection that the statement on motion for new trial was settled out of due time, and that respondent's bill of exceptions to the settlement on that account is omitted from the transcript, unless the record show the untimeliness of the settlement, can only be raised by suggesting diminution of the record, and moving for an order to certify the bill of exceptions.

2. In the notice of lien, a statement of the terms of payment as "cash on completion of contract" is sufficient.

3. Where subcontractors have guarantied the contractor's performance, his failure to perform and the guaranty must be specially pleaded to an action by the subcontractors to enforce their lien.

Action by George W. Kelley and others against Patrick Plover and others to enforce a mechanic's lien. Judgment for plaintiffs. Defendant Plover appeals. Affirmed.

Lloyd & Wood, for appellant. Vincent Neale, for respondents.

HAYNES, C. This action was brought by plaintiffs, as copartners, to enforce a lien for materials furnished by them to the contractors, Kirlan & Brady, for the repair of buildings owned by appellant, Plover. Plaintiffs had judgment, defendants' motion for a new trial was denied, and this appeal is from the judgment and the order denying a new trial.

Respondents insist that the appeal from the order denying a new trial should not be considered, because the statement on motion for a new trial was not settled in time, and that the transcript omits a bill of exceptions taken by respondents to the settlement of the statement upon that ground. The record, however, does not show that the statement was not prepared in time. If the transcript on appeal was defective in that regard, respondents should have suggested a diminution of the record, and obtained an order requiring the bill of exceptions to be certified to this court. Kirlan & Brady, the contractors, and several fictitious persons, were named as defendants, but were not served, and did not appear, and no disposition of the cause was made as to them. No objection was made in the court below to proceeding with the trial of the cause, and by section 579, Code Civ. Proc., the court was authorized to render judgment against the appellant without determining the liability of the other defendants.

The claim or notice of lien filed in the recorder's office contained the following: "The following is a statement of the terms, time given, and condition of said contract, to wit: 50 M. 1½ P. laths, $175 [stating each item of the claim]. Terms cash on completion of contract." Appellant contends that this statement does not comply with the statute, and cites Hooper v. Flood, 54 Cal. 219. There the statement was: "That the terms, time given, and conditions of said contract are and were cash;" and it was held that this statement was not a compliance with the statute; that the word "cash" did not express the terms, time given, and conditions of the contract. But here the word "cash" is followed by the words "on completion of the contract," so that the time and manner of payment are expressed; and it cannot be presumed, in the absence of allegation and proof, that these did not include all the conditions of the contract. In Tredinnick v. Mining Co., 72 Cal. 80, 13 Pac. 152, the statement was "that the terms of payment for said labor were cash as soon as said labor was performed." Held sufficient. In Blackman v. Marsicano, 61 Cal. 638, the words were, "Cash upon demand, in gold coin of the United States." The court distinguished the case from Hooper v. Flood, supra, and held the statement sufficient. See, also, Hills v. Ohlig, 63 Cal. 104, and Jewell v. McKay, 82 Cal., at pages 151, 152, 23 Pac. 139. The court did not err in admitting the notice in evidence.

The contract between the owner and Kirlan & Brady, below the signatures of the party, had written thereon the following: "We witness and secure the performance of this contract for the second party. Kelley, Hare & Co. pr. J. W. Hodgkin." The second parties to the contract were the contractors, Kirlan & Brady. The defendant gave evidence tending to prove that the contractors did not complete the work they agreed to do, and that the work performed was badly done, and claims that plaintiffs had guarantied the performance of the contract. No such defense was set up in the answer, nor was there any finding or request to find thereon, and, if there had been, it would have been outside of the issues. No other points are made by appellant. The judgment and order appealed from should be affirmed.

We concur: VANCLIEF, C.; SEARLS, C.

STEEN v. HENDY et al. (No. 15,313.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 11, 1894.)

JUDGMENT ROLL—REPORT OF REFEREE — EFFECT OF FORMER DECISION — USE OF TRUST FUNDS—PROFITS—COSTS—REVIEW.

1. The finding of a referee which Code Civ. Proc. § 670, provides shall be part of the judgment roll, is only his finding on the whole issue, which section 644 provides shall stand as the finding of the court; and, where he is not to report findings which shall be the basis of a judgment, his report is not part of the judgment roll.

2. Where a decision on appeal gave plaintiff an option to accept a modified judgment or have a new trial, and he elects to have a new trial, his rights will depend on the facts as shown on the new trial.

3. Where a person of large means and good credit, who can borrow all the money he needs at current rates, uses in his manufacturing business, which has been long established and is paying large profits, a comparatively small sum of money which he holds in trust to turn over to the beneficiary, such profits are not earned by the trust funds, and the beneficiary is only entitled to compound interest on his money.

4. Though, on a former appeal, it was decided that plaintiff might have compound interest on a trust fund to the time that the judgment appealed from was rendered, or might have a new trial to determine the profits that had been realized by defendant from the use of the trust fund, still, it having been found on a new trial that no profits were made thereon, or that it could not be determined what they were, plaintiff should have been allowed interest compounded, not to the time of the former judgment, but to that rendered on the new trial.

5. Costs in an equity case, being a matter of discretion, cannot be reviewed without a statement or bill of exceptions.

Action by E. T. Steen (substituted for J. W. Faulkner) against Joshua Hendy and the Joshua Hendy Machine Works. From the judgment, plaintiff appeals. Modified.

Clark E. K. Royce, for appellant. Cope, Boyd & Fifield, W. H. H. Hart, and Nowlin & Fassett, for respondents.

TEMPLE, C. This is an action for an accounting, and has been pending 17 years. This is the second appeal to this court, the first being reported in 80 Cal. 636, 22 Pac. 401, where a full statement of the facts may be found. Prior to the entry of the judgment which was before the court on the first appeal, the amount of money belonging to Steen which defendant Hendy had received was fixed by stipulation. On the sum so agreed upon, the court allowed interest at the rate of 1¼ per cent. per month, compounded monthly. The defendant appealed, complaining of this rate of interest. One ground upon which the rate was defended here was that Hendy held the money as trustee for Steen, and had wrongfully used the funds in his business, in which he had realized a profit greatly exceeding the rate of interest allowed. This court decided that the rate could not be allowed, and remanded the case, with leave to the plaintiff "to file a supplemental and amended complaint, charging the defendant with profits actually realized from the use of the trust fund, upon which the cause may be tried anew." Otherwise the direction was that, without a new trial, interest be computed on the balance due the defendant June 2, 1875, at the legal rate, till March 11, 1876, and credited to defendant, interest to be computed at legal rates on the sums collected by defendant from time to time between June 2, 1875, till the commencement of the action, and charged against the defendant; upon the balance then found, interest to be computed at legal rates, with annual rests, until the time of the first decree, from which time only simple interest shall be allowed. When the case reached the lower court, plaintiff filed a supplemental and amended complaint, as permitted by the order of this court. February 27, 1891, the trial court referred the case to E. B. Young, Esq., "to inquire what profits the defendants, or either of them, have actually realized by the use of the money or property of the plaintiff, or in which the plaintiff had an interest, since June 2, 1875, and to state any and all profits actually realized by such use, and report a statement of the same." The order then proceeds to specify at length, and with considerable particularity, what matters and questions the referee shall investigate and determine, and also directs him, at request of either party, to "make special findings upon any question of fact which may arise during the trial before him, and state and report any other matter touching the true state of the account between the parties." The referee had full power to take evidence, and was to return with his report all testimony and evidence and proceedings had and taken before him. August 17, 1892, the referee not having reported, the court made a second order of reference, as follows: "By agreement of parties hereto, it is ordered that the evidence taken before the Hon. W. T. Wallace be, and the same is hereby, submitted to E. B. Young, the referee heretofore appointed herein, for his consideration. It is further ordered that the said referee shall report findings of fact and conclusions of law herein, and a judgment thereon. It is further ordered that nothing in this order contained shall affect in any manner or way any order heretofore made in the above-entitled action. Done in open court, this 17th day of August, 1892. William T. Wallace, Judge." Since, by this last order, the referee was to report findings of fact, conclusions of law, and a judgment, it is difficult to discover any utility in requiring the referee to answer all the numerous questions propounded by the court and by counsel under the leave given in the first order of reference. However, if it had been doubtful before,—as I think it was not,—the second order makes it certain that under the first order of reference the referee was not expected to report findings of fact which should be the basis of a judgment. On the 5th of November, 1892, the referee filed two reports, both of which are printed in the transcript. One is entitled by the referee "Report of E. B. Young, Referee, under Order of Court, Filed Herein March 2, 1891." The first order was filed on the last-mentioned date. This report is a lengthy statement of the substance of the testimony, the reasons of the referee for certain conclusions, and why certain questions cannot be answered, and the answers of the referee to a great many questions propounded by the court and by counsel. It contains also arguments with citations of authorities, and in some cases refers to specified testimony, which presumably was filed with the report, but is not in the transcript for answers to certain questions. The other report contains formal findings of fact, conclusions of law, and a judgment.

This appeal is taken by the plaintiff upon the judgment roll alone. His principal points are based to some extent upon the conclusions of the referee, as shown in the report made under the first order of reference, and that report is constantly referred to for facts to sustain appellant's contention. Respondents contend that this report does not legally constitute a part of the record, and cannot be referred to for any purpose. On this proposition I think respondents' contention must be sustained. If the report of a referee is part of a judgment roll, it must be on the ground that it is a finding. Code Civ. Proc. § 670. We find from the Code that a reference may be had either to try an issue or to ascertain a fact necessary to enable the court to determine an action or proceeding (Id. § 638); and (in section 639) (1) to decide the whole issue or determine a specified part; (2) to take an account for the information of the court before or after judgment; (3) to determine a question of fact not arising from the pleadings; and (4) when necessary for the information of the court in a special proceeding. The finding of a referee upon the whole issue must stand as the finding of the court, and judgment may be entered thereon. Id. § 644. This must be the finding referred to in section 670. As the report made under the first order of reference is not such a finding, it does not constitute a part of the judgment roll.

Appellant, to sustain the proposition that the report is a part of the judgment roll, cites Thompson v. Patterson, 54 Cal. 542. That case was decided in department, and the opinion was written by Mr. Justice McKee. In that opinion he used the following language: "But errors 'shown and illustrated by the findings and report of a referee on its face' are part of the judgment roll of a case; for a referee appointed to try and determine a case is, quoad the trial of the case, in the place of the court, and his findings and report are the equivalent of the findings and decision of the court itself." "When a referee," says the court in Harris v. Railroad Co., 41 Cal. 393, "reports his decision in the whole case, his report stands as a special verdict." "The finding and report of a referee are therefore part of the judgment roll of a case." The court was evidently considering the case of a referee to try a case and report a judgment, in which case it is true the findings and decisions take the place of findings and decisions of the court, and such papers and no others constitute the judgment roll when the case is tried by a referee as would if the case were tried by the court. The ambiguous use of the word "report" is taken from Harris v. Railroad Co., where section 187 of the practice act was under consideration. In that section the word "report" is evidently used for "finding" or "decision." In section 670 of the present Code the word "finding" was substituted for "report." That case, therefore, is not authority for appellant, and this appeal must be considered upon the judgment roll alone.

Appellant contends that there is no finding upon certain issues. Conceding, however, that upon all those issues findings had been for the plaintiff, they could not affect the conclusion which it seems to me must be reached in the case. In addition to the facts found on the first trial, the court now finds that Hendy conducted the business in which he and plaintiff were jointly interested under the belief that Hendy was the sole owner of the goods, and that Steen only had the right to compensation for his services, which it was agreed should be one-half of the net profits; that prior to the 2d day of June, 1875, Hendy was the owner of a large amount of real and personal property, greatly in excess of the value of the property in which Steen was interested, and subsequently to that date became the owner of large amounts of real and personal property, and was successfully engaged in various business enterprises from which he made large profits, and others in which he made large losses; and that he used in his business and kept but one bank account, in which all moneys, including the fund in which Steen was interested, were deposited; also that "it is impossible in any manner or way to ascertain the actual profits realized by the said Joshua Hendy and the defendant corporation since the 2d day of June, 1875, from the use of his own money individually, or from the moneys received by him, the said Joshua Hendy, from the sales of property in which the said Steen and the said Hendy were jointly interested, as aforesaid, or from the use by the said Hendy and the said corporation of the moneys received by said Hendy of the moneys belonging to said Steen;" that June 23, 1891, Hendy paid plaintiff $10,308.53, which was the full sum of money received by Hendy for the use of plaintiff. The corporation defendant was organized by Hendy, and he practically owned all the stock, and had entire control and management of it. No notice need therefore be taken of it as an entity distinct from Hendy, further than to say that there is no foundation for appellant's charge that it was organized to confuse the accounts and prevent plaintiff from following his property, or that it did have any such effect. On the contrary, it was found, and must be taken as true, that Hendy did not suppose that the moneys were received or held by him as the trustee of Steen. The court, having found that the actual profits cannot be ascertained, gave the plaintiff interest in lieu of profits, calculated as directed by this court on the first appeal, but allowed only simple interest from the date of the first judgment. Appellant is not satisfied with this decree. He says the former judgment of this court gave him the option to accept a judgment for interest, or to claim actual profits; that he exercised this privilege by electing to take the actual profits, and therefore the decree entered is a denial of the relief which it was expressly decided on the former appeal that he was entitled to; that the difficulty in determining actual profits arises from the fault of defendant, who wrongfully mingled the funds; that, under such circumstances, the burden of separation should be placed on defendant. He says: "The plaintiff claims that he is entitled to take so much or all or any one or more pieces or parcels of property now held by the defendant, or either of them, purchased with the common fund, or any part thereof, as the defendants cannot show to be theirs." It is true, plaintiff was given an option either to accept a modification of the judgment, or to have a new trial, and he elected to have a new trial; and his rights must now be determined from the facts as shown upon the new trial. Upon the last trial an important fact was established which was not found upon the first trial, to wit, that it is impossible to ascertain the actual profits, either upon the money held in trust, or upon the fund with which such money was mingled. So far as this new fact can affect the determination of the case, the former decision is not controlling.

Appellant gives certain figures showing an increase in the value of Hendy's assets, which he claims should be taken as profits; but no such figures appear in the findings, nor can we say, in the absence of a statement, that there was any evidence from which any such conclusion could be reached. On the contrary, the finding is that such profits cannot be ascertained. All presumptions are in favor of the correctness of these findings, in the absence of the statement. We may suppose, as the respondent contends the facts were shown to be, that the defendant had for years been conducting a large business, in which he had invested a capital in comparison to which the trust fund was insignificant; that in this business he was making large profits in the manufacture and sale of machinery, invented and patented by himself; that it was shown that the profits came mostly from the sale of patented articles; that Hendy had good credit, and could have procured all the money he needed at current rates; and that the comparatively small sum of trust money used was not essential to the business, and did not add materially to the profits. Now, if these facts were shown, admitting, as it does not appear from the findings was the case, that such profits can be determined, is it a profit which in any sense was earned by the use of the trust fund? Lord Brougham, in Docker v. Somes, 2 Mylne & K. 655, answers this question. He says such gains are not profits, but the earnings "of skillful labor, very highly paid, and no reasonable person would ever dream of charging a trustee whose skill, thus bestowed, had so enormously augmented the value of capital, as if he had only obtained from it a profit." The English cases hold that profits earned because of the good will of a business cannot be shared by a beneficiary under such circumstances, and that allowances should also be made for the amount earned by the business management of the members of a firm in whose business trust money has been wrongfully used; not as compensation for managing the fund, but because the profits are taken, not as a right in the beneficiary, but pursuant to a principle of the public policy, which is to take from the trustee all advantage which he has gained through the misappropriation of the trust money. See Brown v. De Tastet, Jac. Ch. 284; Crawshay v. Collins, 2 Russ. 325; Featherstonhaugh v. Turner, 25 Beav. 382; Willett v. Blanford, 1 Hare, 253. Trusts are as various as human affairs, and these rules might not hold in all cases; as, for instance, where the trustee is required to invest the fund for his beneficiary, or where the money was invested in a single venture or constituted the trading capital. Often, as here, the trustee is under no obligation to earn a profit for the beneficiary, and the wrong done to him consists in not paying the money, and in risking it in his business. Here the position of a trustee is very similar to a debtor who neglects paying his debt. Yet, although the beneficiary is not injured by such use of the money, and there has not even been a wrongful delay in payment, the law intercepts the profits, and gives them to the beneficiary, in obedience to the policy which, that trustees may not be tempted to use trust money for their own advantage, provides that, though he may lose, he shall never gain, by such misuse of the funds. In this case it is to me quite obvious that the profits, conceding that they have been thus made, were not earned by the use of the trust fund, and that Hendy did not reap any greater advantage from the use of the money than has been allowed to plaintiff. I think no case can be found, where the circumstances are at all similar, in which a more favorable judgment has been given.

Nor do I think it was through Hendy's fault that the profits cannot be ascertained. in any other sense than that it was through his fault that the money was used by him at all. The amount of the trust fund was agreed upon since this suit was brought, and has been paid over. It cannot be claimed that Hendy has taken any pains to confuse the accounts so as to prevent inquiry or obstruct investigation. The money was already blended with his by the very nature of the original contract. Hendy could not separate the funds from his, or even determine the amount of it. This could only be done by settlement, through agreement or litigation. Much the larger portion of the proceeds of the property in which Steen was interested confessedly belonged to Hendy. The articles were sold one by one, and to determine Steen's portion of the proceeds of each article, as respondents justly observe, requires the determination of a quantum meruit,—a determination which could not be made by Hendy. Now, Steen was only interested in the net profit, one-half of which also belonged to Hendy. It is not reasonable to require Hendy to keep all this capital idle because Steen had a small interest in it, which Hendy could not ascertain until their relative rights should be agreed upon or determined by litigation. Because the parties, after several years of litigation, agreed upon Steen's share, appellant now seeks to have the court regard it as though it had once been a distinct trust fund in Hendy's hands. The money never had any earmarks, and therefore none have been lost through Hendy's fault. Nor is this going against the conclusion reached on the former appeal. It was there simply held that Hendy held the money in a fiduciary capacity, and must account for all profit made from it or pay compound interest. It now appears that, though the money has been used by Hendy, no profits have been made which can justly be said to be profits made by the use of the trust fund. I think it also appears pretty conclusively that the judgment takes from Hendy all possible advantage he could have gained through the use of the trust money. Steen gets all that justly belongs to him, and the rule of public policy applicable to the matter is fully vindicated.

I think, however, the court erred in providing that compound interest should be allowed only until the entry of the first judgment. The rule for casting interest indicated in the former judgment of this court was upon the hypothesis that there would be no new trial or new judgment. It provided for a modification of the existing judgment. Of course, then, the court would not provide for compounding interest after the entry of the judgment, for the Code determines the interest which judgments shall bear. Since that judgment was set aside, however, the date of its entry becomes an immaterial circumstance. Interest should have been compounded to the date of the present judgment, but a new trial will not be required. The case being in equity, the allowance of cost was a matter within the discretion of the court. Without a statement or bill of exceptions, that discretion cannot be reviewed here. I think the case should be remanded, with directions to the trial court to modify the decree by allowing compound interest up to the entry of judgment, and that in other respects the judgment be affirmed.

We concur: HAYNES, C.; SEARLS, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the cause is remanded, with directions to the trial court to modify the decree by allowing compound interest up to the entry of the judgment, and in all other respects the judgment is affirmed.

BUCKMAN et al. v. CUNEO. (No. 15,287.)

Lien of Street Assessment — Extension of Time for Completion of Work — Recording Engineer's Certificate.

1. Under Act March 18, 1885, § 6, providing that the street superintendent shall fix a time for completion of work under any contract made with him, which may be extended from time to time, an extension may be granted before a previous extension has taken effect, to begin at the expiration of such previous extension.

2. By act of March 14, 1889, the recording of the engineer's certificate of work done in grading a street is necessary to make an assessment therefor a lien. Held, that failure to record a diagram drawn on the back of such certificate, referred to therein, and a necessary part thereof, is fatal to the lien

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; John Hunt, Judge.

Action by A. E. Buckman and others against Joseph Cuneo to foreclose the lien of a street assessment. From a judgment for defendant, and an order denying a new trial, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

J. C. Bates, for appellants. J. P. Langhorne, for respondent.

FITZGERALD, J. Action to foreclose an alleged street assessment lien upon the defendant's lot. Defendant had judgment, and plaintiffs appeal therefrom, and from the order denying their motion for a new trial. The facts necessary to be stated with reference to the points upon which this decision must rest are as follows: On March 7, 1890, the board of supervisors of the city and county of San Francisco, in pursuance of the act of March 18, 1885, and the act amendatory thereof approved March 14, 1889, passed a resolution of intention, declaring "that Jones street, from the southerly line of Chestnut street to Montgomery avenue, be graded to the official line of grade." On August 13, 1890, the superintendent of streets contracted with one C. D. Vincent to do the work, the contract providing that the work should be completed within 90 days from the date thereof. After five extensions of time had been granted for the performance of the contract, the first four of them for 90 days and the last for 30 days, the work, except that part of it shown by the engineer's certificate, was completed about the 16th of November, 1891, at which time the assessment was issued therefor, whereby plaintiff's lot was assessed, as alleged in the complaint. It further appears that as the work progressed the city engineer made certificates from time to time in relation to its performance, the last of which is in the words and figures following, to wit: "No. 552. San Francisco, Oct. 29, 1891. I certify I have examined the work of grading Jones street from Francisco to Montgomery avenue, and find work to official lines and grades, except per line as shown on back of this certificate. Emb. 6,760 cubic yards. $40.00. A. E. Buckman, Contractor. C. S. Tilton, City Engineer." On the back of this certificate was a diagram made by the city engineer, showing the easterly and westerly lines of Jones street between Francisco street and Montgomery avenue, and showing that the embankment and filling necessary to complete the grading of Jones street between the streets referred to had not been filled and graded up to the easterly line of Jones street, as required by the terms of the contract, by reason of the projection of a house into the easterly side of Jones street, and beyond its easterly official line westwardly to a depth of 2 feet and of the length of 20 feet. The engineer's certificate referred to was recorded, but the diagram made by him on the back thereof was not recorded. Afterwards a warrant was issued by the superintendent, to which was attached the assessment, diagram, and the foregoing engineer's certificate, which were delivered by him to the assignees of the original contractor, who thereupon went upon the said lot of defendant, which it appears was assessed to an unknown owner, and publicly demanded payment of the sums of money so assessed by the superintendent thereon for said work. Neither the whole nor any part of the sums so demanded was paid, and thereafter, and within 30 days from the date thereof, the warrant was returned to the superintendent of streets with a verified return of one of the assignees indorsed thereon, setting forth the nature and character of the demand, and that the sums so demanded were unpaid. This return was duly recorded by the superintendent of streets on March 9, 1891, and thereafter, on March 12, 1892, the complaint in this action was filed.

The first question presented for consideration involves the power of the board of supervisors to grant an extension of time for the performance of the contract when the extension next preceding it had not commenced to operate. The language of section 6 of the act of March 18, 1885, upon which this question arises, is that the street superintendent "shall fix the time for the commencement which shall not be more than fifteen days from the date of the contract and for the completion of the work under all contracts entered into by him, which work shall be prosecuted with diligence from day to day thereafter to completion, and he may extend the time so fixed from time to time under the direction of the city council." In McVerry v. Boyd, 89 Cal. 304, 26 Pac. 885, the court, in considering this section with reference to who had the power to grant extensions, held that the board of supervisors only had such authority, and that the certificate of the street superintendent was merely evidence of that fact. But that statute, as to the question under consideration, has never been construed by this court. It is claimed by respondent that the construction given to this section by the court below holding that the board of supervisors had no power to grant an extension of time under the circumstances was in accordance with the terms and intent of the statute. To this construction we cannot agree, for we think it clear that the power of the board of supervisors to grant extensions of time for the performance of such a contract is not limited by the provisions of the statute, either as to the number or time of such extensions, and that it is within its power to grant an additional extension before an extension previously granted has taken effect. Any number of extensions, and for any period, may be granted at any time by the board or council before the expiration of the contract, provided, always, that the work up to the time of the making of the application is shown to have been prosecuted with diligence in accordance with the requirements of the statute. And, in the absence of a showing to the contrary, it will be presumed that the action of the board or council in granting such extension was based on a proper showing, and such extension begins to operate from the expiration of the previous extension, and not from the time that it was granted.

The remaining question to be disposed of relates to the failure to record in the office of the superintendent of streets that part of the engineer's certificate indorsed or drawn on the back thereof as heretofore shown. By the act approved March 18, 1885, it was only necessary in order to create a lien such as is sought to be enforced in this action to record the warrant, assessment, and diagram. But by the act of March 14, 1889, the recording of the engineer's certificate was made an additional and necessary prerequisite to the creation of a lien thereunder. Nor does the creation of such a lien depend upon whether the owner of the lot had notice of any of these proceedings, but upon the recording of the warrant, assessment, diagram, and engineer's certificate. And, if they were recorded as provided by the terms of the statute, then a valid lien was created upon the defendant's lot; otherwise, not. The diagram drawn on the back of the engineer's certificate, and referred to in the exception noted on the face thereof, shows, as before stated, the projection of a house into Jones street, and that that street had not been graded to the official easterly line thereof. The question then is, was this diagram a material part of the certificate? If it was, then it should have been recorded in order to create a lien under the statute. The certificate as recorded does not show, as the statute requires, how or to what extent the work was performed under the contract; but, as the diagram drawn on the back thereof does show in what particular respect the work had not been performed, it follows that the diagram was a material part of the certificate, and should have been recorded, and, as it was not, no valid lien attached to the defendant's property. Let the judgment and order be affirmed.

We concur: DE HAVEN, J.; McFARLAND, J.

GREEN v. BARNEY. (No. 15,321.)

VENDOR AND PURCHASER—RESCISSION BY VENDOR —TENDER.

1. B., having defendant's contract to sell him certain land, died, leaving a balance overdue and unpaid. The contract had not then been rescinded, but defendant made no claim against B.'s estate. Plaintiff, B.'s successor in interest, told defendant that she could not complete the purchase, and suggested a division of the land. Defendant refused, but offered to sell her the land, without counting B.'s payments, for a price considerably more than the balance due on the contract. Plaintiff said she would rather keep to the old contract, but was told there was no old contract to keep to. Later, plaintiff wrote defendant that she was now able and willing to pay the amount due, and requested an account, which was furnished, with a letter from defendant's attorney to the effect that defendant did not recognize plaintiff's right to the information. Held, that defendant had rescinded.

2. Civ. Code, § 1496, provides that, unless an offer of performance be accepted, the thing to be delivered need not be actually produced. Section 1501 declares that all objections to the mode of an offer which could be stated at the time to the person making the offer, and could be then obviated by him, are waived unless then stated. Held that, in case of an offer to pay money, actual production of it is waived unless demanded at the time.

3. A vendor who, after receiving money on the contract, rescinds it for the vendee's breach, has the burden to show, as against the vendee's claim for return of the money, what damages he has sustained by the breach.

Action by A. H. Green against Mary E. Barney for money had and received. Judgment for defendant. Plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

M. Cooney, for appellant. Blake, Williams & Harrison, for respondent.

VANCLIEF, C. On January 1, 1886, a written agreement was executed by and between the defendant and E. H. Bray, whereby the former agreed to sell and the latter to purchase a lot of land (60 acres) situated in Contra Costa county, at the price of $3,750, of which price $200 were paid on the date of the agreement, and $550 were to be paid January 1, 1887, and the remainder ($3,000) on or before January 1, 1889; deferred installments to bear interest at 8 per cent. per annum. It was further agreed that time should be of the essence of the contract, and that the $200 paid should be forfeited in the event of Bray's failure to pay the deferred installments according to the agreement. One Blackmar being in possession of the land under a cropping lease, it was further agreed that Bray should have the benefit of the landlord's share of the crop on the land at date of the agreement, but that the proceeds of the sale thereof should be applied on said deferred installments, and that possession of the land should be given to Bray upon the surrender thereof by Blackmar. Bray died September 14, 1889, having paid only $1,825 on the contract, but the contract had not been rescinded before his death. The plaintiff, having succeeded to all the rights and interest of Bray in the contract, of which there is no question, brought this action to recover the said sum of $1,825 paid by Bray in his lifetime. The cause having been tried by the court without a jury, and findings of fact having been waived, the judgment of the court was in favor of the defendant, from which, and from an order denying her motion for a new trial, the plaintiff has appealed.

As the appeal from the judgment was not taken within one year from the entry thereof, it should be dismissed. On the appeal from the order denying a new trial, which was properly taken, the appellant contends that material implied findings of fact, on which the judgment necessarily rests, are not justified by the evidence. If the contract had not been rescinded before the commencement of the action, or if, in case it had been rescinded, by reason of a breach thereof by plaintiff, on account of which defendant suffered damages in a sum equal to the amount of the payments made by Bray, then the judgment in favor of defendant was right; otherwise it was wrong, and should be reversed. Therefore, the judgment for defendant implies that the court must have found either that the contract had not been rescinded, or that the rescission thereof was owing to a default of the plaintiff, whereby defendant suffered damages in a sum equal to, and sufficient to cancel, the payments made by Bray. Phelps v. Brown, 95 Cal. 572, 30 Pac. 774, and cases there cited. I think the evidence, without substantial conflict, shows that the contract was abandoned by defendant after the death of Bray, on account of the default of the plaintiff in failing to pay the remainder of the purchase money; that such abandonment was acquiesced in by plaintiff before the commencement of this action, whereby a rescission of the contract was consummated; and that the evidence does not justify a finding that, by reason of plaintiff's default, the defendant sustained damages in a sum equal to, and sufficient to cancel, the payments made by Bray, to wit, $1,825.

1. The undisputed evidence as to the abandonment and rescission of the contract is substantially as follows: Soon after the death of Bray, the plaintiff signified her inability to complete the purchase, and requested an equitable division of the land on the basis of the purchase money paid by Bray, to which defendant did not assent; but defendant proposed to sell the land to plaintiff at the price of $50 per acre, independent of, and without accounting for, the payments made by Bray, which offer was not accepted by plaintiff. It should be noted that this proposal to sell the land to plaintiff at a price exceeding the amount due on the contract by $1,070 is inconsistent with the claim that defendant considered the contract in force. On the 15th day of August, 1890, plaintiff addressed a letter to defendant, saying that she "was now ready, willing, and able to pay the actual amount due," and requesting information as to the payments made by Mr. Bray in his lifetime, and of the actual amount due on the contract. Defendant requested her attorney to answer this letter, which he did by letter dated August 18, 1890, saying: "While Mrs. Barney does not wish to be understood as recognizing any right on your part to the information you ask for, she has no objection to giving it." This letter inclosed a copy of the contract, with a statement of payments made by Mr. Bray, but did not state that any amount was due, nor express a willingness on the part of the defendant to accept any further payment on the contract. The only further communication between the parties after this letter was a letter from plaintiff to defendant, dated August 21, 1890, demanding payment by defendant of the sum of $1,825, paid by Bray, with interest. At an interview between plaintiff and defendant early in August, 1890, in the presence of defendant's son, who had acted for her in the matter, the defendant proposed to give plaintiff an option to purchase the land within a specified period at $50 per acre. In declining this proposal, plaintiff said she "would rather adhere to the old contract." To this the son in the presence of his mother, replied: "There must be some misunderstanding concerning the contract. There is no old contract for you to adhere to." To this statement of her son the defendant said nothing. The defendant testified that she understood plaintiff's letter to her, of August 15, 1890, as an "unequivocal declaration that she [plaintiff] was able and willing and intended to pay for this land pursuant to the contract;" and also testified that she (defendant) was in possession of the land, but did not say when she took possession. The plaintiff, however, testified that defendant "has always been in the possession of that land," and this testimony was not disputed. As to whether plaintiff verbally offered to pay the remainder of the purchase money prior to the offer made by the letter of August 15, 1890, the testimony of plaintiff and defendant is conflicting, but there is no evidence in conflict with that above stated. The objection that plaintiff's written offer to pay was ineffectual because the money offered was not actually produced, is not tenable. The defendant had an opportunity to object to the sufficiency of the offer on the ground that the money was not produced, and, had she done so, the plaintiff could have obviated the objection; and, since defendant failed to object on any ground, she thereby waived the objection here made. Civ. Code, §§ 1496, 1501. Her denial of plaintiff's right to the information asked in the letter of August 15th, without which plaintiff was unable to compute the amount due on the contract, plainly indicated not only that the payment of that amount was not desired, but that defendant repudiated the contract, and, as the letter was carefully drawn by defendant's attorney, it cannot be otherwise understood. Perhaps it may not be irrelevant, under this head, to observe that, although it was expressly admitted at the trial that the estate of Bray had been fully administered and distributed before the commencement of this action, there was no evidence that defendant made or presented any claim whatever against the estate.

2. Assuming that the court may have found, as it should, that the contract was abandoned and rescinded after the death of Bray, it remains to be determined whether the evidence justifies a finding that the damage to defendant in consequence of the breach of the contract by plaintiff equaled and canceled the payments made by Bray. In view of the contingency that the court should find that the contract had been rescinded, the defendant alleged in her answer that by reason of the breach of the contract she had suffered damages in the sum of $2,023, but specified no particular damage except that she had lost the crop on the land at the time of the sale, which she avers was of the value of $700. At the trial, however, the defendant called and examined several witnesses as to the value of the land, the effect of whose testimony was that the market value of the land would average at least $45 per acre from January 1, 1889, until the time of the trial, and consequently that the whole (60 acres) was of the market value of $2,700, which is only $350 less than the contract price, exclusive of the crop, which defendant values at $700. Conceding that defendant was entitled to recover as damages, the difference between the contract price and the depreciated market value of the land, and also $700 for the crop, amounting to $1,050 still plaintiff would be entitled to judgment for the difference between this amount and the $1,825 paid on the contract, which is $775. It is not intended, however, to estimate or find the amount of damages to which the defendant was entitled according to the evidence, but only to decide, as matter of law, that the evidence does not substantially tend to prove that defendant was damaged to the extent of $1,825, as must have been found by the trial court; in other words, that the damages found are excessive, and not warranted by the evidence. The question of damages, as well as that of rescission of the contract, will be open to additional evidence on a new trial. All that is conclusively decided on this appeal is that the evidence contained in the statement on motion for new trial is insufficient to justify a finding either that the contract was in force at the time the action was commenced, or that the damages suffered by defendant were sufficient to cancel the payments admitted to have been made by Bray. No question as to what is the proper rule by which to measure the damages is involved in this appeal. I think the appeal from the judgment should be dismissed, and that the order denying a new trial should be reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

We concur: BELCHER, C.; HAYNES, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, it is ordered that the appeal from the judgment be dismissed, and that the order denying a new trial be reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

BLISS v. SNEATH. (No. 15,434.)

COMPLAINT—SUFFICIENCY — SPECIAL DEMURRER—SET-OFF.

1. The objection that the complaint in an action for rent fails to sufficiently aver demand and nonpayment can only be taken by special demurrer.

2. Where a husband sues as the agent of his wife, defendant may set up as a defense any claim which he might have set up against the wife had she sued.

3. Defendant may set up as defense to such action a claim against plaintiff's wife for one-half of the value of a fence between the lands of defendant and those of plaintiff's wife, built by defendant, for the value of one-half of which the statute makes her liable.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, San Mateo county; George H. Buck, Judge.

Action by George D. Bliss against R. G. Sneath. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed.

Garret W. McEnerney and Bradley, Stanly & Hayes, for appellant. Byron Waters, for respondent.

TEMPLE, C. This is an appeal from a judgment for plaintiff upon the pleadings. The action is for rent alleged to be due upon an indenture of lease. It is contended that the complaint does not sufficiently aver demand and nonpayment. The allegation is: "That the plaintiff has demanded the payment of said sum, but to pay the same, or any part thereof, the defendant refused, and still refuses." A general demurrer was interposed, which apparently was never passed upon, but was waived by answering. The objection not having been taken by special demurrer, the pleading must now be held sufficient. Grant v. Sheerin, 84 Cal. 197, 23 Pac. 1094. The defendant answered, admitting the demand of plaintiff, but setting up, as a partial defense, a claim against plaintiff's wife. The answer avers that, in all the transactions set forth in the complaint, plaintiff acted solely and wholly as the agent of Martha S. Bliss, his wife; that the present action is prosecuted by him as agent of said Martha S. Bliss, and for her sole and exclusive use, benefit, and behalf. The answer then proceeds to aver a demand against said Martha S. Bliss, which existed at the time the action was commenced, and asks that such demand be set off against and deducted from the claim of plaintiff, and admits plaintiff's right to take judgment for the excess of plaintiff's demand over and above his claim against Martha S. Bliss. On motion, plaintiff obtained judgment for the full amount of his demand without trial.

The sufficiency of the allegations in the answer must be tested by the same rule applied to the complaint. If the allegations in the answer would be sufficient in a complaint to sustain a judgment, they are sufficient here. Judged by this rule, the allegation is sufficient to show that plaintiff is suing merely as the agent of his wife. The defense is not really a counterclaim. That is a demand which may be the basis of a judgment against the plaintiff. Here the matter pleaded is purely defensive to the demand sued on. "Where the agent sues in his own name," says Mr. Evans (Evans, Ag. 387), "the defendant may avail himself of all defenses which would be good at law and in equity,"—"(a) as against the agent, who is the plaintiff on the record, or (b) as against the principal, for whose use the action is brought." Mechem, Ag. § 762. It is said, however, that, even admitting this principle, it cannot apply here, because the defense set up is a debt created or arising from a statutory liability, and is not, therefore, a cause of action arising upon a contract. The defense consists of a claim against plaintiff's principal for one-half the value of a division fence between the lands of defendant and those of Mrs. Bliss. They are coterminous owners, and defendant built a fence on the line between their lands. Mrs. Bliss afterwards inclosed her land, using this fence as a part of her inclosure; whereupon, under the provisions of section 841 of the Civil Code, she became indebted to him for one-half the value thereof. The section referred to is one of many Code provisions relating to the rights and duties of property holders, and the liability arising from the conditions mentioned cannot justly be said to be a statutory liability. The liability arises from the fact that plaintiff's principal made use of a fence built by the defendant under circumstances which create the liability. She has been benefited, and the law says she must pay for it. Here are all the elements of an implied contract. The obligation to pay legal interest could be claimed, with much greater plausibility, to be a statutory liability, and therefore not a contract liability. The fact that the Civil Code has changed some common-law rules by which the rights and obligations of persons were ascertained does not make the new or changed obligations any less obligations arising from implied contracts than were the different obligations fixed by the common law. "There are also cases in which the law will imply a contract to pay money from the fact of there being already a legal obligation to pay it, although the transaction in its origin was entirely unconnected with contract, and there has been no promise in fact." 1 Chit. Cont. p. 86. On all such obligations an action in form ex contractu would lie, and I have no doubt the demand would be a proper defense, by way of set-off, had the action been brought in the name of Mrs. Bliss. It is equally so here. I think the judgment should be reversed and a new trial had.

We concur: HAYNES, C.; SEARLS, C.

McFARLAND and FITZGERALD, JJ. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment is reversed and a new trial ordered.

DE HAVEN, J. I concur in the judgment. Assuming the matters alleged in the answer to be true, it was error to give a judgment in favor of plaintiff for the full amount demanded in the complaint.

In re KENNEDY'S ESTATE. (No. 15,415.)

EVIDENCE—BOOK OF REGISTERED LETTERS—COMPETENCY.

1. On an issue whether petitioner was testatrix's illegitimate daughter, the exclusion of evidence that testatrix had never mentioned having any daughter was not prejudicial where petitioner not only made no claim that testatrix had ever recognized her as her daughter, but produced evidence that she had not.

2. Petitioner introduced evidence tending to show that she received at Buffalo a letter signed C. K. (testatrix's name), containing a railroad ticket and $5. It was shown that the address of C. K. was at 616½ N. street, and that at about that time she borrowed $5 to send, as she said, to her sister at Buffalo. Held, that petitioner might introduce from the book of registered letters of the San Francisco post office an entry reciting the receipt of a letter from C. K., 616½ N. street, addressed to M. R. (petitioner), Buffalo.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; A. A. Sanderson, Judge.

Petition by Mary Rogers, setting out that she was the daughter of Catherine Kennedy, deceased, and asking for such share in the estate as if deceased had died intestate. From a judgment for petitioner, and an order denying a new trial, J. T. McCormick, executor of the will of J. E. Tomlinson, devisee under the will of Catherine Kennedy, appeals. Affirmed.

Eugene N. Deuprey, for appellant. M. J. Platshek, M. S. Eisner, and F. S. Stratton, for respondent.

SEARLS, C. Catherine Kennedy died testate at the city and county of San Francisco, April 13, 1887, leaving estate of the value of about $12,000. She was thrice married, and left surviving her one son by her second marriage, named John E. Tomlinson. By her last will she devised all of her estate to the said son, John E. Tomlinson, except three small legacies of $100 each, bequeathed to Sarah McCloskey, John E. McCormick, and Rosa Malone, respectively, and naming James McCloskey as executor. The will was admitted to probate, McCloskey appointed executor thereof, and such proceedings were had in relation thereto that on the 11th day of December, 1889, a petition was filed by the executor praying a distribution of the estate as in the will provided. On the 23d day of December, 1889, Mary Rogers made and filed her petition and opposition in the cause, in which, among other things, she set out that she was the daughter of Catherine Kennedy, deceased; that, by an omission not appearing to be intentional, deceased wholly failed to provide for petitioner in her last will; that she is entitled to a like share or interest in the estate as though deceased had died intestate,—and prayed that one-half of said estate be distributed to her. Thereafter, on the 23d day of December, 1891, the matter of the petition of Mary Rogers to participate in the distribution of the estate of said Catherine Kennedy, deceased, came on to be heard. A trial by jury was waived by the parties. The contest was between said Mary Rogers and J. T. McCormick, the executor of the last will of J. E. Tomlinson, deceased, who had before that time departed this life. The question in litigation was as to the maternity of the said Mary Rogers. The decision was in favor of the respondent, said Mary Rogers, who was found to be the illegitimate daughter of Catherine Kennedy, the testator, and one-half of the estate was distributed to her. The appeal is from the decision, and from an order denying a new trial to said McCormick, executor of the last will of said Tomlinson, deceased.

At the trial, counsel for appellant asked Kate Smith, a niece of Catherine Kennedy, deceased, who was a witness on his behalf, the following question: "Did you ever hear of any other child than J. E. Tomlinson?" Questions of like import were also asked of Mary Matthews and Mary McCormick, to all of which questions objections were made by counsel for petitioner, upon the ground that the testimony was incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial. The objections were sustained by the court, and exceptions taken. J. T. McCormick was also called as a witness on the part of appellant, to whom the following questions were put: "At any time did Mrs. Kennedy, in speaking of the incidents of her youth, speak of any daughter of hers, legitimate or illegitimate? A. No. Q. Whom, if any, did you know or observe as the members of the family of Catherine Kennedy during her lifetime? A. The only person that I was acquainted with was John Edward Tomlinson." These answers were, on motion of respondent's counsel, stricken out upon like grounds. These rulings are severally assigned as errors. The theory of appellant is that the question of pedigree and relationship was the main issue in the case, and that the testimony of the witnesses above specified contradicted the claim of the illegitimate

Mary Rogers, and hence was proper evidence under the Code of Civil Procedure, section 1852, and subdivision 11 of section 1870. Section 1852, Code Civ. Proc., is as follows: "The declaration, act or omission of a member of a family, who is a decedent, or out of the jurisdiction, is also admissible as evidence of common reputation, in cases where, on questions of pedigree, such reputation is admissible." Subdivision 4 of section 1870 provides as follows: "The act or declaration, verbal or written, of a deceased person in respect to the relationship, birth, marriage or death of any person related by blood or marriage to such deceased person," etc., may be proven. And by the eleventh subdivision oı the same section it is provided that common reputation existing previous to the controversy respecting pedigree, among other things, may be proven. That the acts and declarations of the deceased, Catherine Kennedy, in respect to the relationship of Mary Rogers to her, in a proper case, and where the question is in issue, are admissible, is beyond dispute. The evident object of the inquiry in the present case was, as is shown by the evidence stricken out, as well as by the testimony of other witnesses, who testified without objection, to show that the deceased never spoke of the petitioner as a daughter, and that she was not reputed to be a child of the deceased woman or a member of her family.

Now, the whole theory of the case, as made by the affirmative testimony of the respondent here, was that there never was any recognition of the relationship by her deceased mother, but that, on the contrary, it was studiously concealed from the world. According to that theory, the respondent was born in Ireland; that her mother came to America a few years later, leaving her with her aunts, who still later, but in the early childhood of respondent, brought her to America and settled with her near Buffalo, N. Y., where she remained until over 40 years of age; that her mother, whom she scarcely saw in America, went to New Orleans, where she settled and was twice married, having two sons, one of whom died, and removed to San Francisco, and married Kennedy, who also died; that deceased learned the address of respondent in Buffalo, N. Y., and wrote to her there in 1886, inviting her to come to California, inclosing a passage ticket for the trip and $5 in cash; that in the letter she addressed her as her daughter, and signed herself as her mother, but cautioned her that she "must not call her mother when she did come, because of her son, who did not know of the existence of this child of hers; that her son was a violent and a drinking man, and would be very angry and make trouble if he knew of this illegitimate child;" that when she reached San Francisco her mother met her at the ferry, and, upon becoming known to each other, one of the first cautions of the mother was not to let it be known that she was a daughter; that she was introduced as a niece, remained with her mother not exceeding four or five days, and, finding the place uncongenial, went out to service, and never returned more than a few times to her mother's home. There is no claim whatever of recognition, but, as before stated, affirmative evidence that there was none. In the face of this showing, it is hard to see how the case of appellant would have been made stronger had the negative evidence been admitted. If we concede that striking out the testimony introduced and the exclusion of that offered was technically erroneous, it must be said that the appellant was not injured thereby. The testimony of the witnesses Eisner and Platshek was properly admitted, not as evidence to the main issue, but to contradict and impeach the testimony of the witness James McCloskey as to his statements previously made. It was of trifling importance, but, being admissible, constituted no error. The respondent, having introduced evidence tending to show that she received at Buffalo, N. Y., a letter from San Francisco, signed by Catherine Kennedy, containing a railroad ticket and $5 in cash, was permitted, against the objection of appellant's counsel, to introduce in evidence from the book of registered letters of Station B, San Francisco post office, the following: "No. 1,637. Received March 16, 1886, of Catherine Kennedy, 616½ Natoma street, addressed to Mary Rogers, Buffalo, New York." There was evidence that the address of Catherine Kennedy was at 616½ Natoma street, and that at about that date she procured from James McCloskey $5 to send, as she said, in a letter to her sister at Buffalo, N. Y. The testimony was proper as affording some evidence that the registered letter came from the deceased, Mrs. Kennedy. The identity of name and address was evidence of identity of person.

The only remaining question relates to the sufficiency of the evidence to support the finding that the respondent, Mary Rogers, was the illegitimate daughter of Catherine Kennedy. That the testimony of the respondent, coupled with that of Caroline F. Judd and Mary H. Huntley, supported as it is in a few minor particulars by other testimony, is sufficient, if true, to support the finding, cannot be seriously doubted. Knowing the incentives in such a case to simulate facts and to concoct statements at variance with truth, I have examined with care all of the testimony in the case, only to come to the conclusion that the statements of the respondent as a witness are indicative of a disposition to give utterance to the truth, and that when the whole evidence upon both sides is scanned, and its intrinsic merits compared, the conclusion is fairly deducible, not only that there was sufficient evidence to uphold the findings, but that the preponderance of evidence was and is with the respondent. The order and decision appealed from should be affirmed.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the order and decision appealed from are affirmed.

FARNG v. KEEFER et al. (No. 15,322.)

ACTION ON CONTRACT—EVIDENCE — CONTRACT OF THIRD PERSON.

Plaintiff alleged an agreement entered into between him and defendant, whereby plaintiff was to furnish certain laborers at a certain price, etc., and produced a written contract of defendant, reciting that plaintiff had contracted with a third person to supply laborers for certain work, referring specially to said contract, and promising, as part consideration thereof, to pay plaintiff certain costs of transportation. He also produced the contract with a third person referred to, and evidence that defendant at the same time orally promised to pay for the labor, and did in fact pay all that was paid. Held, that the third person's contract was admissible to explain defendant's contract, and was not the basis of the judgment against defendant for the balance due for the labor, the court having found as a fact that he did make the oral agreement.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; J. C. B. Hebbard, Judge.

Action by Chew Farng against W. A. Keefer and others on contract. Judgment for plaintiff, against defendant Keefer, who appeals. Affirmed.

Eugene N. Deuprey, for appellant. Roger Johnson, for respondent.

VANCLIEF, C. This action was brought against appellant and others to recover the price of labor of a gang of Chinamen alleged to have been furnished by the plaintiff to defendants under an agreement. The plaintiff had judgment against the defendant Keefer alone for $1,330.93, and costs, who appeals therefrom, and from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

It is contended here by counsel for appellant that while the complaint counts upon a certain written contract, to which neither of the defendants was a party, the plaintiff was permitted, against the objection of defendants, to prove and to recover upon a distinct contract between different parties. But this contention is founded upon a misconception of the complaint, in which no written agreement is alleged, the allegation being that "an agreement was entered into between plaintiff and defendants, whereby plaintiff undertook to furnish certain Chinese laborers to work upon the construction and widening of a certain water ditch, * * * for which defendants agreed to pay plaintiff the sum of one dollar and ten cents per day for each laborer so furnished and employed." It appears that Keefer was interested in the construction of the ditch, he being a stockholder of the corporation which owned the ditch, and the owner of a gravel mine to be worked by water from the ditch; that prior to September, 1891, he entered into an agreement with Mrs. S. R. Owen to the effect that he would convey to her one-half of the gravel mine, in consideration whereof she was to furnish the Chinese laborers to widen and repair the ditch. Through his negotiations with the plaintiff, a written agreement was drawn up in duplicate between Mrs. Owen and plaintiff, to the effect that plaintiff would furnish the Chinese laborers to repair the ditch, and that she would pay for their labor at the rate above stated. This agreement was signed in duplicate by both parties to it, but whether at the same time or place is uncertain; and as to whether it was ever delivered as an executed contract the evidence is conflicting. Mrs. Owen testified that she signed the agreement on September 3, 1891; yet one of the copies is dated October 10th. Before the Chinese laborers were employed and sent to the ditch, the agreement between Mrs. Owen and Keefer was rescinded; and on October 10, 1891, a written agreement was executed between the plaintiff and Keefer, as follows: "This agreement, made this 10th day of October, 1891, between W. A. Keefer, party of the first part, and Chew Farng, party of the second part, both of San Francisco, California, witnesseth, that whereas, Chew Farng has this day entered into a contract with Mrs. S. R. Owen to supply Chinese laborers to work upon a certain water ditch in the county of Calaveras, which more particularly appears from said contract dated 10th October, 1891, which is hereby specially referred to: Now, therefore, in consideration of and as a part of said contract, said Keefer agrees to pay to said Farng one-half of the cost of transporting all the provisions which may be sent up to feed said laborers from Valley Springs to the camp of said laborers, except that portion of said provisions which Mrs. Owen has by her said contract agreed to transport. He further agrees to provide transportation from said camp to San Francisco, California, for all of said laborers after the completion of their said work, except such, if any there be, who shall be discharged from said employment for sufficient cause. Said Farng agrees to send the first gang of said laborers up to the work as soon as they can be gotten together, and within twenty days from this date, and that he will notify said Keefer by or on Wednesday, the 14th of October, 1891, when to have transportation provided for said laborers from Stockton, California, to said work; and, if said Farng fails to have said gang of laborers at Stockton at the time he appoints, then he shall pay to said Keefer any damages he may sustain by reason of his having provided for their transportation on said day appointed. A. W. Keefer, Chew Farng." It was in connection with and for the purpose of explaining this agreement that the agreement between Mrs. Owen and the plaintiff was admitted, and for this purpose it was admissible. It does not appear that the judgment was based upon the contract with Mrs. Owen. The evidence strongly tends to prove, and the court found, that, in addition to his written agreement to pay for the transportation of the Chinamen, Keefer verbally promised to pay for all their labor, and there is no question that he did pay all that had been paid before suit, to wit $2,051.40, without objection. The findings support the judgment, and there is no sufficient specification of any particular in which it is claimed that the findings are not justified by the evidence, either in the statement on motion for a new trial or in the brief for appellant. I think the judgment should be affirmed.

MERGUIRE v. O'DONNELL. (No. 15,072.)

DECEIT—SPECIAL DAMAGES—INSTRUCTIONS.

1. When the evidence conflicts, the jury's verdict is conclusive.

2. In an action for deceit, in selling plaintiff glandered horses, special damages are recoverable for medical treatment of the horses, and for the value of the stable, which plaintiff had to burn, to prevent contagion.

3. The doctrine of caveat emptor should not be charged where the gravamen of the action is deceit, and breach of express warranty.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; A. A. Sanderson, Judge.

Action by J. H. Merguire against Thomas O'Donnell for deceit. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. Affirmed.

F. B. Ogden, for appellant. F. A. Hornblower, for respondent.

SEARLS, C. This is an action to recover damages for deceit and fraudulent representations in the sale by defendant to plaintiff of three horses. Plaintiff had judgment for $650, from which judgment, and from an order denying a motion for a new trial, defendant appeals.

About the 1st of June, 1890, plaintiff purchased from the defendant, at East Oakland, three horses, for $400; paying $100 down, and the residue to be paid the following day, upon delivery of the horses in San Francisco. Defendant called upon plaintiff the following morning, in advance of the arrival of the horses, and received the residue of the purchase price. Almost immediately upon the arrival of the horses, and within an hour, they were found to be ailing, and discharging from the nose. The disease with which they were afflicted proved to be glanders. One of them was condemned by the public authorities, and killed in a short time, and the others shared the same fate a few months later. Plaintiff, after the death of the first horse, offered to return the others, and demanded a rescision of the contract, and return of his money, which was refused by the defendant. The complaint charged defendant with falsely and fraudulently representing to plaintiff that the horses were well and sound; that the plaintiff believed these statements to be true, and, relying upon them, was induced to purchase; and that defendant well knew the statement to be false, etc. The cause was tried by a jury, and the main controversy was as to these representations and knowledge by defendant of the condition of the animals. There was testimony on the part of plaintiff tending to show that defendant knew the condition of the horses, instructed his employe to keep their noses clean when plaintiff and his brother came to examine them, which was done, and that he represented to plaintiff that "they were all sound, except one horse, who had a blind eye," and at another time, during the negotiation, when asked if there was anything the matter with them (the horses), he said, "No, except that one had a defect in the eye." On the other hand, there was a denial of all these representations by defendant, and of all knowledge on his part of any ailment or disease in the horses. A number of other witnesses on the part of defendant testified that the horses showed no signs of glanders up to the time of sale. In the face of this conflict of evidence, we must regard the verdict of the jury as conclusive upon the facts.

The jury rendered a verdict in favor of plaintiff for $650. This, it is claimed by appellant, was excessive. There was testimony tending to show that plaintiff expended about $100 in surgical treatment of the horses, and that he destroyed the stable in which the diseased horses had been kept, and burned the materials, which, owing to the highly contagious character of the disease, was shown to be reasonably proper. This stable was shown to have been worth $200. As plaintiff was entitled to recover, if at all, the purchase price of the horses, which was $400, we cannot say the added $250 thereto was excessive, in view of the fact that the several special causes of damage were pleaded.

The instructions asked by the defendant, and refused by the court, were objectionable, for various reasons,—the first, because, while it correctly enunciated the law as to the doctrine of caveat emptor, in the absence of fraud or of a warranty, still it was inapplicable to the case at bar, in which the gravamen of the charge was (1) fraud on the part of the defendant, whereby plaintiff was prevented from discovering the diseased condition of the horses; (2) an express warranty of soundness of the horses by the defendant; and (3) because so much of the instruction as was applicable was subsequently given. Like-observations apply to the refusal of the court to give the other instructions asked. The court, upon its own motion, instructed the jury upon the issues made in the case, and, so far as we observe, there was no error therein; and, as no objection was made or exception taken to such instructions, they are not the subject of review. The necessity for the destruction of plaintiff's stable, by reason of the virus of the glandered horses, is alleged in the complaint, and, not being denied by the answer, was an admitted fact in the case. The judgment and order appealed from should be affirmed.

CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO v. ANDERSON. (No. 15,290.)

TAXABLE PROPERTY — SEAT IN STOCK EXCHANGE.

A seat in a stock exchange, which is a personal privilege of being and remaining a member of a voluntary association, with the assent of the associates, is not taxable property.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; William T. Wallace, Judge.

Action by the city and county of San Francisco against Charles E. Anderson. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. Reversed.

Jarboe & Jarboe and Edward R. Taylor, for appellant. J. E. O'Donnell, for respondent.

McFARLAND, J. The only question in this case is whether or not a "seat in the San Francisco Stock and Exchange Board" is taxable property, and in our opinion it is not. What such a "seat" is sufficiently appears in the opinion of this court in Lowenberg v. Greenebaum, 99 Cal. 162, 33 Pac. 794. In that case we held that a seat in said board being merely "a personal privilege of being and remaining a member of a voluntary association, with the assent of the associates," was not property that would pass by a sale under a common writ of execution; and, following the views there expressed, we hold that it has no such qualities as make it assessable and taxable as property. It is a mere right to belong to a certain association, with the latter's consent, and to enjoy certain personal privileges and advantages which flow from membership of such association. Those privileges and advantages cannot be transferred without the consent of the association, and a forced sale of them would not give to the purchaser the right to occupy said "seat." It is too impalpable to go into any category of taxable property. Respondent cites Clute v. Loveland, 68 Cal. 254, 9 Pac. 133, but that case went upon the theory that the seat of a member of the said stock board represented his interest in the property of said board and in the property of a certain corporation called the "Company of Associated Stockholders," with which said stock board had certain relations. Now, the alleged taxes for which this suit was brought were for the fiscal year 1889, and the stipulated facts show that for said year "all the real and personal property, owned by, or in the possession, or under the control" of, said San Francisco Stock and Exchange Board and of said Company of Associated Stockholders, was duly assessed to said board and said company, and that all taxes levied to pay the assessments were by said board and said company fully paid. Therefore, under the theory of the said case invoked by respondent, the attempt to tax said seat, in addition to the taxes levied upon all the property of said stock board and said corporation, was clearly an attempt at double taxation, and void, within the principle of the case of Burke v. Badlam, 57 Cal. 594. The judgment and order denying appellant's motion for a new trial are reversed.

DOWLING v. CONNIFF. (No. 15,361.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 13, 1894.)

STREET ASSESSMENTS — WAIVER OF ERRORS — APPEAL TO SUPERVISORS — CONSTITUTIONALITY OF ACT.

1. St. 1889, p. 157, providing for levying and collecting assessments for work upon streets, and, by section 8, that the warrant, assessment, certificate, diagram, and affidavit of demand and nonpayment shall be held prima facie evidence of the regularity of the assessment, embraces but one subject, within Const. art. 4, § 24.

2. Where a lot is properly assessable for the paving of a street crossing as being within a quarter block cornering on the crossing (Act March 14, 1889, § 5, subd. 3), an assessment thereon for such purpose is not void because it erroneously includes a sum assessed on the lot's frontage on a small subdivision street, and the error, if not corrected by an appeal to the board of supervisors, is waived.

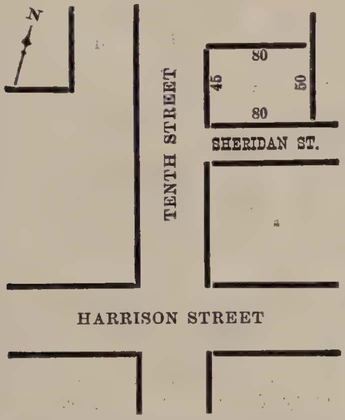
Action by J. J. Dowling against Michael Conniff. From a judgment for plaintiff, and order denying his motion for a new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Horace W. Philbrook, for appellant. Parker & Eells, for respondent.

VANCLIEF, C. Action to enforce payment of an assessment for work done on a crossing of two main streets (Tenth and Harrison) in the city of San Francisco. The work to be done, and which was done by plaintiff, was described in the resolution of intention as follows: "That the roadway of the crossing of Tenth and Harrison streets be paved with basalt blocks (except that portion required by law to be kept in order by the railroad company having tracks thereon), and that granite cross-walks be laid thereon." The plaintiff on the trial offered as evidence his warrant, the diagram of the lots assessed, and his affidavit of demand and nonpayment, all in due form; whereupon the defendant objected to the diagram, assessment, and the warrant, on the ground that the assessment is void because it appears thereby that the work was done on a crossing of main streets, and that defendant was not only assessed for that portion of his lot which fronts (45 feet) on Tenth street, but was also assessed for 80 feet of the same lot fronting on Sheridan street, which is a small subdivision street in the quarter block northeast from said crossing of main streets and terminating in Tenth street; whereas, it is claimed, defendant was liable to be assessed for only the frontage of his lot (45 feet) on Tenth street. The following portion of the diagram, on which defendant's lot is numbered 45, will sufficiently illustrate the grounds of the objection:



The court overruled the objection, and defendant excepted. After reading these documents, the plaintiff rested, and the defendant offered no evidence. The judgment was in favor of plaintiff, enforcing his lien for $49.30, with interest and costs. From this judgment, and from an order denying his motion for a new trial, the defendant appeals.

1. It is not distinctly claimed here, however, that the court erred in admitting these documents in evidence, but it is contended by appellant that, being admitted, their effect as evidence was to show that the attempted assessment was entirely void, for the reasons above stated as grounds of objection to the evidence. While I think it must be admitted that defendant's lot was assessable for work done on the crossing of main streets only in proportion to its frontage on such main streets, within one of the quarter blocks cornering on the crossing (section 5, subd. 3, Act March 14, 1889; St. 1889, p. 163), and that the assessment of it for a greater proportion was error, I do not think the assessment in question was void. It appears that, in making the assessment in this case, Sheridan street (35 feet in width) was regarded as a lot fronting on Tenth street; that its frontage (35 feet) on Tenth street was distributed among, and assessed to, all the lots fronting on Sheridan street, in proportion to their frontage thereon; and, as defendant's lot had a frontage of 80 feet on Sheridan street, $6.50 was added to the assessment thereon on this account. It seems that this mode of apportioning the assessment was supposed to be required by the seventh subdivision of section 5 of the act above cited; but this, I have no doubt, was a mistake, which added to the assessment on defendant's lot about $5.60 more than its proper proportion of the whole assessment. Yet, since defendant's lot had a frontage of 45 feet on Tenth street within a quarter block cornering on the crossing improved, it was lawfully assessable for the work on that crossing; and, inasmuch as an assessment of it for such work was fully authorized, the mistake of the superintendent of streets in assessing it for a sum exceeding its proper proportion was merely an error in the exercise of unquestionable power, which error might have been corrected by an appeal to the board of supervisors; and the failure to take such appeal operated as a waiver of the error. Section 11, Act March 18, 1885 (St. 1885, p. 147); Himmelmann v. Hoadley, 44 Cal. 276; Frick v. Morford, 87 Cal. 576, 25 Pac. 764; McDonald v. Conniff, 99 Cal. 386, 34 Pac. 71; Perine v. Erzgraber, 36 Pac. 585. The case of Diggins v. Brown, 76 Cal. 318, 18 Pac. 373, cited by appellant, has not been followed, and seems inconsistent with the later cases above cited.

2. Appellant further contends that section 8 of the amendatory act of March 14, 1889 (St. 1889, p. 168), providing that the warrant, assessment, etc., "shall be held prima facie evidence of the regularity and correctness of the assessment * * * and like evidence of the right of plaintiff to recover in the action," is in violation of section 24, art. 4, of the constitution. But this point is fully answered in the cases of McDonald v. Conniff and Perine v. Erzgraber, supra. The plaintiff properly recovered on such prima facie evidence, as the defendant introduced no evidence whatever.

3. The constitutional question raised by appellant in his reply brief, as to whether or not, in case of an appeal to the board of supervisors, the judgment of the board is final, is not involved, since there was no such appeal in this case. I think the judgment and order should be affirmed.

We concur: BELCHER, C.; TEMPLE, C.

GROPPENGIESSER v. LAKE. (No. 15,338.)

CONTRACT OF PURCHASE—RESCISSION—FRAUDULENT REPRESENTATIONS.

Though defendant believed that his representations as to land, by which he induced plaintiff to make a purchase, were true, and though he told plaintiff that he had never seen the land, and part of the representations consisted of the report of an employe, still, they having been materially false, plaintiff is entitled to a rescission.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; John F. Finn, Judge.

Action by Oswald Groppengiesser against Frederick W. Lake. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. Affirmed.

F. D. Brandon, for appellant. F. J. Castelhun, for respondent.

TEMPLE, C. This action was brought to rescind a contract for the purchase of land because of alleged fraudulent representations on the part of the vendor, relying upon which, plaintiff made the contract, and to recover money paid under the contract. The court found all the allegations of the complaint true, and all the statements in the answer and cross complaint untrue.

Defendant's motion for a new trial having been denied, he appeals from the judgment and order. He contends that a misrepresentation, to justify rescission, must relate to matter which induced the party to contract, and concerning which the purchaser had not equal means of information; that the parties here were entire strangers, and plaintiff was told that defendant had no personal knowledge in regard to the property, and, furthermore, defendant submitted to him all the information he himself had. The evidence is, however, conflicting upon this question. Plaintiff, according to his testimony, was a cook at San Jose. He saw the advertisement of defendant, who is a real-estate agent, and called upon him, to inquire. Defendant showed him a book describing different tracts which he had to sell. From these descriptions he selected a tract of 80 acres in El Dorado, which in the book was marked six dollars per acre. Defendant then said that was his best piece of land, and, although it was marked six dollars per acre, he could not sell it for less than ten. He said the land was mostly level, slightly rolling, and about 2½ acres in it, possibly, could not be used, because it was ravines,—was bad. Defendant handed him some photographs of portions of the land, and said the wood was all over the land like that shown in the picture; also, that there was a ditch on the section, from which water could be easily brought to it. The photographs were in evidence, but are not produced here. He also handed plaintiff a report made to defendant by an employe, in which the tract is particularly described. Of course, the defendant is responsible for the statements in this report. It says that the land can be easily irrigated; that it slopes gradually south and southwest; that the natural vegetation is oak, and some small pine and elder and light brush that is easily cleared, or that it furnishes good browse for stock. Some snow falls, but, as in all places where the fall of snow is light, it does more benefit than harm. Excellent fruit is raised throughout the locality. Everything grows to perfection. This ought to be as attractive a residence as Auburn or Placerville. The soil is a deep red color, and very similar to the soil in the best orchards and vineyards in these foothills. Some mining was done in the vicinity, and some prospecting had been done on the land. This land will make an excellent home for any one. There seems to be a good demand for wood, at about six dollars per cord, and the wood on this land is worthy of consideration. There was also a plat showing description, with roads, ravines, etc. This survey and plat is not brought here. Plaintiff also testified: "The transaction was all finished on the same day when I first saw him, and at the same interview. There was just one interview, and that finished the entire transaction." Thinks that was November 19, 1890. The transaction was in San Francisco, and the land in El Dorado county. Plaintiff first saw the land in July, 1891. He found that the land had very little wood on it,—mostly underbrush; was mostly bedrock on the surface, and quite hilly; the hills were very steep, and not more than two or three acres of level land. Other witnesses testified for plaintiff, —one, that the land is rough with some steep hills and bedrock at the surface, in parts. Only from 12 to 15 acres could be cultivated. It was also shown that there was no water on the land, and that it would cost $500 to take water from the ditch to it. The defendant naturally gave a very different account of the transaction. I notice in it, however, but one new material circumstance which is not inconsistent with the testimony of plaintiff; that is, that he told plaintiff at the first interview, that he (defendant) had never seen the land. This statement, being uncontradicted, may be taken as true.

Upon these facts, is defendant entitled to a new trial? That the representations were as to material matters, such as were calculated and were plainly intended to induce the plaintiff to purchase the land, there can be no doubt. Neither can there be any doubt that the representations did induce the plaintiff to enter into the contract, and that defendant then knew that plaintiff relied solely upon his statements. Even upon defendant's own testimony this is so. The representations, according to plaintiff's testimony, were positive assertions as to matters which are not mere matters of opinion. He was told in effect, that nearly all the land could be used, except two or three acres, which, on account of ravines, would be useless; that it was suitable for a fruit ranch, and was wooded all over, as shown in the photographs. As those are not brought here, the presumption must be that they would tend, so far as possible, to support the judgment and order. These statements, there was testimony tending to show, were not true. But it is said the defendant informed plaintiff that he had never seen the land himself, and therefore plaintiff knew that he was only relating what he had heard from others. But there was a great show of care on the part of defendant to ascertain the facts. His employes had personally examined it, had surveyed it, and photographed portions of it; had even sent him some of the soil. Defendant does not say that he told plaintiff that his entire knowledge in reference to the tract was derived from the documents shown him. If he had so stated, the effect would have been only to limit the representations to what appeared from these papers. It does not matter that defendant did not know that what he stated was untrue, or that he believed it to be true. According to the testimony, his statements constituted all the knowledge possessed by plaintiff as to the subject-matter of the sale. As they were untrue in material respects, the plaintiff, acting promptly, may rescind. Civ. Code, § 1572; Alvarez v. Brannan, 7 Cal. 503; Bank v. Hiatt, 58 Cal. 234. See, also, 2 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 887.

As to the statement of plaintiff's counsel at the trial, that plaintiff did not charge defendant with actual fraud, I cannot see how defendant was misled by it. It was not an admission to be used in the place of evidence, and it does not appear that defendant was prevented by it from producing any evidence that he might have produced. The complaint charges no fraud, except actual fraud, and there was no testimony tending to prove fraud of any other character. Plaintiff cannot be understood as waiving his right to rescind. The phrase, "actual fraud," has been loosely used by judges and law writers, and the attorneys probably had not the Code definition in mind. What was meant probably was that they did not claim that defendant knew that he was stating an untruth. It is actual fraud, all the same, if he stated as true that which he did not know to be so, intending that plaintiff should act upon it, and then entered into the contract, knowing that plaintiff did so in reliance upon his statements, plaintiff not having other means of knowledge. Independently of the rule that this court will not disturb the findings of fact when there is material conflict, a motion for a new trial is addressed to the sound discretion of the trial court, and that discretion will not be interfered with unless this court can see that there has been an abuse of it. We cannot say so here. I think the judgment and order should be affirmed.

We concur: BELCHER, C.; SEARLS, C.

WOLFF v. WOLFF. (Nos. 15,327, 15,389.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 13, 1894.)

Dissenting opinion. For majority opinion, see 36 Pac. 767.

BEATTY, C. J. The court having denied a rehearing of this cause, I take the occasion to say that I have never concurred in the affirmance of that part of the decree of the superior court awarding alimony. The amount of alimony awarded is based upon a finding of fact directly opposed to the stipulation of the parties that the answer of defendant was true as to the value of his property and business. In my opinion, the answer, on a fair construction of its language, makes a sharp issue upon this point.

FRASER v. SAN FRANCISCO BRIDGE CO. (No. 15,118.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 13, 1894.)

ACTS OF CORPORATE OFFICERS — RATIFICATION — INJURIES TO EMPLOYE — PAYMENT FOR MEDICAL SERVICES.

1. Plaintiff and W., at request of defendant's president, rendered medical services to an employe of defendant, who had been injured, while in its service, without fault on defendant's part. Defendant paid W., and offered plaintiff $250, which he refused. Held that, though the president had no authority to employ physicians for it, defendant was under a moral obligation to pay for their services, and that by paying W., and offering to pay plaintiff, it ratified the contract.

2. The agreement by defendant's president was to pay the reasonable value of the services, reserving, however, "the right to determine what is reasonable." Held, that plaintiff could recover only the $250 offered by defendant.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; John F. Finn, Judge.

Action by E. J. Fraser against the San Francisco Bridge Company to recover for medical services. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

R. Percy Wright, for appellant. Joseph M. Nougues, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. The plaintiff brought this action to recover the sum of $1,000, alleged to be due him for medical services rendered to one John Howden at the request of the defendant. The answer denied that the services were rendered at the request of defendant, or that defendant was in any way liable therefor. The plaintiff recovered a judgment for the sum of $616, from which, and from an order refusing a new trial, the defendant appeals.

It appears from the record that on the 19th of May, 1890, the defendant was engaged in the erection of a bridge in Sonoma county, and John Howden was the foreman in charge of the work. On that day, Howden fell from the bridge, and received serious injuries, which caused his death on the 23d of July following. It is not claimed, however, that the fall resulted from any carelessness or fault on the part of the defendant, or its other employes. On the next day after the injuries were received, Howden was taken to his home, in San Francisco; and thereupon, at the request of his wife, the plaintiff, Dr. Fraser, who had been his family physician for several years, visited him, and took charge of the case. Thereafter, the plaintiff visited him twice every day till he died, remaining about an hour and a quarter on each visit. On May 27th, Dr. Wooster was called in consultation, and it was determined that some of the spinal processes had been fractured, and that a surgical operation was necessary to remove a piece of broken bone which was pressing on the spinal cord. Before performing the operation, the plaintiff telephoned to the office of the defendant, asking if Mr. McMullen, the president of the company, could meet Dr. Wooster and himself at Mr. Howden's house at five o'clock in the afternoon of that day. Mr. McMullen responded that he did not know whether he would be able to meet them or not, but if he could not he would send a representative of the company. At the time named, Mr. H. S. Wood, an engineer in the employ of the company, met the doctors at Howden's house, saying that he came to represent the company. Dr. Wooster then stated to Mr. Wood that considerable attention would be required in Howden's case, and that he did not feel like going on with the case without some written obligation from the company. Thereupon, Mr. Wood wrote and signed the following agreement, and delivered it to Dr. Wooster and the plaintiff:

"May 27, 1890. The San Francisco Bridge Company, a corporation under the laws of the state of California, hereby agree to pay all reasonable charges of Dr. David Wooster and Dr. E. J. Fraser in the case of John Howden, injured May, 1890. San Francisco Bridge Company, per H. S. Wood, Engineer." Some time the next day, Wood informed McMullen what he had done, and thereupon the latter wrote and forwarded to each of the said doctors a letter reading as follows: "San Francisco, Cal., May 29, 1890. Dr. E. J. Fraser, 112 Kearney Street, City—Dear Sir: I wish to have our position in connection with paying for the medical services of Mr. John Howden correctly understood. Our position in the premises is this: We are under no obligation whatever to pay for said services; but out of regard for Mr. Howden, and in order that he may have proper medical attendance, we, of our own will, are willing to pay a reasonable compensation for said services, but we reserve to ourselves the right to determine what is reasonable. We are willing to pay what would be a reasonable charge against a man in Mr. Howden's circumstances, but, because we are a corporation, we are not willing to pay any fancy charges, as on former occasions we have been obliged to do, by reason of not having a definite understanding. We understand that our Mr. Wood agreed to pay all reasonable charges of yourself and Dr. Wooster in the premises. Mr. Wood has no authority, and cannot oblige the company in any way, but we are willing to guaranty the payment of a moderate fee, such as a man in Mr. Howden's circumstances financially could be expected to pay for such service. If a fee of this character is all that you anticipate, there will be no trouble. Yours, truly, San Francisco Bridge Company, by J. McMullen, President." Dr. Wooster presented to the defendant a bill for his services, and, on a compromise, was allowed and paid $200 therefor. The plaintiff presented his bill, and was offered by defendant, in payment thereof, $250; but he refused to accept that sum, and thereupon commenced this action. At the trial the plaintiff detailed very particularly the services performed by him, and stated: "After the operation there was a good deal of attendance necessary. As there was no nurse provided, I had to do the double duty of nurse and physician." The plaintiff also proved by several physicians whom he called as witnesses that, in view of the services detailed as having been performed by him, $10 for each visit was a reasonable charge. The court instructed the jury that the paper signed by Mr. Wood did not bind the defendant, because it appeared that he had no authority to make such an agreement on its behalf, and it should therefore be disregarded. The court further instructed the jury, in effect, that the letter written by McMullen constituted a binding obligation on the part of the defendant to pay the reasonable charges of the doctors, and it said: "The only question, then, which I submit to you, is what, under the circumstances, is a reasonable fee? And you are to determine that under all the evidence before you. Now, what is reasonable, gentlemen, is to be your guide. * * * What would be a reasonable compensation for services rendered to such a man as Mr. Howden, in Mr. Howden's circumstances financially?"

1. In support of the appeal, it is contended that McMullen, as president of the bridge company, had no authority or right to make any contract on behalf of the company to pay for medical services rendered Mr. Howden, and hence that his letter of May 29th imposed no legal obligation upon the company to pay any charges for such services, whether reasonable or unreasonable in amount. It is true that the defendant was in no way responsible for the injuries received by Howden, and it might, therefore, have refused to assist or care for him in any way. But he had been a faithful servant of defendant, and was injured while performing his duties as such. He was also a poor man, and needed attention and care, which he had no means to procure. Under such circumstances, there would seem to have been some moral obligation resting on the defendant to furnish to him such assistance and care as were necessary to relieve his sufferings, and, if possible, save his life. This obligation is shown to have been recognized from the start, and should be held to constitute a sufficient consideration for the legal obligation expressed in the letter referred to; and when the defendant paid Dr. Wooster $200 for his services, and offered to pay the plaintiff $250 for his services, it recognized, approved, and confirmed the authority of its president to write the letter, and make the contract therein expressed. The defendant ought not now, therefore, after the services have been rendered in reliance on the letter, to be permitted to repudiate it, and deny all liability thereunder.

2. The only other question which need be considered is, to what extent did the letter obligate the defendant to pay for the services rendered by the plaintiff? The agreement signed by Wood was "to pay all reasonable charges" of the doctors; but the letter expressly repudiated that agreement, and, in effect, said that the company would not be bound to pay such charges as might be thought or proved by others to be reasonable, but only such as it might deem reasonable. The words are, "We reserve to ourselves the right to determine what is reasonable." This was a reservation which the company, under the circumstances shown, had a right to make; and we see nothing in the other parts of the letter, when it is read as a whole, to modify or change its effect. This being so, the plaintiff was entitled to recover only the amount offered him by the defendant, and not the sum awarded him by the jury. The judgment and order must therefore be reversed, and the cause remanded, and it is so ordered.

ALLEN v. POCKWITZ. (No. 15,028.)

VENDOR AND PURCHASER—THE CONTRACT — CONSTRUCTION—ACCEPTANCE OF TITLE BY ATTORNEY.

A contract stated the terms of sale of land to A. as follows: "21 days are allowed to examine title and consummate sale. * * * Title to be examined and accepted by A.'s attorney. Abstract to be run down to date. * * * If the sale is not consummated in accordance with foregoing conditions, the deposit to be forfeited." Held that, unless A.'s attorney accepted the title, A. was not bound to consummate the sale, and could recover back money deposited on the sale.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; J. P. Hoge, Judge.

Action by John De Witt Allen against Louis Pockwitz to recover back certain money paid by plaintiff to defendant on a contract of purchase of real estate, in which there was a judgment for plaintiff. From an order granting a new trial on motion of defendant, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Smith, Wright & Pomeroy, for appellant. Reinstein & Eisner, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. On June 21, 1889, the plaintiff, personally, and defendant, through the agency of David Stern & Son, real-estate brokers, executed the following written instrument: "San Francisco, June 21, 1889. Received from John De Witt Allen the sum of one thousand ($1,000) dollars, being deposit on account of thirty-five thousand ($35,000) dollars, U. S. gold coin, the purchase price of the property this day sold to him, situated in the city and county of San Francisco, state of California, and described as follows, to wit: Lot and improvements situated on the northeast corner of Van Ness and Ash avenues, 58 feet on Van Ness avenue by 100 feet on Ash avenue. Terms of sale: 21 days are allowed to examine title and consummate sale. At the termination of said time, the balance of said purchase money is due and payable upon tender of the deed of the property sold. Title to be examined and accepted or rejected by J. De Witt Allen's attorney. Abstract to be run down to date. $150 to be allowed for attorney's fees. Mortgage to be released, and to be free and clear from all incumbrances. Taxes to be paid to July 1, 1889. If the sale is not consummated in accordance with the foregoing conditions, the deposit to be forfeited. David Stern & Son, Agents. Agreed to. John De W. Allen." The plaintiff submitted the abstract of the record title to his attorney, Sidney V. Smith, who was then a reputable attorney at law, and practicing as such in San Francisco, for examination, and to be accepted or rejected by him according to the above agreement. He rejected the title as to an undivided one-third part of the lot, for reasons stated by him in writing and duly communicated to defendant and to David Stern & Son. Thereupon plaintiff demanded a return of the $1,000 deposited, which in the meantime had been delivered to defendant. The defendant refused to return the deposit, tendered to plaintiff a deed for the lot, and demanded the balance of the purchase money, claiming that the title was perfect, notwithstanding it had been rejected by plaintiff's attorney. Thereupon plaintiff brought this action to recover the deposit of $1,000, with interest. The judgment was in favor of the plaintiff; but, on motion of the defendant, a new trial was granted, and this appeal by plaintiff is from the order granting a new trial.

It is not claimed that the written agreement was for an unconditional sale, but the parties disagree as to what were intended to be the conditions upon which plaintiff would be bound to "consummate the sale," by payment of the balance of the purchase money. The appellant contends that one of the conditions of his obligation to consummate the sale was that his attorney should accept and not reject the record title, while the respondent contends that the only conditions intended were that the title should appear to be a good marketable title, and that defendant should tender a sufficient deed to convey such title. They also disagree as to whether or not defendants' title was in fact a good marketable title; but, in our view of the case, this question becomes immaterial, and upon it we express no opinion.

Our understanding and construction of the agreement is that, unless plaintiff's attorney accepted and did not reject the title, the plaintiff was not bound to consummate the sale. This, if not fully expressed, is fairly inferable from the language of the contract; otherwise no meaning nor purpose whatever can be attributed to a considerable portion of that language. For what purpose were 21 days allowed for examination of title and consummation of sale? Of what importance was an "abstract of title run down to date?" Why was the "title to be examined" by plaintiff's attorney, rather than by defendant's attorney? Was neither the acceptance nor rejection of the title by plaintiff's attorney to be of any consequence whatever? The language of the contract relating to the examination, acceptance, and rejection of the title, considered in connection with the subject-matter, will reasonably and justly bear the construction we have given it; and, since no other rational meaning, purpose, or consequence of that language can be imagined, that construction should be accepted. It was but a reasonable and prudent precaution on the part of the plaintiff to insist upon the condition that the title should be passed and accepted by his own attorney, contrary to whose opinion and advice he was unwilling to invest $35,000 in a city lot. Had the condition been simply that the title should be good and marketable, the plaintiff might have been compelled to accept it, and to pay for the lot, as the result of a tedious and expensive lawsuit, the judgment in which, as to the title, would not have been conclusive against any adverse claimant who was not a party to the suit. Neither of the three cases cited by the counsel for respondent is in point. In Winter v. Stock, 29 Cal. 408, the vendor warranted "an indisputable and satisfactory title, or no sale." In Montgomery v. Land Bureau, 94 Cal. 284, 29 Pac. 640, the title was warranted to be "perfect." The case of Vought v. Williams, 120 N. Y. 253, 24 N. E. 195, was an action for specific performance of a contract of sale which provided that the title was to be "first class." In each of these cases the title was rejected by the attorney for the vendee; but in each the court held that the material question was whether or not the title was good and marketable, and not whether it was acceptable to the vendee's attorney. But in the case at bar, according to our construction of the contract, the only warranty or representation as to the quality of the title was that it should be acceptable to plaintiff's attorney. Therefore, the question whether or not the title was, in fact, a good marketable title, is not involved, as it was in the cases cited by counsel for respondent; and since it appears that plaintiff's attorney rejected the title, and it is not even suggested that the rejection was not the result of a sufficient examination and an honest opinion, the order granting a new trial should be reversed; and it is so ordered.

PIERCE v. WILLIS et al. (No. 15,279.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 13, 1894.)

NEW TRIAL—WHEN GRANTED—ERRONEOUS FINDINGS—MATTERS OF LAW OR FACT—SUIT TO ENFORCE MECHANIC'S LIEN.

1. In an action to enforce a mechanic's lien, a specification on plaintiffs' motion for a new trial that they consider themselves "aggrieved by the finding 'that the liens of the plaintiffs, and each of them, were not filed within the time required by law,'" this being an extract from the conclusion of law, cannot be considered an attack on the findings of fact so as to authorize the grant of a new trial for error therein.

2. Where, in an action to enforce a mechanic's lien, there are findings as to the time of abandonment of the contract by the original contractor and the time of completion of the building by a subsequent contractor, and the undenied allegations of the complaint show the time of filing the lien, the question whether the lien was filed within the statutory time is to be determined from such facts, and error in finding that it was so filed is not ground for granting a new trial.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court of city and county of San Francisco; William T. Wallace, Judge.

Action by David T. Pierce against A. A. Willis and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Reversed.

W. S. Goodfellow, for appellants. Morrison & Foerster, Constantine E. A. Foerster, and Parker & Eells, for respondent.

TEMPLE, C. This is an appeal from an order granting a new trial to plaintiff. Five actions brought to foreclose mechanics' liens were consolidated and tried under the above title. Upon the trial, the truth of all the allegations of the complaint were admitted except as to attorney's fees. The contract under which the work was contracted to be done was read in evidence, and from it and the admissions the court found, in substance, that the contract which is annexed to the findings was duly filed in the recorder's office of the city and county of San Francisco, but that "no plans, drawings, or specifications were at any time filed with said contract, or at all, nor were any plans, drawings, or specifications ever at any time annexed to said instrument;" that defendant Willis, who had contracted to construct said building with defendant Birkholm, abandoned the building and contract June 12, 1889, and failed to complete the same, and more than 30 days before the filing of plaintiff's claims of lien, or any of them, ceased from labor upon said unfinished and uncompleted contract, nor was labor ever resumed thereon by him or any person representing him; but defendant Birkholm, within 30 days after Willis had abandoned the contract, commenced work upon the building, and completed the same on the 20th day of August, 1889. As conclusion of law, the court found that the liens were not filed in time, and that plaintiffs take nothing by their action, and defendant Birkholm recover his costs. Among the allegations of the complaint is one that the building was fully completed on the 20th day of August, 1889, and another that the notice of lien was filed September 18, 1889. Plaintiff moved for a new trial, stating in his notice of intention all the statutory grounds. The statement contains the contract and the admissions. The only specifications of error are as follows: "Plaintiffs specify the following particulars in which the decision of the court in this cause was against law: The findings show that the contract entered into between defendant Birkholm and defendant Willis provided for the construction of a structure of which the only description is as follows: A 'two-story dwelling-house and shed;' and said structure was to be built 'in conformity with the plans, drawings, and specifications for the same made by Chas. S. Shaner, the authorized architect employed by the owner; and which are signed by the parties hereto;' * * * and that 'the specifications and drawings are intended to co-operate so that any work exhibited in the drawings, and not mentioned in the specifications, or vice versa, are to be executed the same as if both mentioned in the specifications and set forth in the drawings, to the true intent and meaning of the said drawings and specifications when taken together.' And said findings furthermore show that the said plans, drawings, and specifications so referred to in said contract were never filed in the office of the county recorder of the city and county of San Francisco. Said findings also show that the only description in said instrument of the property upon which said building was to be constructed was as follows: 'A lot of land situate in the city of San Francisco, county of San Francisco, state of California, and described as follows: "The south side of Twentieth street, between Dolores and Guerrero streets.'" It therefore appears from said findings that no contract between the said Birkholm and the said Willis, neither any memorandum of such, was ever filed in the office of the said county recorder, from which it follows that the alleged contract was void; and, it appearing that plaintiff's liens were filed within less than thirty days from and after the completion of said building by Birkholm, they were therefore filed within the time required by law; and the decision of the court that plaintiff's liens, and each of them, were not filed within the time required by law, and that plaintiffs are entitled to take nothing by their action against the said defendant Birkholm, and that the said defendant Birkholm is entitled to judgment for his costs, is therefore against law."

Appellants contend that the order granting a new trial should be reversed, because the court was not authorized to grant a new trial, upon the ground that the conclusions from the facts found are against law; that is, that the judgment is not supported by the findings of fact. Brison v. Brison, 90 Cal. 323, 27 Pac. 186. Respondent's counsel admit the rule, but contend that in their motion for a new trial they do attack the findings. They say: "We consider ourselves aggrieved by the finding 'that the liens of the plaintiffs and each of them, were not filed within the time required by law.'" This is an extract from the conclusion of law, and in the specifications of error it is stated argumentatively that the conclusion is shown by the facts found to be against law. The entire conclusion of law is set forth in the specifications as the decision which is against law. There can be no claim that the conclusion of law is really a finding of fact. It simply indicates the judgment to be entered, and it is expressly stated that it is a conclusion from the preceding findings of fact. The preceding findings show when the contract was abandoned, when the building was completed, and the undenied allegation in the complaint shows when the liens were filed. These are all the facts upon which plaintiff based his contention that the decision was against law. There is no other material fact which could be found in his favor if a new trial were had. If the court can change the conclusion from the above facts—that the liens were not filed in time—into a finding of fact, still it would be a fact to be determined solely from the above facts, all of which are admitted and found. The order must be reversed.

We concur: BELCHER, C.; VANCLIEF, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the order appealed from is reversed.

TREANOR v. HOUGHTON et al. (No. 15,320.)

STREET ASSESSMENT — ACTION TO RECOVER — PLEADING—AIDER BY VERDICT—SEPARATE CONTRACTS FOR IMPROVEMENT—VALIDITY.

1. In an action to enforce an assessment for street repairs, the failure of the complaint to show that the contract under which the work was done fixed the time for the commencement and completion of the work, as required by Act March 18, 1885, § 6, is cured by a finding that the contract did so fix the time for commencing and completing the work.

2. In an action to recover an assessment for street repairs, an allegation in the complaint that the "commissioner of streets made, in the manner and form required by law, an assessment upon the lots and lands fronting thereon, each lot or portion of a lot being separately assessed, in proportion to the frontage, at a rate per front foot sufficient to cover the total expenses of the work, sufficiently shows a compliance with section 7, Act March 18, 1885, which provides that the assessment for the entire work shall be at a uniform rate upon all the property fronting on the improvement.

3. Under Act March 18, 1885, which provides for a single contract for street improvements, under a given resolution of intention, a resolution ordering work to be done, and an award of a contract thereunder, and providing no method by which separate assessments can be made, or separate warrants issued by street superintendents to different contractors, the council has no power to award separate contracts for such improvements, and assessments made under such contracts will be void.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Santa Clara county; W. G. Lorigan, Judge.

Action by Thomas Treanor, a street contractor, against S. O. Houghton and another, to recover $132.80 assessed upon the lot of defendants for street improvements. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Reversed.

N. H. Castle, for appellants. C. T. Bird, for respondent.

SEARLS, C. This is an action by a street contractor to recover $132.80 assessed upon the lot of defendants for its pro rata of the cost of improving Julian street, in the city of San Jose, under proceedings had by virtue of the act of March 18, 1885 (St. 1885, p. 147). Plaintiff had judgment, from which defendant appeals. The cause comes up on the judgment roll, without a statement or bill of exceptions.

The city of San Jose is, and at all the times hereinafter mentioned was, a municipal corporation. Julian street, at the several dates hereinafter mentioned, was, and is, an open, located public street in said city of San Jose, with duly-established width and grade. On the 12th day of March, 1888, the mayor and common council of the city of San Jose passed and approved a resolution declaring its intention "to order that portion of Julian street, between First street and the eastern city limits, to be improved to the official grade, said improvement to consist of excavating, grading, curbing, guttering and graveling the roadway, the gravel to be screened." The whole question, on this appeal, relates to the sufficiency of the complaint, in stating facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. We need not state the proceedings in full, as detailed in the complaint, but only such omissions and statements as are relied upon by appellant as cause for reversal. There was no demurrer or other objection interposed to the complaint, and the objections to its sufficiency are urged here for the first time. The cause was tried by the court, and the findings are full and explicit upon all the material issues, and no objections are made thereto. Hence, it follows that all errors and omissions which are cured by verdict are waived.

Changing, for convenience of examination, the order of appellant's objections to the complaint, and we will say it is objected that the complaint fails to allege that the contract fixed the time for the commencement and completion of the work, which it is claimed, is fatal to the validity of the complaint. Libbey v. Elsworth, 97 Cal. 316, 32 Pac. 228, and Washburn v. Lyons, 97 Cal. 314, 32 Pac. 310, are relied upon in support of this proposition. Libbey v. Elsworth was a case in which the contract was not entered into within 15 days after notice of the award as required by section 5 of the act of March 18, 1885 (St. 1885, p. 147); and, no cause for the delay being averred, a demurrer was sustained by the court below, and this action was sustained upon appeal. The complaint was also said to be defective, in that it failed to show that the contract entered into between the superintendent of streets and the assignor of the plaintiff fixed any time for the commencement or completion of the work therein provided for, which, it was held, was a fatal error. In Washburn v. Lyons, supra, it was held that the omission, in a like contract, to fix the time for the commencement and completion of the work to be done thereunder, in accordance with section 6 of the act of March 18, 1885, above referred to, was fatal on demurrer. In this case the street to be improved was divided into six sections, as will be hereafter noticed, and separate contracts let for the several sections. The contracts were awarded August 13, 1888, and entered into August 25, 1888,—less than 15 days after the award. The complaint does not, in express terms, aver the time specified in the contract for the commencement and completion of the work under the contract. It avers that all the work ordered to be done under the resolution "was and has been completed pursuant to said contracts and said plans and specifications, within the time given by said commissioner of streets in said contracts, with materials complying with the specifications, * * * under the direction and to the satisfaction of said commissioner of streets, and was and has been duly accepted by him." Beyond this quotation, I find no averment in the complaint referring to the matter under consideration. The court finds, as a fact, that each of the contracts provided that the work should commence on or before August 28, 1888, and should be completed on or before November 28, 1888. That the omission in the complaint would have been fatal, in the face of a special demurrer, is settled by the cases quoted supra, and by many others to which we might refer. The question, however, is, can appellant, after verdict, raise the question here for the first time? Chitty, in his work on Pleading (at page 705 of volume 1) lays down the rule as follows: "The second mode by which defects in pleading may be, in some cases, aided, is by intendment after verdict. The doctrine upon this subject is founded upon the common law, and is independent of any statutory enactments. The general principle upon which it depends appears to be that where there is any defect, imperfection, or omission in any pleading, whether in substance or form, which would have been a fatal objection upon demurrer, yet if the issue joined be such as necessarily required, on the trial, proof of the facts so defectively or imperfectly stated or omitted, and without which it is not to be presumed that either the judge would direct the jury to give, or the jury would have given, the verdict, such defect, imperfection, or omission is cured by the verdict. The expression, 'cured by verdict,' signifies that the court will, after a verdict, presume or intend that the particular thing which appears to be defectively or imperfectly stated or omitted in the pleadings was duly proven at the trial." The difficulty experienced, in many cases of this character, is to determine whether or not the omitted fact or facts were proven at the trial. In the present instance, we are met with no difficulty of this character. The cause having been tried by the court, and the facts found, it appears affirmatively by the record that what was omitted in the complaint was supplied without objection at the trial. The defective statement of the complaint, wherein it was averred that the work and improvements were completed pursuant to the contracts, "within the time given by said commissioner of streets in said contracts," was but an inferential statement that the contracts specified the time within which the work was to be done, but was, in the language of the common law, an allegation that is "holpen by verdict." The defendant having gone to trial upon such imperfect statement without objection, and it having been cured by the findings, which we must suppose were supported by testimony, he cannot now successfully raise the question of the sufficiency of the complaint in that respect.

It is further urged that there is no allegation in the complaint that the assessment for the entire work was at a uniform rate upon all the property fronting on the improvement. The allegation of the complaint is that the "commissioner of streets made, in the manner and form required by law, an assessment upon the lots and lands fronting thereon; each lot or portion of a lot being separately assessed in proportion to the frontage, at a rate per front foot sufficient to cover the total expense of the work." This is in compliance with the requirements of the seventh section of the statute of 1885, quoted supra, and is sufficient. There are some exceptions in the statute to the general rule in regard to assessments, but if defendant's case came within them, or any of them, it devolved upon him to make it known by objection to the assessment as made, by an appeal to the city council, under section 11 of the act. Perine v. Forbush, 97 Cal. 305, 32 Pac. 226. Not having done so, the objection, if any, was waived.

It is further objected that it does not appear that any contract was let for doing the work as a whole, as proposed by the resolution and notice of intention, but, on the contrary, the street was divided into six sections, numbered from 1 to 6, inclusive, and each section let separately. Dougherty v. Hitchcock, 35 Cal. 512; City of Stockton v. Whitmore, 50 Cal. 554; Richardson v. Heydenfeldt, 46 Cal. 68; and People v. Clark, 47 Cal. 456,—are cited in support of the contention that the method adopted by the city council was invalid. The record clearly sustains the allegation that the resolution of intention was for the improvement as a unit, and that six several contracts were entered into for the performance of as many sections or portions of the work. The question arises, had the board the power to thus let separate contracts? In Dougherty v. Hitchcock the board of supervisors adopted a resolution of intention to grade Clay street from Taylor to Jones, and from Jones to Leavenworth, etc., and subsequently ordered the work to be done. Bidders were notified to put in separate bids for each block, and for a crossing. The board awarded a contract for the whole work, under which award the superintendent of streets entered into a contract for grading one block only, and this court held (1) that the resolution of intention, and its publication, constituted the sole authority of the board to proceed in the statutory mode to order said work to be done, and that thereby no authority was conferred to act upon any other or different work; (2) that the work designated in the resolution of intention constituted one distinct and entire subject-matter; (3) that the resolution of award constituted the sole authority to the superintendent of streets, who acted ministerially only in making the contract under it, and that, as the contract varied from the award, it was unauthorized and void; (4) that without a valid contract there can be no valid assessment upon property to pay for street improvements. City of Stockton v. Whitmore, 50 Cal. 554, supra, and Richardson v. Heydenfeldt, are to like effect,—not as to the facts, but in principle. The distinction between those cases and this, if any, consists in the fact that there only a portion of the work was completed, while here it was, under the several contracts, all consummated. The contention of respondent is that the fact that part of the work was performed by one, and part by another, person, could not deprive appellant of any right, or injure him in any respect, as his lot is only required to pay its just proportion of the cost, assessed in the manner provided by statute. The precise question for determination goes to the power of the officers to act in the manner indicated. Possibly, those officers might most advantageously have let a private contract to some responsible contractor to do the work indicated, without any preliminary action whatever, and, upon its completion, designated, without an assessment, the sum of money justly due from each property owner on the street in payment of the expense, and that by such a course the whole expense would have been less than under the statutory method, and hence, in a certain sense, no injustice would be done. The statute has defined the powers which may be exercised by city councils in the matter of the improvement of streets in municipalities. Under the dictate of the statute, each successive step by the board, looking to street improvements, is a condition precedent, essential to the validity of the next succeeding one in the series. The range of the district to be included in a single improvement, and the character of the work to be performed therein, within the specifications of the statute, are left to the judgment of the board. The resolution of intention must, however, define alike the limits of the district, and the nature of the work to be done. The entire work thus described becomes a unit,—a single enterprise,—upon which the power of the board, subject to the rights of the property owners, is thereafter to be exercised. The statute, in all its subsequent provisions, deals with it as a unit,—as a single improvement. It gives to "the owners of one-half or more of the frontage of the property fronting on said proposed work or improvement, where the same is for one block or more, the right to object in writing, and thereby to stay proceedings for six months, unless in the meantime a petition of a majority of such property owners shall ask that it be done." Section 3, Act 1885 (St. 1885, p. 148). By section 5 of the act, when bids have been received, and the contract has been awarded to the lowest responsible bidder, the owners of the major part of the frontage on lots and streets where the work is to be done may, within 10 days, without having made any bid or proposal, "elect to take said work, and enter into a written contract to do the whole work at the price at which the same has been awarded." The statute provides for a single assessment to be levied upon all the frontage upon the work; for a single warrant, which, with the assessment, is to be delivered to the contractor. Other illustrations drawn from the statute might be indulged, for the purpose of showing what is believed to be its evident intent, viz. to unify each improvement specified in the resolution of intention, to constitute it a unit for future action, in order that those who are called upon to bear the burden of the improvement may intelligently judge whether or not, taken as a whole, it will be for their interests to have such improvement consummated. In such cases it may well be that the consummation of a part of the improvement only would bring little or no benefit to owners of adjacent property, while, if completed as a whole, it would greatly enhance the value of their property and add to their convenience and comfort. Yet it must often follow that if a given improvement is to be segregated, and separate contracts let, a portion of the work will not be completed. Non constat that any bidders will apply for some of the subdivisions, or, if let, that the contracts will all be completed. The statute of 1885, which was intended to furnish a full and complete mode of procedure, makes no provision to meet any such cases. What the law, in such cases, requires to be done, is in part for the protection of the taxpayers, and is mandatory, and cannot be regarded as directory only. Clark v. Crane, 5 Mich. 154; Marsh v. Chesnut, 14 Ill. 223.

From a review of the statute, the conclusion is reached that, as its affirmative provisions are all made applicable to a single contract for street improvement, under a given resolution of intention, resolution ordering work to be done, and award of a contract thereunder, and as the statute is silent as to any method by which separate assessments can be made, or separate warrants issued by the street superintendent to different contractors, the city council has no power to award separate contracts, in such a case, for the performance of a single improvement. Not having the power to award separate contracts, their acts in the premises were void, and conferred no authority upon the superintendent of streets to enter into the contracts, or to levy an assessment upon property with a view to payment on account of improvements made under and by virtue thereof. The case presented is not one of irregularity or error in the exercise of a power conferred, which is cured by a failure to appeal to the council as provided by the statute, but one in which the council acted without and in excess of its power, and hence the act was void. The judgment appealed from should be reversed, and the cause remanded to the court below for such action as may be in accord with this opinion.

We concur: VANCLIEF, C.; TEMPLE, C.

PER CURIAM. The judgment appealed from is reversed, and the cause is remanded to the court below for such action as may be in accord with this opinion.

WETMORE v. BARRETT et al. (No. 15,282.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 26, 1894.)

GAMBLING CONTRACTS — STOCK PURCHASED ON MARGINS—ACTION TO RECOVER MONEY LOST.

1. Money paid a broker as margins on stock purchased by him with his own money for a customer, and retained as security until sold, may be recovered. 26 Pac. 883, followed.

2. Assessments paid by a broker on stock purchased for a customer, who put up only a margin, the stock being held as security, cannot be set off in an action by the customer to recover such margins.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; Walter H. Levy, Judge.

Action by W. N. Wetmore against Emmett P. Barrett and others to recover money lost in stock speculations. From a judgment for plaintiff, and an order denying a new trial, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

W. T. Baggett, for appellants. Roger Johnson, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. This action was brought to recover moneys paid to brokers in consideration of purchases of mining stock on margins. Most of the points raised are precisely those which were considered in Cashman v. Root, 89 Cal. 373, 26 Pac. 883. As we are entirely satisfied with the conclusion there reached, it is not necessary to go over the matter again. Defendants had printed the terms and conditions upon which they were doing business, and required plaintiff's agent to agree to them. Those printed terms show that the transactions upon which the money was paid were purchases of stock on margins, within Cashman v. Root. During the time defendants held the stock as security they paid certain assessments which they now insist should be deducted from the amount recovered. The answer contains no claim for a set-off, nor is there a plea of payment or counterclaim. No such credit seems to have been asked for in the trial court. Had there been such a plea, however, the contention could not have been sustained. There was no request made by plaintiff for the payment; and, as the transaction was void, defendants did not hold the stocks, upon which the assessments were paid, for plaintiff, or as security for a debt due from him. The law will not, therefore, imply a request to pay nor a promise to repay. So far as the statement shows any indebtedness arising more than two years before the action was commenced, it also shows that such indebtedness was based upon similar transactions to those after that period. We cannot presume that any part of the moneys recovered were paid upon any such transactions. No specification as to the insufficiency of the evidence suggests such point. The judgment and order are affirmed.

JOHNSON v. GREENBERG et al. (No. 15,375.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 26, 1894.)

REVIEW ON APPEAL—CONFLICTING EVIDENCE.

Where there is a substantial conflict in the testimony, with sufficient proof to sustain them, the findings of the trial court will not be set aside.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; Eugene R. Garber, Judge.

Action by C. B. Johnson to enjoin Edwin F. O'Neal, as sheriff, from executing a deed to one of defendants, B. Schwartz, and to enjoin defendants Meyer Greenberg and B. Schwartz from further proceedings in the case of defendant Greenberg against defendant California Bituminous Rock Company. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

T. C. Van Ness (Wilcoxon & Bouldin, of counsel), for appellant. Reinstein & Eisner, Graves & Graves, and E. P. Cole, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. This action was brought to enjoin the defendant Edwin F. O'Neal, as sheriff of the county of San Luis Obispo, from executing or delivering to defendant B. Schwartz a deed to certain land situated in said county of San Luis Obispo, the property of defendant the California Bituminous Rock Company (a corporation), which lands were sold by said sheriff under an execution issued upon a judgment in favor of defendant Meyer Greenberg against California Bituminous Rock Company, and also to enjoin defendants Greenberg and Schwartz from further proceedings in the action upon which said judgment was rendered. The theory of the amended complaint may be briefly stated as follows: The plaintiff and defendants L. M. Warden and Meyer Greenberg were the owners of the certain lands described in the complaint, the title of which, by common consent, stood in the name of Greenberg, but who held in trust for his co-owners, the plaintiff being the beneficiary as to one-fourth thereof. The corporation defendant was organized by them, and the land conveyed to such corporation. There were 1,250 shares of the capital stock of the corporation, of which stock, plaintiff, defendants Warden, Greenberg, and Underhill each held 300 shares, and defendants Graves 50 shares. On January 17, 1891, defendant Greenberg brought suit against the corporation to recover $8,155.15 for money advanced by him and paid out for the corporation, and on the 7th of March, 1891, obtained judgment. The land in question was sold on the 11th of April, 1891, under an execution issued on such judgment, and purchased by defendant B. Schwartz for the sum of about $8,155.15. The complainant avers that the corporation defendant was not indebted to Greenberg in the sum of $8,155.15, or any other sum of money, at the commencement of the suit, and that the action and the sale of the property was a fraudulent scheme on the part of defendants Greenberg and Warden to defraud plaintiff and the other defendants of the property, and that the purchase thereof by Schwartz was for the benefit of Greenberg, and to procure the title for him, and that, thereafter, Greenberg and Warden were to become the owners thereof, to the exclusion of plaintiff and the other defendants; that plaintiff knew nothing of the suit until within a month prior to the commencement of this action; and that the land is of the value of $50,000. The answer denies all the allegations charging fraud; avers that the defendant corporation was justly indebted to Greenberg; that his claim was a bona fide claim and demand, as plaintiff, who was a director of the corporation, well knew, and that he was well aware of the pendency of Greenberg's action against the corporation within one month after it was brought; and that the value of the land is not in excess of $10,000. The written findings fully negative all allegations of fraud, and, in addition thereto, it is found that all the allegations of the answer are true, except that as to the value of the land, which is found to be $15,000.

Upon the close of the testimony, counsel for the plaintiff asked leave of the court to amend his complaint so as to charge, in substance, that the amount sued for by Greenberg, as due him on account of advances made for the corporation, and in payment of the unpaid balance of the purchase price of the land, was not in fact due him, but that he, the said Greenberg, had in fact borrowed the sum of $8,155.15 from Schwartz for and on behalf of the corporation defendant, and with the money so borrowed for the corporation had paid off and discharged the obligations of the corporation, all of which was known to defendant Schwartz before and at the time of the sheriff's sale, etc. The court permitted the amendment on condition that the case be opened, and defendants permitted to introduce such further proofs as they might desire. The complaint was amended accordingly, whereupon defendants introduced further testimony.

Formal objections are made to each of the 12 findings of the court, upon the ground that the evidence is insufficient to sustain them. The only question, however, in the case, worthy of consideration, is as to whether the money loaned by defendant Schwartz was so loaned to Greenberg on his own account, or through him to the defendant corporation. Greenberg was secretary of the corporation, and a son-in-law of defendant Schwartz. That he procured from Schwartz the sum of $8,155.15, or thereabouts, is well established. The deposition of Schwartz was read in evidence and he was also called as a witness on behalf of plaintiff. His testimony was not at all clear or convincing but may be fairly interpreted as showing that he supposed he was advancing the money to the defendant corporation, or to obtain a mortgage or some lien against the corporation, or to purchase notes of the corporation; and portions of his testimony go to show that he thought he was loaning the money to the corporation defendant. The language used by the witnesss indicates that he is a German, who speaks our language indifferently; and the testimony, taken as a whole, shows that his understanding of English is imperfect. He advanced this money, as he thinks, in March or April, 1891. On the other hand, it was conclusively proven that plaintiff and defendants Warden and Greenberg, in 1887, gave their joint and several note to Jack and Goldtree for $2,937.50, with interest, being for a part of the original purchase price of the land; that the corporation defendant assumed to pay, but did not pay, the note; that Warden and Greenberg paid it by a new note made by them for $3,191.12, with interest, etc.; that the corporation defendant, engaged in mining and selling bituminous rock from the land in question, met with losses, and that defendants Warden and Greenberg borrowed other moneys at the request of and for the corporation, for which they gave their notes, until in 1890, when the aggregate of the indebtedness of the company for which they were responsible was $8,000, for which they and one H. Crocker gave their joint and several note for said sum of $8,000, at 30 days, with interest. Crocker paid the note off at maturity and brought suit against Greenberg and Warden. On the 9th day of January, 1891, Greenberg paid the demand in suit by an overdraft on the First National Bank of San Luis Obispo for $8,155.15, promising the bank to come to San Francisco, and borrow from Schwartz the money to meet such overdraft. On January 17th he brought this suit, and subsequently procured the money from Schwartz, and paid the overdraft with it. As Greenberg procured judgment March 7, 1891, it may well be that the fact that Greenberg had a lien upon the property was an idea prevalent in the mind of Schwartz when he testified, and which will account for many of the statements that he thought the property good for the investment, etc. But waiving all explanation of his testimony, and the fact still remains that there was a substantial conflict in the testimony, with sufficient proof to sustain each and every finding of the court. The judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

MORRISON v. STONE et al. (No. 15,408.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 13, 1894.)

ADOPTION OF SPECIAL VERDICT—FINDINGS—HARMLESS ERROR.

1. A special verdict, adopted as the basis of a judgment, is equivalent to findings by the court.

2. Failure to find upon a fact in issue is harmless error, when a finding in favor of appellant thereon would not affect the judgment.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Santa Clara county; W. H. Levy, Judge.

Action by George H. Morrison against N. J. Stone and others to recover damages for a conspiracy. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Pierson & Mitchell, for appellant. Reddy, Campbell & Metson, for respondents.

HAYNES, C. This action was brought by Morrison, a stockholder in the History Company, a corporation, on behalf of himself and of all other stockholders in said corporation who should join him in the action, against N. J. Stone, J. L. Hebert, Elizabeth C. Latham, administratrix of the estate of A. S. Latham, and said History Company. The complaint charges a conspiracy between Stone, Hebert, and Latham, all of whom were connected with said History Company (Stone being vice president), to injure that corporation by organizing another, known as the Pacific Publishing Company, and that, after the formation of the last-named corporation, Stone assumed to sell and transfer to it the stock of eastern subscription books belonging to the History Company, together with the agency and good will thereof, whereby the History Company had been deprived of a large portion of its stock in trade, had lost valuable agencies, was crippled in its business, and had been compelled to suspend payment of dividends, to the damage of the History Company in the sum of $50,000. The prayer is for damages and for an accounting. The answers of the several individual defendants put in issue all the material allegations of the complaint, including the facts upon which the plaintiff assumed the right to bring the action in his own name. The case was tried before a jury upon nine special issues properly submitted to it, to all of which the jury returned answers in favor of the defendants, and also therewith returned a general verdict in their favor. The defendants moved for judgment thereon, and their motion was granted; and the plaintiff excepted, and brings this appeal upon the judgment roll and a bill of exceptions.

The only ground upon which appellant contends for reversal is that findings were not waived, and that none were filed. It is said by respondents that this is an action at law for damages, and that the general verdict covers all the issues, and that findings are not required, while appellant insists that it is an equitable action. Without deciding that question, we will assume that the action is of equitable cognizance, since there could be no possible ground of reversal if the action is at law. Where a special verdict of a jury is adopted by the court, it takes the place of, and is equivalent to, findings by the court. Warring v. Freear, 64 Cal. 56, 28 Pac. 115. Nor is it necessary that the word "adopt" be used, in order to show an adoption of the findings made by a jury upon special issues. Goldman v. Rogers, 85 Cal. 578, 24 Pac. 782. That the special verdict was adopted by the court, we think, is sufficiently clear. Upon the hearing of defendants' motion for judgment an order was made "that judgment be entered in accordance with the verdict of the jury rendered herein;" and all the special issues submitted to the jury, with their answers or findings thereon, were incorporated in the judgment, together with the general verdict. Indeed, it is not even suggested by counsel for appellant that the special findings by the jury were not adopted, nor is it contended that the special verdict does not cover all the issues. Whether it does or not is immaterial, since the findings made by the jury are decisive of the case, and no others were necessary. Among other things, the jury found that the demand of the plaintiff upon the History Company to bring this action, and its refusal to do so, were simulated, and not in good faith. These findings negative the right of the plaintiff to maintain the action. Bacon v. Irvine, 70 Cal. 225, 11 Pac. 646; Hawes v. Oakland, 104 U. S. 460, 461; Mor. Corp. §§ 240, 241. The material facts, involving the merits of the action, were also found in favor of the defendants. We can discover no fact in issue upon which a finding is not made, which, if found in favor of appellant, would affect the judgment; and a failure to find thereon, if erroneous, is not prejudicial. Diefendorff v. Hopkins, 95 Cal. 347, 348, 28 Pac. 265, and 30 Pac. 549, and cases cited. The judgment appealed from should be affirmed.

We concur: BELCHER, C.; TEMPLE, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment appealed from is affirmed.

BRODER et al. v. SUPERIOR COURT OF MONO COUNTY. (No. 15,513.)

MANDAMUS TO JUDGE.

When a retiring judge filed conclusions of law and fact, and directed the counsel to prepare an interlocutory judgment for the purpose of an accounting between the parties, a mandamus will not be granted to compel his successor to enter judgment on such findings, as until final judgment the trial court is not concluded by any of its orders, and its judicial discretion cannot be directed by mandamus.

In bank.

Application for a writ of mandate by R. C. Broder and others against the superior court of Mono county (W. H. Virden, Judge). Denied.

Rich. S. Miner, for petitioners. P. Reddy and W. H. Metson, for respondent.

HARRISON, J. In Broder v. Conklin, 98 Cal. 360, 33 Pac. 211, the order of the superior court of Mono county, setting aside a judgment that had been entered on the judgment book of that court in pursuance of certain findings of fact and conclusions of law previously filed therein, was affirmed; and after the remittitur had been filed in the court below the petitioners herein made a motion before that court that a judgment and decree be entered in the cause upon said findings of fact and conclusions of law. This motion was denied by the superior court, and the petitioners have made application to this court for a writ of mandate directing the respondent to render and enter a judgment in accordance with and upon said findings of fact and conclusions of law.

A judgment is the final determination of the rights of the parties in an action, and, when the action is tried by the court, cannot be entered until after a decision of the cause has been rendered. Hence, a writ of mandate will not be granted to compel a court to enter a judgment in a cause until after the court has tried the cause, and rendered its decision. So long as any judicial act remains to be performed before the decision can be made, the cause has not been tried, and a judgment cannot be entered. While the cause remains undetermined the court before which it is pending cannot be compelled to try it in any particular mode, or to make any special order for the mode in which it is to be tried. The action of the court is to be reviewed upon appeal, but cannot be controlled or supervised by a previous direction of this court. While the cause remains undecided the trial court is not concluded by any ruling or order that it may have made during the trial, or by any conclusion which it may have reached upon a controverted question of fact. It may change its ruling whereby evidence has been excluded or received, and allow such evidence, and make a ruling with reference thereto according to its subsequent view; it may set aside the submission of the cause, and allow additional evidence upon one or all of the issues in the case, even if it has indicated or formulated its conclusion upon the evidence already received; it may set aside an order of reference to try an issue, and try the issue itself; or it may vacate any other interlocutory order made in the progress of the trial. Until all the issues in the case have been decided, and the decision filed with the clerk, the cause remains in the breast of the judge, and during that time cannot be controlled or directed by any supervisory court. In Broder v. Conklin, supra, we said: "It sufficiently appears in the present case that, at the time when Judge Rooney filed his findings of fact and certain conclusions of law, he did not himself consider that the action had been fully tried. His conclusion that the plaintiffs were entitled to judgment was qualified by the next clause, in which he directed counsel to prepare an interlocutory judgment for the purpose of directing a referee to take an account between the parties. It is manifest from this direction that the character and extent of the judgment was not to be determined by him until after such account had been taken." As the rights of the parties to this action cannot be finally determined, and a corresponding judgment rendered, until after an account has been taken, and as the trial court cannot be compelled to enter an interlocutory order or judgment for the reference and an accounting, it follows that the cause has not been fully tried, and that the mode of trial and the decision yet to be made are to be determined in the discretion of the trial court. After the aforesaid findings were filed the court still retained the power to set aside its direction to counsel to prepare an interlocutory judgment directing a reference, and to take such steps with reference to completing the trial as it might deem expedient, or most in accordance with the interests of the parties before it. The order of May 13th, that the cause be placed upon the calendar to be set for trial, was an exercise of its judicial discretion, and is not to be set aside or superseded by a direction from this court to act in a different manner. The application for the writ is denied.

We concur: McFARLAND, J.; GAROUTTE, J.; FITZGERALD, J.

WARREN v. McGILL. (No. 15,404.)

CLAIMS AGAINST DECEDENT'S ESTATE—COMPETENCY OF WITNESS—INTEREST.

1. Under a statute requiring creditors, when they file their claims against a decedent's estate, to file an affidavit stating that no payments have been made thereon which are not credited, and that there are no offsets to the same to the knowledge of the "affiant" (Code Civ. Proc. § 1494), an affidavit, filed by the claimant, which recites to the knowledge of the "claimant," is sufficient. Davis v. Browning, 27 Pac. 937, 91 Cal. 603, followed.

2. In an action against an executor for a debt due from his decedent, the fact that a prior claim for a less amount was filed by the claimant and disallowed does not estop her from asserting her rights under the later claim, where she testified, without being contradicted, that the first claim, which she never saw, was largely incorrect.

3. The fact that plaintiff's witness also has a case of the same kind pending does not disqualify him from testifying.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; John Hunt, Judge.

Action by Mrs. M. J. Warren against H. M. McGill, executor of Thomas Hovenden. There was a judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Henry M. McGill, for appellant. H. C. Firebaugh, for respondent.

BELCHER, C. Action to recover money due from an estate. The complaint avers, in substance, that Thomas Hovenden was indebted to the plaintiff in the sum of $6,828.06, and died leaving a will, in which the defendant, McGill, was named as executor; that the will was admitted to probate, and letters testamentary were issued to defendant, who duly qualified, and entered upon the discharge of his duties as executor; that notice to creditors to present their claims was published, and thereafter within the time prescribed the claim of plaintiff, a copy of which is attached to the complaint, verified by the oath of the claimant, was duly presented to the defendant, as such executor, for allowance, and was by him rejected. The answer denies the indebtedness, denies that the claim on which the action is founded was duly presented to defendant for allowance, and avers that no claim for the alleged indebtedness was ever presented to defendant, as such executor, "in manner or form as required by the statute of this state in such case made and provided." The case was tried by the court, and the findings were, in effect, that the plaintiff was entitled to judgment for the sum of $4,116.65 and costs of suit, to be paid in due course of administration. Judgment was accordingly so entered, from which, and from an order denying a new trial, the defendant appeals.

1. The point that the evidence was insufficient to justify the findings cannot be sustained. Much of the evidence introduced by the plaintiff is omitted from the record, but enough is set out to support the decision. It is true there was some conflict in the evidence, and some inconsistencies were shown, but those were matters for solution by the trial court, and its action cannot be disturbed on appeal.

2. The point that the claim was not duly presented in manner or form as required by statute is rested upon the fact that the affidavit attached to the claim stated "that no payments have been made thereon which are not credited, and that there are no offsets to the same to the knowledge of said claimant;" and it is argued that the affidavit was fatally defective, because the words found in the statute (section 1494, Code Civ. Proc.), "to the knowledge of the affiant," were not used. This point is without merit. It appears from the affidavit that the same person was "claimant" and "affiant," and the use of one word rather than the other was, therefore, wholly immaterial. See Davis v. Browning, 91 Cal. 603, 27 Pac. 1031, where the same point was raised, and decided against the contention of appellant here.

3. The point that the plaintiff is estopped from asserting any rights under the claim sued upon is based upon the fact that, prior to its presentation, another claim, verified by her, and showing the indebtedness to be of a less amount, was presented to defendant for allowance. No such defense is set up or suggested in the answer, and, in our opinion, it is untenable. It is true that a prior claim was made out and sent to defendant, but it was never approved by him, and, as shown by plaintiff's uncontradicted testimony, it was never read to or seen by her, and was largely incorrect. Under these circumstances the doctrine of estoppel cannot be invoked.

4. Certain errors of law are specified in the statement, but they are simply referred to in appellant's points and authorities, without any argument, and may be briefly disposed of. The first error specified is that the court erred in overruling defendant's objection to the introduction in evidence of plaintiff's account book. The objection was: "That the entries in said book were in several instances without date and unintelligible; and, further, that a mere inspection of said book shows that all the entries therein, purporting to cover a period of several months, had been written at the same time, and were evidently incorrect, and had been made at a very recent date." There is nothing in the record showing that this objection was based on any valid ground. No part of the contents of the book or of the evidence in relation to it is set out, and it must therefore be presumed that the ruling of the court was correct. The second error specified is that the court erred in overruling defendant's objection to the competency of plaintiff's witness David Dalzell, and permitting him to testify. The objection was that the witness was incompetent because he had a suit pending against defendant of the same character as this, and "was personally interested in sustaining the alleged claim of plaintiff against defendant." There was nothing in this objection. The interest of the witness in the result did not at all affect his competency to testify. At most it could be considered only in determining what weight should be given to his testimony. The third error specified is that the court erred in overruling defendant's motion for a nonsuit. The ground of the motion was that no claim for the money sued for had been presented, and there was no evidence to justify or sustain the demand. But the defendant expressly admitted that the claim was presented to and rejected by him, and there was, as we have seen, evidence sufficient to justify and sustain the demand. The ruling of the court was therefore without error. We find no prejudicial error in the record, and advise that the judgment and order be affirmed.

We concur: SEARLS, C.; TEMPLE, C.

DALZELL v. McGILL. (No. 15,405.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 26, 1894.)

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; John Hunt, Judge.

Action by David Dalzell against H. M. McGill, executor of Thomas Hovendon. There was a judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Henry M. McGill, for appellant. H. C. Firebaugh, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. This case is in all material respects, except as to the amount involved, the same as that of Warren v. McGill (No. 15,404, filed June 18, 1894), 37 Pac. 144. The cases were tried about the same time, and it was stipulated that the testimony given in the Warren Case, where applicable, might be considered as evidence in this. Upon the authority of the decision in the case referred to, the judgment and order appealed from in this case are affirmed.

STEVENS v. SAN FRANCISCO & N. P. R. CO. (No. 15,468.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 26, 1894.)

EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS—PERSONAL LIABILITY FOR COSTS—STATUTES CONSTRUED.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1509, providing that administrators shall be individually liable for costs adjudged against them, and section 1031, providing that costs may be recovered in an action prosecuted or defended by an administrator, but such costs must, by the judgment, be chargeable only upon the estate represented, an administrator is personally liable for costs, unless charged by the judgment upon the estate represented.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; A. A. Sanderson, Judge.

Action by Catherine Stevens against the San Francisco & North Pacific Railroad Company. There was a judgment for defendant, and from an order denying a motion for execution against plaintiff, personally, for costs, defendant appeals. Order reversed.

Charles F. Hanlon, for appellant. Henry E. Highton, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. By the final judgment entered in this case, it was "ordered, adjudged, and decreed that Catherine Stevens, administratrix of the estate of Joseph Stevens, deceased, plaintiff, do take nothing by this her said action against the San Francisco & North Pacific Railroad Company, a corporation, defendant, but that judgment be, and the same is hereby, entered herein in favor of said defendant for its costs and disbursements incurred herein," taxed at $640.75. Subsequently, the defendant demanded of the clerk of the court that he issue an execution on the judgment against the plaintiff personally. The clerk refused to comply with this demand upon the ground that he had no power or authority to do so. Thereupon the defendant applied to the court for an order directing the clerk to issue such an execution. The court denied the motion, and the defendant appeals from the order. The Code of Civil Procedure contains the following provisions:

"Sec. 1031. In an action prosecuted or defended by an executor, administrator, trustee of express trust, or a person expressly authorized by statute, costs may be recovered as in action by and against a person prosecuting or defending in his own right; but such costs must, by the judgment, be chargeable only upon the estate, fund, or party represented, unless the court directs the same to be paid by the plaintiff or defendant personally, for mismanagement or bad faith in the action or defense."

"Sec. 1509. When a judgment is recovered, with costs, against any executor or administrator, he shall be individually liable for such costs, but they must be allowed him in his administration accounts, unless it appears that the suit or proceeding in which the costs were taxed was prosecuted or defended without just cause."

Here the judgment was against the plaintiff, as administratrix, for costs, but such costs were not by the judgment made chargeable only upon the estate, as they might have been under the section of the Code first above quoted. If they had been made so chargeable, the judgment would have contained the following or equivalent words: "And it is further ordered that said costs be, and the same are hereby, made payable out of the estate of said Joseph Stevens, deceased." This being so, the plaintiff, under the section of the Code last above quoted, was individually liable for the costs, and the defendant was entitled to the execution asked for. We see no necessary conflict in the two sections referred to. When properly construed, each may have full force and effect. The case of Hicox v. Graham, 6 Cal. 169, is in point, and there is nothing in Reay v. Butler, 99 Cal. 477, 33 Pac. 1134, in conflict with what has been said. The order appealed from must be reversed, and it is so ordered.

TOULOUSE et al. v. PARE et al. (No. 15,339.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 26, 1894.)

REVIEW ON APPEAL—ASSIGNMENT OF ERRORS—NONSUIT—FINDINGS.

1. Where an order granting a nonsuit is not assigned as ground for a new trial, no action prior to the nonsuit will be reviewed.

2. A nonsuit may be granted after the evidence on both sides is closed.

3. Where a nonsuit is granted, findings are unnecessary.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; W. C. Van Fleet, Judge.

Action by Bernard Toulouse and others against Antoine S. Paré and others. From a judgment for defendants, and an order denying a new trial, plaintiffs appeal.

Wheaton, Kallock & Kierce, for appellants. John L. Boone, for respondents.

McFARLAND, J. This is an appeal by plaintiffs from a judgment in favor of defendants, and from an order denying plaintiffs' motion for a new trial.

After the evidence on both sides was in, the court granted a nonsuit. Before the nonsuit was granted, appellants made a demand for findings, which was refused; and afterwards they took an exception, which perhaps included both the failure of the court to make findings, and the nonsuit. But the order of the court granting a nonsuit is nowhere assigned as error, and therefore it cannot be assailed. "When a nonsuit is granted, and the plaintiff makes a statement for a new trial, in the specifications of errors why a new trial should be granted he must insert the alleged error of granting a nonsuit."

McCreery v. Everding, 44 Cal. 284. "The question presented on a motion for a nonsuit is a question of law, and in the statement on new trial the decision of the motion should be specifically an error of law." Donahue v. Gallavan, 43 Cal. 573.

As the order granting the nonsuit is not assigned as error, no action of the court prior to the nonsuit need be examined. We may say, however, that a nonsuit can be properly granted after the evidence on both sides is closed (Geary v. Simmons, 39 Cal. 224; Vanderford v. Foster, 65 Cal. 49, 2 Pac. 736), and that findings are not required in a case of nonsuit (Reynolds v. Brumagim, 54 Cal. 254; Mining Co. v. Gilson, 47 Cal. 601). Judgment and order affirmed.

BENSON v. SHOTWELL. (No. 15,186.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 19, 1894.)

REVIEW ON SECOND APPEAL—MODIFICATION OF CONTRACT—EVIDENCE.

1. Where, on a second appeal, the facts disclosed by the record are in substance the same as on the former, the propositions of law arising therefrom will not be reconsidered.

2. Defendant wrote to plaintiff, who had contracted to sell him certain land, with good title, requesting him to bring him a certain deed, which was not on record, that he might examine it, and have it recorded. Plaintiff brought the deed, but did not show it to defendant, and stated that he considered the original deed better than a record of it, and would give it to defendant on delivery of the property. Held, that it was, in substance, a refusal to submit it for examination, or allow defendant to have the deed recorded.

3. The provision of a written contract cannot be altered by any unexecuted oral agreement between the parties. Civ. Code, § 1698.

4. A waiver of the conditions of a contract cannot be predicated on conduct of which the other party had no knowledge.

5. The motives of a party to a contract, in requiring a strict compliance with the conditions precedent to his liability, are immaterial.

6. Exceptions to the admissibility of evidence which is afterwards stricken out cannot be considered on appeal.

7. Testimony of a witness at a former trial is admissible when at the time he is out of the jurisdiction of the court.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; William T. Wallace, Judge.

Action by John Benson against J. M. Shotwell to determine adverse claims to land. There was a judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

For former appeal, see 87 Cal. 49, 25 Pac. 249.

A. N. Drown, for appellant. Edward J. Pringle, Henry C. McPike, and Pringle, Hayne & Boyd, for respondent.

VAN FLEET, J. This is the second appeal in this case. The first appeal was from a judgment in favor of plaintiff, which was reversed, and the cause was remanded for a new trial. 87 Cal. 49, 25 Pac. 249. On the second trial the plaintiff again recovered judgment, and the defendant appeals from the judgment and an order denying his motion for a new trial.

The facts are sufficiently stated in the opinion of the court on the former appeal. On that appeal it was determined, as matter of law, that, by the terms of the contract in question, defendant was entitled to a good paper title of record, and was not bound to accept a title resting on matters dehors the record; that the title tendered by plaintiff was not such as was required by the contract; that defendant was entitled to receive an actual possessio pedis of the whole lot, and was not bound to accept a constructive possession by attornment of tenants; and that the attempted delivery of possession did not meet the requirements of the contract. The facts disclosed by the record on this appeal are in substance the same as those which were before the court on the former appeal; and the propositions of law there decided are therefore the law of this case, and we are not at liberty to reconsider them. It is true that nothing that was said in that opinion as to the facts could bind the court below upon the second trial, nor be conclusive now, since the rule of the law of the case has no application to questions of fact. But the evidence on the last trial appears to us to be without any material conflict, and indeed without any conflict whatever, nor can there be any question as to the inferences to be drawn from it, and it discloses a state of facts precisely the same as that on which the former decision was based. The legal effect of those facts was determined by that decision, and the case must now be determined accordingly.

The argument of respondent is practically confined to a restatement of the points discussed on the former appeal, and does not disclose any material particular in which the evidence differs from that on the former trial. Some points are suggested, as to which it is claimed that the evidence is now different. Some of them are as to matters entirely immaterial; and, as to the others, we fail to discover any such difference. Respondent contends that the evidence does not now show that plaintiff "refused" to submit his deed for examination, or to permit it to be recorded correctly. But the evidence, viewed most favorably to plaintiff, shows now, as it showed then, that, five days before the expiration of the time limited in the contract, defendant wrote to plaintiff, saying, "If you have the deed in your possession among the papers relating to the lot, please let me have it, to show Mr. Drown, and, if necessary, have it re-recorded;" that plaintiff called on defendant, with the deed in his hand, and stated what it was, but did not open it, or show it to defendant; that defendant asked him why he did not record it, and his reply was that he considered the original deed better than any record, but that he would give it to defendant, with the rest of the papers, on the delivery of the property; and that he thereupon took the deed away, did not record it, and had no further communication with defendant on the subject. On cross-examination, plaintiff admitted that he never proposed to do anything with the deed, beyond delivering it to defendant when he should take the property. In view of the request contained in defendant's letter, plaintiff's conduct must be considered as amounting to a refusal to submit the deed for examination by counsel, or to have it recorded; and his testimony that he did not "decline" to put it on record, or to allow defendant to do so, is a mere conclusion, to which no weight can be attached.

With regard to the attempted delivery of possession, respondent claims that the evidence now shows that the persons supposed to be in occupation at the time who were not found, nor their names ascertained, turned out afterwards to be mere licensees or servants of known tenants, and who had no possession to deliver, and also that the apparent adverse occupation by Mrs. Klumpke was afterwards discovered not to be adverse. It is not necessary to review the evidence on these points, though we fail to discover any substantial divergence from the former testimony. It is sufficient to say that on September 22d, when the only attempt at delivery was made, no delivery was effected. None of the tenants vacated; and Mrs. Klumpke, by her tenant, remained in the actual possession of the strip in the rear. At no time did plaintiff tender to defendant the actual, present possession of the lot described in the contract. Defendant, having on the day of the maturity of the contract tendered full performance on his part, was not bound to repeat his offer, and no tender was thereafter made by plaintiff. Indeed, though time was not originally of the essence of the contract, it was made so by the demand of defendant, and the failure of plaintiff to comply with it, and a subsequent tender by plaintiff would have been unavailing.

Respondent also claims that the proof shows a waiver by defendant of the delivery of actual possession. The evidence relied on for this purpose was before the court on the former appeal, but it is contended that, as the allegation of waiver was inserted in the pleadings since the former trial, the question is now open. We see nothing in the facts relied on from which any waiver can be inferred. They do not indicate any intention on defendant's part to waive anything. They consist solely of transactions with third parties. Plaintiff is not shown to have known of them, or to have acted upon them; defendant received no consideration for any waiver; and, lastly, the provisions of the written contract could not be altered by an unexecuted oral agreement, if one had been made. Civ. Code, § 1698.

The court below found that the grounds upon which defendant based his refusal to take the lot were but pretenses,—were excuses for retiring from the bargain,—and were not made in good faith. We fail to find the slightest evidence to support that finding, or to impugn defendant's entire good faith. But, if the fact were as found, it would be immaterial. Defendant was entitled to insist strictly on the contract, and his motives for doing so cannot be inquired into.

The findings as to the controverted matters are therefore unsupported by the evidence, and respondent, indeed, admits that some of them are so. A new trial must therefore be granted.

It is not necessary to notice all the assignments of error in law. The certificate of acknowledgment to the deed from Agard to Perrie was sufficient, and the existence of an erasure not shown, otherwise than by defendant's objection. The testimony of Moxley as to conversations with Hansen was stricken out, and the exception to its admission, therefore, cannot be considered. The testimony of Christie showed that the witness Aspden was out of the jurisdiction of the court, and the testimony of the latter, taken on the former trial, was admissible. Hicks v. Lovell, 64 Cal. 22, 27 Pac. 942. The other assignments do not require notice. The judgment and order denying a new trial are reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

I concur: HARRISON, J.

GAROUTTE, J. I concur in the judgment, and what is said by Mr. Justice VAN FLEET. If Benson had repudiated his contract entered into with Shotwell for the sale of this land, then Shotwell would have been entitled to recover from Benson the amount of money he had paid thereunder, less the actual damage sustained by Benson by reason of any breach of the contract committed by Shotwell. Shively v. Water Co., 99 Cal. 260, 33 Pac. 848, and cases there cited. Benson's conduct in bringing this action was in effect a repudiation of any rights of Shotwell under the contract. It was as substantial and effectual a repudiation as we can imagine. It necessarily follows that defendant in this action is at least entitled to recover the money he has paid to plaintiff under the contract, less the damage suffered by reason of any breach thereof; and to this extent the questions as to whether plaintiff had a good title to the land, or was able to give defendant actual possession thereof, or made a good and valid tender of the deed, are entirely immaterial as I view the case, and the decisions of this court bearing upon the principles here involved. This is the first case coming before us where a vendor has attempted to quiet his title under the circumstances here presented, and I am clear that he can be entitled to such relief only upon the return of the money he has received from the vendee. This would seem to be sound equity, for the vendor has no right to both land and money.

BOWEN v. WENDT. (No. 15,295.)

ENJOINING NUISANCE—RIGHT BY PRESCRIPTION.

A prescriptive right to use a stream in a manner amounting to a public nuisance cannot be acquired so as to be a defense to an action by a private party especially injured thereby to enjoin the maintenance of the same.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Santa Clara county; John Reynolds, Judge.

Action by J. J. Bowen against G. Wendt. There was a judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

W. C. Kennedy and Morehouse & Tuttle, for appellant. Frs. E. Spencer (D. W. Burchard, of counsel), for respondent.

PER CURIAM. Plaintiff is the owner of certain land and premises, containing 25 acres, more or less, situate in the county of Santa Clara, through which a stream known as "Coyote Creek" runs, and upon said land and near said stream the plaintiff has his dwelling-house. Plaintiff uses his land for grazing cattle and other domestic animals, and the waters of said stream are useful and necessary for the watering of plaintiff's stock. Defendant maintains a slaughterhouse upon or near the stream, above plaintiff's premises, from which the offal, etc., is turned into said Coyote creek, pollutes the waters thereof so that they are unfit for domestic use and unfit for cattle, and the odors therefrom are injurious to health, etc. Plaintiff avers a nuisance, and that he is specially injured thereby beyond the general injury to others, etc. Defendant, in addition to general denials, sets up in his answer facts tending to establish a prescriptive right to use the stream as a place of deposit for the offal from his slaughterhouse. The cause was tried by the court without the intervention of a jury, and written findings waived. Plaintiff had a decree enjoining defendant from depositing the blood, offal, etc., from his slaughterhouse in the stream, which decree recites that for more than two years next before the commencement of the action the defendant had been guilty of maintaining and committing a public nuisance by polluting the waters of Coyote creek by, etc., and that said nuisance has been specially injurious to the plaintiff, etc. The evidence was sufficient to show that the acts of the defendant constituted a public nuisance, and that the plaintiff was specially injured thereby. He might, therefore, maintain the action. Civ. Code, § 3493; Payne v. McKinely, 54 Cal. 532; Code Civ. Proc. § 731. "No lapse of time can legalize a public nuisance, amounting to an actual obstruction of public right." Civ. Code, § 3490; People v. Gold Run, etc., Min. Co., 66 Cal. 152, 4 Pac. 1152; Hoadley v. San Francisco, 50 Cal. 275. A prescriptive right cannot be maintained against a public nuisance where the action is brought by a private party who has suffered special injury in consequence thereof. Woodruff v. Mining Co., 9 Sawy. 513--517, 18 Fed. 753; Mills v. Hall, 9 Wend. 315. The judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

LIVINGSTON v. KODIAC PACKING CO. (No. 15,180.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 26, 1894.)

WHO ARE FELLOW SERVANTS.

The mate of a ship engaged in carrying freight and passengers between distant points is a fellow servant of a man employed in the steward's department to wait on the officers' table.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; A. A. Sanderson, Judge.

Action by Robert F. Livingston against the Kodiac Packing Company. There was a judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

Daniel Titus and J. B. L. Brandt, for appellant. Pierson & Mitchell, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. Action to recover damages for a personal injury alleged to have been suffered by plaintiff in consequence of negligence of defendant. Trial by jury. Verdict in favor of plaintiff, assessing damages at $12,500, on which judgment was rendered. Appeal by defendant from the judgment and from an order denying a new trial.

In October, 1891, the defendant was owner of the steamship Haytien Republic, then engaged in carrying passengers and freight from San Francisco to various Northern Pacific ports in British Columbia, Oregon, and Washington, and thence back to San Francisco; and for that purpose was supplied by defendant with the ordinary complement of officers, sailors, and servants. G. W. Brown was captain, George W. David mate, and the plaintiff a servant in the steward's department, whose principal duty it was to serve as waiter at the officers' table, but also to perform such other services as ordered by the steward. At the time of the accident in which plaintiff was injured—October 22, 1891—the ship was moored at the wharf in Departure Bay, where it was taking in a cargo or partial cargo of coal. The shippers of the coal were moving it to the ship, and dumping it into a hatchway by means and appliances of their own, which consisted of a tramway or bridge extending from the coal bunkers on the wharf to the hatchway on the ship. Upon this bridge was laid a railroad track for small coal cars. No part of the bridge rested upon the ship. That end of it from which the coal was dumped into the hatchway was supended by chains attached to trestlework and machinery on the wharf, by which it could be raised or lowered so as to adapt it to the varying height of the ship's deck, the part thus raised and lowered being attached to the main part on the wharf by hinges. The hatchway being used at the time of the accident is about 4½ feet square, and the end of the bridge extended nearly to the middle of it. The width of the bridge being about 5½ feet, the sides of it projected about 6 inches beyond the sides of the hatchway. Mr. David, the mate, was superintending the receiving of the coal and the "trimming" of it in the hold of the ship, but had nothing to do with it until it was dumped from the cars into the hatchway. About 5:30 o'clock p. m. the steward ordered plaintiff to call the officers to dinner, and he went upon deck and to the captain's room for that purpose, but, not finding the captain on the ship, he was ordered to go and look for him upon the wharf. Going from the ship to the wharf, he passed over the railroad bridge then being used by the coal shippers, and returned to the ship the same way. In returning he stepped down from the side of the bridge to the deck at a point about five feet from the end of the bridge, then moved two steps in a direction parallel with the side of the bridge and towards the end of it which projected over the hatchway, and in attempting to make another step "twisted" his ankle, and fell headforemost into the hatchway, from which he was taken in an unconscious condition. As to this, plaintiff testified: "I stepped down off the bridge onto the deck, and made one or two steps. My right ankle twisted, and I fell. I don't remember anything after that." On cross-examination, being asked where he got off the tramway down on the deck, he answered: "Well, it was about halfway between the hatchway and the side of the ship before I touched the deck. There was coal on the deck. Ques. How many feet would that be from the hatchway? Ans. Well, I couldn't say, for I would not be sure of it. Where I got off was about halfway between the hatchway and the bulwarks; perhaps three feet from the bulwarks. It was about three feet from the point where I reached the deck to the port side of the hatchway. Ques. What did you do with yourself after you got off? Ans. Well, to my recollection, I had about two steps, and after that I don't recollect anything." The port side of the ship was to the wharf, and only about two feet from it, and the upper deck was about on a level with the wharf. Plaintiff further testified that in stepping from the bridge to the deck he landed safely on his feet without hurting himself.

It appears that it was the duty of the mate, Mr. David, to place gang planks from the ship to the wharf, and to guard the open hatchways while taking in cargo, so far as it was practicable to do so; and the only negligence charged by respondent is that the mate failed to perform those duties, it being claimed that the plaintiff was compelled to pass over the bridge, because no gang plank was in place; and also that he would not have fallen into the hatchway if it had been guarded in the usual way by chains or ropes supported by stanchions.

The appellant answers: (1) That a gang plank was in place at the times plaintiff passed to the wharf and returned to the ship; (2) that he might have safely stepped from the ship to the wharf and back without a plank, as the distance was only about two feet; (3) that it was impracticable to guard the small hatchway in use at the time, as the necessary stanchions for that purpose could not have been put in place, for the reason that one side and two corners of the hatchway were covered by the bridge; and (4) that the defendant was guilty of contributory negligence. Although the evidence, as read from the transcript, seems to preponderate in favor of defendant upon nearly all these issues, yet we think there is enough in favor of plaintiff to create a substantial conflict, and therefore pass to a consideration of the only other point made by appellant, which is that the mate, David, and the plaintiff were fellow servants "employed by the same employer in the same general business." We think this point is well taken, and should be sustained. There is no question that the only negligence complained of was that of the mate, David, nor that plaintiff and the mate were employed by the same employer. Nor is it claimed that there was any negligence on the part of the defendant in selecting or employing David as such mate. Nor is it now questionable in this state that a difference in the grades of service does not destroy nor affect the relation of fellow servants of the same employer, provided only that they are employed "in the same general business." In this case the respondent denies that plaintiff, the waiter, and David, the mate, were employed in the same general business; and whether or not they were so is the only question debated under this head. It is agreed that the general business in which the defendant was engaged was that of carrying passengers and freight by a steamship from port to port so distant from each other as to require several days to make a passage either way, and also requiring probably 20 employés for different grades of necessary service, including captain's mates, engineers, pilots, sailors, stewards, cooks, waiters, and firemen. In view of the necessity of furnishing meals to passengers, as well as to employés, are not the services of stewards, cooks, and dining-room waiters an essential part of the general business of carrying passengers and freight from San Francisco to ports in British Columbia and the states of Washington and Oregon by steamship? We think it clear that they are, and that it follows from section 1970 of the Civil Code, as construed in numerous cases, that the defendant is not bound to indemnify the plaintiff for injuries suffered in consequence of the negligence of the mate, David. McLean v. Mining Co., 51 Cal. 255; Fagundes v. Railroad Co., 79 Cal. 97, 21 Pac. 437; Congrave v. Railroad Co., 88 Cal. 360, 26 Pac. 175; Daves v. Railroad Co., 98 Cal. 19, 32 Pac. 708. The judgment and order are reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

WILSON v. STUMP. (No. 14,992.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 26, 1894.)

REWARD—ACTION TO RECOVER.

1. A complaint in an action to recover a reward offered for the production of a letter, which, after alleging the offer, alleges that plaintiff, "in consideration of said offer, promise, and agreement on the part of defendant," produced the letter, sufficiently shows that plaintiff knew the reward had been offered, and produced the letter in reliance on defendant's promise.

2. Where the complaint shows that the letter was produced within five days after the reward was offered for it, the fact that the reward had been revoked is a matter of defense, as it will be presumed that the offer continued for such length of time.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; William T. Wallace, Judge.

Action by Russell J. Wilson against Irwin C. Stump. There was a judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

James A. Waymire, for appellant. Stanley, Stoney & Hayes and Arthur Rogers, for respondent.

VANCLIEF, C. The complaint in this action shows that in October, 1890, the defendant was desirous of obtaining a certain letter said to have been written by Henry H. Markham, the alleged contents of which were in dispute. That on or about the 24th day of October, 1890, the defendant proclaimed and asserted that he was desirous of obtaining a genuine letter written by said Markham of the alleged character and contents, and that he would pay a reward of $1,000 for the production to him of such genuine letter containing the disputed matter. "That, in consideration of said offer, promise, and agreement on the part of the defendant, this plaintiff did, on the 29th day of October, 1890, produce to and left in the personal custody of the defendant, for the period of twenty-four hours, the said genuine letter, so as aforesaid written by said H. H. Markham, and did then and there demand from the defendant the payment to him of said offered reward or compensation of $1,000; but, notwithstanding such production and delivery of such genuine letter, defendant did then refuse and ever since has and still does refuse to pay to plaintiff said sum of $1,000, or any part thereof." The defendant demurred "on the ground that said complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, in this, to wit, that it does not show a sufficient consideration, or any consideration, for the agreement therein alleged." The court overruled the demurrer, and rendered judgment in favor of plaintiff for the sum demanded by default of defendant in failing to answer. The defendant brings this appeal from the judgment upon the judgment roll, and contends that the court erred in overruling the demurrer.

It is true that the alleged offer and promise to pay the reward was only a proposal or conditional promise on the part of the defendant, and not a consummated contract; but if, in reliance upon that offer, the plaintiff accepted the proposal, and performed the service for which the reward was offered, before the offer was revoked, a valid contract was thereby consummated. Ryer v. Stockwell, 14 Cal. 134. Nor is this controverted by appellant's counsel, but he contends that the complaint does not show that plaintiff knew the reward had been offered, or that plaintiff performed the service in reliance upon the promise of defendant. I think, however, the language of the complaint clearly implies all this, and is quite sufficient to stand the test of general demurrer. These alleged deficiencies are not specified in the demurrer, the only specification (if it may be called such) being that the complaint does not show any consideration for the alleged contract, while the points made here are much more specific, and not necessarily suggested by the demurrer. But the allegation of the complaint is "that in consideration of said offer, promise, and agreement on the part of the defendant" the plaintiff produced the letter, etc., and "then demanded" the reward; and this means that the offer of the defendant was the cause which moved plaintiff to perform (Webst. Dict. "Consideration"), and implies that he knew, before he performed, that the offer had been made.

It is further objected that the complaint does not show that the offer had not been revoked before the performance. The complaint shows that the offer was made October 24th, and that within five days thereafter, in reliance upon it, the plaintiff performed the service requested. Prima facie, this shows a complete contract and performance on the part of the plaintiff. The offer was not limited in time, and the presumption is that it was open on the fifth day after it was made, nothing to the contrary appearing. The revocation of it, if it had been revoked, was matter of defense. Hewitt v. Anderson, 56 Cal. 476, cited by appellant, is not in point. In that case the court, upon a trial, found as a fact "that none of the acts of the plaintiff were done with a view to obtaining said reward, or any part thereof, but all of said acts were done without any intention of claiming said reward, or any part thereof." I think the judgment should be affirmed.

We concur: BELCHER, C.; HAYNES, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment appealed from is affirmed.

HOUGHTON v. TRUMBO et al. (No. 15,518.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 26, 1894.)

Review on Appeal—Bill of Exceptions—Matters not Apparent of Record—Waiver.

1. A bill of exceptions filed by, and certified to as that of, one of the defendants, cannot be considered on an appeal by another defendant, as such other defendant may have waived all such points.

2. The fact that a judgment assumes a partnership between the parties, inconsistent with allegations in the complaint, is not ground for reversal, in the absence of a history of the trial, so as to enable the court to see what objections were interposed by defendant, or what defenses and points were made or waived.

3. A judgment will not be reversed, on the ground that the findings are not sufficiently full, where the parties especially waived further findings.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; A. A. Sanderson, Judge.

Action by Herbert R. Houghton against Isaac Trumbo and R. P. Thomas. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant Thomas appeals. Affirmed.

H. D. Talcott, for appellant. Thos. V. Cator and Pierson & Mitchell, for respondent.

McFARLAND, J. This may be described, generally, as an action for an accounting between plaintiff and defendants, of matters growing out of business connected with the property known as the "Bijou Theater." Defendant Trumbo filed a demurrer to the complaint, which was overruled. He then filed an answer, and also a cross complaint. Defendant Thomas did not demur, but filed an answer and cross complaint. Each of the defendants filed an answer to the other's cross complaint. Judgment was rendered for plaintiff against Trumbo for a certain sum of money, against Thomas for a certain sum of money, and also in favor of Trumbo, against Thomas, for a certain sum of money. Thomas appeals from the judgment. He procured the case to be submitted upon his own points and authorities, because none had been filed by respondent within the time prescribed by the rules of this court.

There is no bill of exceptions or statement before us which we can consider. The defendant Trumbo made a motion for a new trial, and submitted a draft of a bill of exceptions to be used on his said motion, and on any appeal which he might take. The judge certified it in this language: "The foregoing bill of exceptions is hereby certified to be correct, and may be received as the engrossed bill of exceptions of the defendant and cross complainant Isaac Trumbo on his motion for a new trial, and may also be used by him on any appeal that he may have taken, or may hereafter take, from the judgment and decree rendered herein." Trumbo has not appealed, and it does not appear whether or not his motion for a new trial was ever determined. The appellant, Thomas, has procured this bill of exceptions of Trumbo to be printed in the transcript, but it is quite evident that it cannot be considered. It was prepared and submitted by Trumbo alone, and certified as his bill. There is not in it, from beginning to end, a single objection made by Thomas, or a single exception taken by him. He may have waived every point made by Trumbo, and every exception which the latter took. If it had been intended to be, and had been, Thomas' bill of exceptions, to be used by him on any motion on appeal, the matter of the bill might have been materially different. He also prints on the last page of the transcript, after the stipulated certification thereof, what is called, "Bill of Exceptions of Defendant and Cross Complainant and Appellant, R. P. Thomas," and consists entirely of specifications of errors, but it is not certified or authenticated in any way whatever. Leaving out of view all but the judgment roll, there is nothing to warrant a reversal of the judgment. The complaint is certainly good as against the general objection of want of facts, or of jurisdiction.

Appellant contends that the judgment should be reversed because the judgment seems to contemplate that the relation between the parties was that of partnership, while the complaint states some facts inconsistent with the theory of partnership. But the prayer of each party asks for an accounting against the others of the business transactions related in the complaint; and we have not a history of the trial before us, and cannot now know upon what theory it was conducted, what objections, if any, were interposed by appellant, or what defenses or points were made or waived. We cannot, therefore, reverse the judgment upon this point.

Appellant also contends that the findings are not full enough. There were some findings at the time a certain interlocutory decree was rendered, but none at the time of the final judgment; and we find in the transcript a written stipulation of the parties "that findings other than those hithertofore signed and filed upon the rendition of the interlocutory decree be, and the same are hereby, waived." Indeed, the judgment looks very much like a consent judgment, although its character as such judgment is not quite so pronounced as to warrant us in granting respondent's motion to dismiss the appeal on that ground. But we see no reason for reversing the judgment. The judgment is affirmed.

WARNER v. F. THOMAS PARISIAN DYEING & CLEANING WORKS. (No. 15,266.)[1]

(Supreme Court of California. June 19, 1894.)

REVIEW ON APPEAL—AMENDMENT OF RECORD.

1. The action of the court in granting a new trial must be affirmed where the grounds for granting the same are not stated.

2. After the statement of the case has been settled for an appeal, the court can allow additions to be made thereto, though the omissions arose from the negligence of the attorney.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; John Hunt, Judge.

Action by Seth Warner against the F. Thomas Parisian Dyeing & Cleaning Works. There was a judgment for plaintiff, and, from an order granting defendant a new trial, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Horace W. Philbrook, for appellant. Reinstein & Eisner, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. A verdict was rendered in this cause in favor of the plaintiff for $1,321. The defendant moved for a new trial upon several grounds, one of which was that the evidence was insufficient to justify the verdict. The court granted the motion without specifying the ground upon which it made the order, and from this order the plaintiff has appealed.

Upon well-established rules, the action of the court must be affirmed. Crooks v. Miller, 89 Cal. 35, 26 Pac. 615; Kauffman v. Maier, 94 Cal. 269, 29 Pac. 481; Domico v. Cassassa (Cal.) 35 Pac. 1024; People v. Flood (Cal.) 36 Pac. 663; Mills v. Navigation Co., Id. 772.

After the statement of the case had been settled by the judge, and filed with the clerk, it was brought to the notice of the court that the statement was incomplete, in that several exhibits referred to therein had not been engrossed at length, although it was recited in the statement that it contained all the material evidence taken at the trial of the action. The defendant's attorney thereupon moved the court that the settlement and allowance of the statement be vacated, and that they be allowed to re-engross the same, and place these exhibits therein. This motion was resisted by the attorney for the plaintiff, but, after a hearing of the parties, was granted; and the plaintiff's attorney excepted to this action of the court. We see no error in this proceeding. Courts of justice are organized for the purpose of determining the controversies between litigants according to their respective rights; and rules of procedure are intended to facilitate this purpose, rather than to hamper or obstruct the action of the court in determining which of the parties is entitled to a judgment. Section 659, Code Civ. Proc., makes it the duty of the judge, in settling the statement, to make it "truly represent the case, notwithstanding the assent of the parties to any inaccurate statement." If the judge shall become satisfied that a statement, as settled by him, does not truly represent the case, he is authorized, and it is his duty, to make such corrections therein as will cause it to conform to the facts. In the present case the defendant's attorney, in preparing the proposed statement, had included therein a reference to these exhibits by inserting the words, at the place where they were referred to, "here insert plaintiff's exhibit ——," so that the plaintiff's attorney was not misled in preparing amendments thereto; and, when the attention of the judge was drawn to the fact that the exhibits had not been engrossed in the statement, he was authorized to vacate his certificate of settlement, and direct that they be engrossed therein, so that his certificate may conform to the facts. Whether the omission to engross them was the result of inadvertence or carelessness on the part of the defendant's attorney did not deprive the court of a discretion to settle it correctly; and, for the purpose of determining what exhibits were in reality referred to in the statement, it was authorized to make such investigation as would enable it to settle the statement according to the facts. The order is affirmed.

RAPE—RIGHT TO A PUBLIC TRIAL—UNCHASTE CHARACTER OF PROSECUTRIX.

[1] For opinion on motion to set aside judgment, and to reinstate causes. see 37 Pac. 213.

When the information had been read to the jury, and the defendant's plea stated, on motion of the district attorney, and against the objection of the defendant, the court made an order excluding from the court room, during the trial of the case, all persons except the officers of the court and the defendant. This was a novel procedure, and has no justification in the law of modern times. We know of no case, decided in this country, supporting the course of procedure here pursued. It is in direct violation of that provision of the constitution which says that a party accused of crime has a right to a public trial. The fact that the officers of the court were allowed to be present in no way made the trial public. For the purposes contemplated by the provision of the constitution, the presence of the officers of the court—men whom, it is safe to say, were under the influence of the court—made the trial no more public than if they too had been excluded. While a right to the public trial contemplated by the constitution does not require of courts unreasonable and impossible things, as that all persons have an absolute right to be present and witness the court's proceedings, regardless of the conveniences of the court, and the due and orderly conduct of the trial, yet this provision must have a fair and reasonable construction in the interest of the person accused. Judge Cooley, in his work upon Constitutional Limitations (page 383), has well declared the true rule in the following language: "The requirement of a public trial is for the benefit of the accused,—that the public may see that he is fairly dealt with, and not unjustly condemned, and that the presence of interested spectators may keep his triors keenly alive to a sense of their responsibility, and to the importance of their functions; and the requirement is fairly observed if, without partiality or favoritism, a reasonable proportion of the public is suffered to attend, notwithstanding that those persons whose presence could be of no service to the accused, and who would only be drawn hither by a prurient curiosity, are excluded altogether." In the case of People v. Murray, 89 Mich. 276, 50 N. W. 995, the question now before the court is elaborately discussed; and, upon a state of facts more favorable to the accused than is presented by the present record, it was held that the defendant had not had a public trial. There is nothing to be found in Grimmett v. State, 22 Tex. App. 36, 2 S. W. 631; State v. Brooks, 92 Mo. 573, 5 S. W. 257, 330; or People v. Kerrigan, 73 Cal. 222, 14 Pac. 849,—that justified the action of the court in making the order of exclusion here assailed. The facts of those cases are widely at variance with the facts before us, and the law there declared entirely fails to serve as a legal support to the judgment here rendered. It is intimated in both the Kerrigan and Grimmett Cases that, conceding the accused to be deprived of the right to a public trial, still the burden was upon him to show injury by reason of the deprivation. These intimations cannot be indorsed. A defendant charged with crime is entitled to certain rights under the constitution; and, when he has been deprived of any one of them, he has not had that fair and impartial trial to which he is entitled, however bad and degraded. This principle of law is in entire consonance with the views of the Michigan court, as declared in People v. Murray, supra. In the case of People v. Swafford, 65 Cal. 223, 3 Pac. 809, the court excluded all persons except the witnesses and persons connected with the case, and this action was sustained. It is there said that it does not appear that the accused objected to the order of exclusion, and non constat but that such order was made at his express request. Whatever may be the legal soundness of the court's conclusion, drawn from such a condition of the record, we think the compass of the order of exclusion too wide, and its limitations as to those allowed to be present at the trial entirely too restrictive. The trial should be "public," in the ordinary commonsense acceptation of the term. The doors of the court room are expected to be kept open, the public are entitled to be admitted, and the trial is to be public in all respects, as we have before suggested, with due regard to the size of the court room, the conveniences of the court, the right to exclude objectionable characters and youth of tender years, and to do other things which may facilitate the proper conduct of the trial. Section 125 of the Code of Civil Procedure, upon which the attorney general relies to support the action of the trial court, has no reference whatever to the question here involved. The application of the rule there stated is confined exclusively to civil cases.

The fact that the prosecutrix may have been a woman of unchaste character is no defense to the charge stated in the information. A defendant is equally guilty, under the law, regardless of the good or bad morals of the woman assaulted. It is ordered that the judgment be reversed, and the cause remanded.

PHILLIPS v. WINTER et al. (No. 15,177.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 26, 1894.)

RES JUDICATA.

A party to an action for partition, who acquires an independent title by deed pending the suit and before decree, and who does not assert such title in that action, will be concluded by the judgment therein from setting up such title in a subsequent action for the partition of the same property.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; John Hunt, Judge.

Action by Abraham Phillips against Fanny M. Winter and others for partition. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Daniel Titus and Henry Sears, for appellants. I. N. Thorne and Myer Jacobs, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. The plaintiff commenced this action to obtain a partition of certain blocks and lots of land situate in the city and county of San Francisco, and known as "outside lands." There were a large number of defendants, all of whom answered, and set out their respective claims to interests in the lands described in the complaint. Among the defendants were the minor heirs and the adult heirs, and the executrices of the will of, William Winter, deceased. The minor heirs answered separately by their guardian ad litem, and alleged that said William Winter, at the time of his death, was the owner and entitled to the possession of an undivided third part of all the lands and premises described; and they prayed that the said lands be partitioned, and that the shares and interests to which they were entitled might be determined by the court, and set off in severalty to them. The adult heirs and executrices, by their answer, denied that the plaintiff and defendants were the owners, as tenants in common, of the lands and premises described in the complaint; denied that the plaintiff or the defendants, other than themselves, had any interest in the said lands and premises, or any part thereof, as tenants in common or otherwise; and alleged that said William Winter, in his lifetime, and at the time of his death, was seised in fee, and was the owner in severalty, of all the said pieces and parcels of land mentioned and described in the complaint. Wherefore, they prayed that it be adjudged and decreed by the court that they were the owners and entitled to the possession of all the said lands and premises, and that the relief asked by the plaintiff be denied. The case was tried, and very full findings made, by which it was determined that each of the parties to the action had a certain stated interest in the said premises; and thereupon, in accordance with the findings, an interlocutory decree of partition was made and entered, from which, and from an order denying their motion for a new trial, the adult heirs and executrices appeal.

The appellants contend that the heirs, devisees, and representatives of the estate of William Winter, deceased, were shown to be the owners in fee and entitled to the possession of all the property involved in the action, and that the court erred in awarding and setting off portions thereof to the plaintiff and the other defendants. This contention is based upon the following facts: On November 20, 1869, an action was commenced in the district court of the twelfth judicial district in and for the city and county of San Francisco, by Robert S. Randall against William Winter and others, for the partition between the parties, as tenants in common, of a tract of land described as "that certain tract of land situated in the city and county of San Francisco and state of California, known as and being the southeast quarter of section 13, township 2 south, range 6 west, according to the United States survey of the state of California, and being more particularly described as the same is delineated and shown on the map of the outside lands of the city and county of San Francisco, made under and by virtue of the provisions of order No. 800, as follows, to wit, 'All those certain blocks of land,' " etc., including the blocks and lots involved in this action. The answer of Winter was filed March 4, 1870. The trial of the action was commenced August 15, 1871, and on the next day the case was submitted to the court for decision. The interlocutory decree was entered October 13, 1871, and the final decree on December 8, 1875. By these decrees there were allotted and set off to the plaintiff, Randall, in severalty, all the blocks and lots of land described in the complaint in this action; and the said decrees are still in full force and effect, having never been set aside, vacated, or reversed, and under deeds from Randall the several parties to this action have acquired the interests in the property which were respectively allotted and set off to them. While the action of Randall v. Winter et al. was pending, and before the interlocutory decree therein was entered, seven deeds were executed by the city and county of San Francisco to said Winter and his codefendants, purporting to convey to them, in pursuance of the authority given by the statutes of the United States and of this state, and said order No. 800, the property involved in that action, and including that involved in this action. Two of the said deeds were dated May 6, 1870; two of them, July 8, 1870; one of them, October 20, 1870; one of them, October 7, 1871; and one of them October 9, 1871. But it does not appear what particular part of the lands was conveyed by either of the said deeds. Subsequently, his cograntees executed and delivered to said Winter deeds purporting to convey to him all their respective interests in the lands involved in this action. Under the several deeds above referred to, appellants claim that Winter, at the time of his death, was the owner and entitled to the possession of all the lands in controversy; and whether this claim can be sustained or not is the question to be decided. We do not deem it necessary to discuss the matter at length, for in Christy v. Waterworks, 68 Cal. 73, 8 Pac. 849, a like question arose, and was decided against the contention of appellants. That case grew out of the same partition suit of Randall v. Winter; and there, as here, a city deed, received by a tenant in common pending the partition proceedings, was set up as a defense to the action. It was held that the judgment in partition was conclusive upon all the parties thereto as to whatever title or claim they had to the land at the time of the rendition of the judgment, and on the second appeal of the case the same doctrine was announced and followed. 84 Cal. 541, 24 Pac. 307. Those decisions, we think, correctly declare the law applicable to this case; and we see nothing in Newman v. City and County of San Francisco, 92 Cal. 378, 28 Pac. 569, or in the other cases cited by appellants, that in any way conflicts with them. Appellants further contend that the decree in Randall v. Winter et al. is void on its face, and of no effect, but we fail to see any valid ground for this contention. The court had jurisdiction of the parties and of the subject-matter, and its judgment cannot now be attacked collaterally. It follows that the decree and order appealed from must be affirmed, and it is so ordered.

HACKETT v. STATE. (No. 15,319.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 16, 1894.)

CONSTRUCTION OF CONTRACT — ERECTION OF SEA WALL.

Plaintiff's assignor agreed to build for defendant a sea wall, whose dimensions were specified in the contract, and defendant agreed to pay 52 cents per ton for the stone and 29 cents per cubic yard for the earth used therein, and the contract stated: "The stone embankment will contain about 216,000 tons of stone; the earth embankment about 285,000 cubic yards of earth." Only 119,025 tons of stone and 272,499 cubic yards of earth were used in constructing the wall. Held, that plaintiff could recover only for the amount of the material actually put in the wall.

Action by John Hackett, as assignee of W. D. English and the Pacific Coast Dredging & Reclamation Company, against the state of California. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Sullivan & Sullivan, for appellant. Garber, Boalt & Bishop, Geo. A. Johnson, and Dennis Spencer, for the State.

HAYNES, C. This action was brought in the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco against the state of California by John Hackett, as assignee of W. D. English and the Pacific Coast Dredging & Reclamation Company, pursuant to a statute enacted March 15, 1889, authorizing such suit to be brought. St. 1889, p. 221. Defendant's demurrer to the complaint was sustained, and, the plaintiff declining to amend, judgment was entered for defendant, and the plaintiff appeals therefrom.

The contract out of which this controversy arose was made by W. D. English with the board of state harbor commissioners on February 20, 1884, for the construction of section 5 of the sea wall and thoroughfare and wharf along the water-front line of the city and county of San Francisco. This contract was made by English for the Pacific Coast Dredging & Reclamation Company, a corporation, and on January 2, 1889, the corporation assigned the contract to plaintiff. The point of plaintiff's contention is that by said contract the contractor agreed to furnish, and the state agreed to pay for, 216,000 tons of stone at 52 cents per ton, and 285,000 cubic yards of earth at 29 cents per cubic yard; that the contractor was ready and willing, and offered to furnish the full quantities of stone and earth above named, but that the board would only accept 119,025.86 tons of stone and 272,499.2 cubic yards of earth. The difference between these quantities, estimated at the prices named, amounts to $55,000, and this amount plaintiff seeks to recover in this action.

Respondent contends that the contract was for the construction of the sea wall of a definite length, according to the specifications; that the quantities of stone and earth mentioned in the specifications and in the notice to contractors were mere estimates of the quantities which would be required to complete the work; that the contract required the board to take and pay for only so much of these materials as were necessary to complete the work, and were actually used therein; the complaint alleging that the work was fully performed, and that the engineer overestimated the quantity of stone required by 96,774 tons, and the quantity of earth by 12,501 cubic yards; it being for these quantities of stone and earth so overestimated, and not used, or necessary to be used, that plaintiff seeks to recover. The complaint sets out in full the notice to contractors, under which bids were received, and also the contract and the specifications of the work to be done and the materials to be used, which are made part of the contract. The notice was for proposals to construct a section of the sea wall, thoroughfare, and wharf, the sea wall and thoroughfare to extend from the southerly end of section 4 1,000 feet southerly, and to have a surface width of 200 feet, the work to consist of a stone embankment, the character and dimensions of which are described, and to construct this, the notice stated, "It is estimated by the chief engineer of the board that it will take 216,000 tons of rock." The earth embankment to be the same length. "Its width on top, twelve feet above the mean of low tide, will be 139 feet; its width on the bottom (estimated) 165 feet, its average width 152 feet, and its average depth (estimated) 51 feet 6 inches." No question is made in regard to the wharf. Under the head of "General Conditions" the notice specified, among other things, that "the work will not be accepted until the stone and earth embankments shall have been brought to grade, and maintained thereat for a period of three months. * * *

The whole of the material to be furnished and work to be done as required by the plans and specifications, to which special reference is hereby made. * * * The contract for the whole work will be let to one party, but each bidder must state: First. The price per ton of 2,240 pounds for which he will furnish and place the stone required for the stone embankment. The price per ton, multiplied into 216,000, the estimated number of tons required, will give the amount of his bid on the stone embankment. Second. The price per cubic yard, to be determined in the vehicle of transportation, for which he will furnish the material and build the earth embankment. The price per cubic yard multiplied into 285,000, the estimated number of cubic yards of material required, * * * will give the amount of the bid on the earth embankment. Third. The sum for which he will furnish the material and build the wharf. The sum of these three bids, thus ascertained, will constitute the bid for the whole work. The contract will be awarded to the bidder, the aggregate of whose bid, determined as above, is the lowest." The bid of Mr. English, under which the contract was awarded, is as follows:

"San Francisco, February 20, 1884. To the Board of State Harbor Commissioners—Gentlemen: The undersigned hereby propose and agree to construct the work described in the annexed advertisement, according to the plans and specifications on file in your office, and within the time prescribed in the said advertisement, at the following rates:

The stone embankment at 52 cents per ton of 2,240 pounds, 52x216,000	$112,320 00
The earth embankment at 29 cents per cubic yard (determined in the vehicle of transportation) ——x285,000........	82,650 00
The wharf (furnishing the material and doing the work) for	29,000 00
Total	$223,970 00"

The contract contained, among others, the following provisions: "That the party of the second part hereby covenants and agrees with the party of the first part to furnish the labor and materials and do the following work, to wit: The construction of section five of the sea wall and thoroughfare and wharf along the water front line of the city and county of San Francisco, state of California. * * * And the party of the first part covenants and agrees with the party of the second part to pay for the said work by drafts drawn on the San Francisco Harbor Improvement Fund in gold and silver coin of the United States in manner following, viz.: Upon monthly estimates of the value of the materials used and work performed to the extent of seventy-five per cent. of such values, said estimates to be made in writing by the chief engineer of the board, and the final payment of twenty-five per cent. when the work is completed and accepted by the board at the following rates, viz.: The stone embankment at fifty-two (52) cents per ton of two thousand two hundred and forty (2,240) pounds; the earth embankment at twenty-nine (29) cents per cubic yard (determined in the vehicle of transportation); the wharf (furnishing the materials and doing the work), twenty-nine thousand ($29,000) dollars."

The material parts of the specifications affecting the question at issue follow closely the notice to contractors in the particulars above noticed. One or two extracts, however, may be pertinently made. "The work to be done under these specifications consists in furnishing all materials and erecting a stone embankment, an earth embankment, and a wharf. The stone embankment will contain about 216,000 tons of stone; the earth embankment about 285,000 cubic yards of broken stone, sand, or other suitable material; and the wharf will contain 501,320 feet B. M. of timber, and 802 piles, together with the requisite quantity of cast-iron mooring bits, wrought-iron spikes, bolts," etc. "The quantity of stone used in the stone embankment will be determined by weight. A ton is 2,240 pounds. The board will erect the necessary scales, and the weighing will be done under the direction of the chief engineer. The contractor must give every facility for the thorough and accurate determination of the quantity of stone used."

I think the court below did not err in sustaining the demurrer to the complaint, and rendering judgment for the defendant. What the board of harbor commissioners contracted for was the construction of a section of the sea wall of a defined length, and for which they agreed to pay a fixed price per ton for the stone, and a fixed price per cubic yard for the earth used in the construction of it; and not that they agreed to buy or pay for a fixed and definite number of tons and cubic yards of material, whether used in the work or not. If the "estimates" of the quantities required for the work, as made by the engineer and stated in the notice, bid, and specifications, be laid aside or disregarded, there could be no question as to the correctness of our conclusion. On the other hand, if the notice, bid, and specifications had been for furnishing and putting in place 216,000 tons of stone and 285,000 cubic yards of earth in a sea wall, under the direction of the engineer, there could be no question that the contractor would have been required to furnish those quantities of material, and that the board should have paid therefor, if such contract was within their powers. In such case, however, no estimates were necessary. Estimates became necessary only because the work to be done was restricted to definite and precise limits, the amount of material for which was difficult or, indeed, incapable of exact computation. This is apparent from the notice under which the bid was made, where it is stated that the average depth from the top of the embankment to hard bottom is (omitting inches) 61 feet, to stiff mud 39 feet, and average thickness of stiff mud 21 feet. "The average height of the embankment, as estimated by the chief engineer, will be 55 feet 4 inches." It is further provided that the contractor shall keep the stone embankment up to grade for three months. These facts contemplate a settling of the wall, but the extent of such settling is an uncertain quantity, and one that is continuous from the commencement of the work to its completion, and necessitates the provision for weighing the rock as it was used. Besides, it is not like solid masonry of given dimensions, which can be measured by the perch. The greater part of it is under water, and, to a certain height, the stone is simply "dumped" in, and allowed to form a natural slope, which introduces another element of uncertainty. Still another unknown quantity is involved in the estimation. The rock is not estimated by bulk, but by weight. All that is required by the specifications is that it shall be rock that will not disintegrate by the action of the water; and it is a matter of common knowledge that different kinds of rock vary greatly in weight. The lighter the rock the less number of tons are required, and vice versa. Similar considerations affect the estimate of the quantity of earth required for the earth embankment. This was to be measured in the vehicle of transportation in its loose state. How much of bulk it would lose in place by settling would depend on the material used and the weight of the embankment, and could not, therefore, be accurately calculated. These considerations were apparent, and open to the bidder. He saw precisely what work the state wished to accomplish, and must have known that the quantities of material necessary for its accomplishment were not, and could not be, accurately determined; and, therefore, that it was essential that his bid should specify the price per ton and cubic yard, as otherwise a bid of a lump sum for each of the embankments would have been all that could be required. Besides, the clause in the contract relating to payments was not that $112,320 would be paid for the stone, nor $82,650 for the earth, but the stone embankment was to be paid for at 52 cents per ton, and the earth at 29 cents per cubic yard; 75 per cent. of the value of the materials used and work performed to be paid upon estimates monthly, and the final payment of 25 per cent. when the work should be completed and accepted; thus clearly limiting the payments to the work and materials used.

The authorities cited by appellant do not conflict with this view. In Cabot v. Winsor, 1 Allen, 546, the contract was for the sale of 500 bundles, more or less, of gunny bags, at 10 cents per bag. The court, in construing the contract as affected by the words "more or less," said: "As applied to quantity, they are to be construed as qualifying a representation or statement of an absolute or definite amount, so that neither party to a contract can avoid it or set it aside by reason of any deficiency or surplus, occasioned by no fraud or want of good faith, if there is a reasonable approximation to the quantities specifically named as a subject of the contract, * * * or, as it is sometimes briefly expressed, it is an absolute contract for a specific quantity within a reasonable limit." The case of Hardy v. U. S., 9 Ct. Cl. 244, was for the transportation of a given number of tons, "more or less," of government stores to certain military stations, and a similar construction was given. In neither of these cases was the quantity limited in any manner, except by the words "more or less," while in this case the quantity of rock and earth was capable of exact ascertainment upon the completion of the work, which was itself precisely defined. Another case, cited by appellant, illustrates this distinction. That is the case of Brawley v. U. S., 11 Ct. Cl. 522, where the court quoted with approval both of the cases above cited, and said: "In each of these cases which we have cited, it will be seen that the contract was for a definite quantity, with the words 'more or less,' added thereto without reference to any other method of determining and making certain what appeared to be rendered uncertain by the latter words. To give force to the words 'more or less' in such connection to the full extent of their literal meaning would be to allow either party practically to avoid the whole contract, except as to the price of the goods actually delivered and accepted. This would clearly be an unreasonable construction, and not in acordance with the plain intent of the parties." In the case last above cited, however, the quantity specifically mentioned was immediately followed by the words "more or less, as shall be determined by the post commander;" and the court held that the specified quantity was subject to his control, and that both parties agreed thereto by adopting that language. So, in the case at bar, the controlling words of the contract are that the contractor will "furnish the materials and do the following work, to wit, the construction of section five of the sea wall and thoroughfare and wharf;" and that the quantities named are only estimates of the material required for that work, the requirements of the work being the ultimate and controlling measure of the quantity. While an accurate computation of the amount or quantity of material required could not be made in advance of the work, so gross an error in the estimate of the quantity of stone required is incomprehensible. But the extent of the error does not affect the construction we have given to the contract. It is not true, as argued by appellant, that under this contract the contractor could have been compelled to furnish the estimated quantity of stone and earth, unless qualified by the further statement that the whole of such estimates were required for the erection of the section of the sea wall embraced in his contract. That contract he was bound to fulfill, whether it required more or less than the quantity of materials estimated, but for all that he used he would have received compensation at the contract rates.

Other points are urged with much force by appellant, but, in view of the conclusion reached as to the construction of the contract, it is not necessary to consider them, since if they were all determined in appellant's favor the result would not be changed. The judgment appealed from should be affirmed.

We concur: SEARLS, C.; BELCHER, C.

4 Cal. Unrep. 691

MATTS et ux. v. BORBA. (No. 15,381.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 26, 1894.)

SLANDER—EVIDENCE—REMARKS OF COUNSEL.

1. In an action for slander, for calling plaintiff "valhaca," plaintiff and several witnesses (all illiterate Portuguese) testified that the word was in common use among the Portuguese, and meant "whore." Defendant's witnesses, some of whom were educated Portuguese, testified that the term "valhaca," did not mean "unchastity," but that it meant "knave, rogue, crafty," and that the word "puta" was in common use, meaning "whore." Held sufficient to support a verdict that defendant intended to impute unchastity to plaintiff.

2. After defendant had examined his witnesses, and rested, plaintiff gave evidence that the word "valhaca" meant "whore." Held that, if the evidence was improperly admitted, defendant was not prejudiced, there being already sufficient evidence to support the verdict.

3. It was agreed that the cause should be submitted without argument, but plaintiff's attorney said: "I want to make this statement to the jury: That plaintiffs, having commenced this case in the superior court, cannot recover any costs unless they recover $300 damages." And the court said, "You must not make those statements. Held that, if defendant thought the court had not sufficiently informed the jury not to consider the remarks, he should have asked for an instruction to that effect, and that a new trial would not be granted on account of such remarks.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Santa Clara county; W. G. Lorigan, Judge.

Action by Frank Matts and wife against Joseph Borba. From a judgment for plaintiffs, and an order denying a new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Wm. L. Gill, for appellant. W. B. Hardy, for respondents.

HAYNES, C. Action for slander. The plaintiffs had judgment, and this appeal is from the judgment, and from an order denying defendant's motion for a new trial. The parties plaintiff and defendant are Portuguese, and the slanderous words are charged to have been spoken of and concerning the plaintiff Catherine Matts, in the Portuguese language, in the presence and hearing of persons who understood that language, to wit: "'Valhaca! quando e que es meus homes foram enhar bariga de carne a tua casa.' Plaintiffs aver that said words signify, and are understood to mean, in the English language, 'You whore! when my men went and filled their bellies with meat at your house,' and the said Portuguese words were so understood by the said persons in whose presence and hearing they were spoken; that the defendant meant by said words so spoken to impute to the plaintiff Catherine Matts a want of chastity." The answer denied speaking the said words, or any of them, or any other words meaning to impute a want of chastity, or that said words, or any of them, signify, or are understood to mean, "you whore," or "whore," or were so understood by any person who heard them. Both the plaintiffs and several other witnesses testified to the speaking by defendant of the Portuguese words set out in the complaint, and that the word "valhaca" has the meaning attributed to it in the complaint, some of the witnesses defining it to mean a "private whore; that is, a married woman who is doing it on the sly;" that "the word is in common use among the Portuguese to express a woman who has fallen so low as to be common with every one, even without pay;" while the defendant, and about the same number of witnesses, testified that the words charged were not spoken. All the witnesses in chief on the part of the plaintiff were illiterate, and, with the exception of Mrs. Matts, could not read or write, and she only to a limited extent. The defendant, in addition to the witnesses who were present, and who testified, as positively as witnesses can to a negative fact, that the words were not spoken, called six intelligent Portuguese, two or three of whom had received a collegiate education in Portugal, who testified that "'valhaca' means 'knave, rogue, rascal, scamp, scapegrace, crafty, cunning;'" that it never means "unchastity;" that they never heard it used to impute unchastity; that the word in common use, having the meaning of the English word "whore," is "puta;" and that "meretriz" and "prostituta" are also used to express the same meaning.

Appellant, in his statement on motion for a new trial, specified as one of the grounds thereof that the evidence was insufficient to justify the verdict as to the meaning of the words alleged to have been spoken. Respondents contend that this ground cannot be considered, for the reason that it was not included in appellant's notice of intention to move for a new trial. The only clause in the notice which could possibly authorize the specification in question is the following: "Third. Insufficiency of the evidence to justify the decisions and rulings of the court, and that said rulings and decisions are against law." It is difficult to determine what was meant by this statement as a ground of motion for a new trial, nor do I think it necessary to determine it, as it will not affect our conclusions. That there was a conflict in the evidence as to whether the defendant spoke the Portuguese words charged in the complaint is beyond question, even if we add to the evidence upon this point the additional fact that Mrs. Matts, upon a former trial, based upon the occurrences which took place at the time the words are alleged to have been spoken, testified to different language used by defendant, to which she made the same response she now testifies she made to the language stated in the complaint, and in which she applied to defendant's wife the epithet "puta" to express the same meaning that was given by plaintiff's witnesses to the word "valhaca." Similar doubts may be expressed as to the meaning intended to be conveyed by the word "valhaca;" but doubts upon these questions of fact would neither justify the court below in setting aside the verdict of the jury, nor this court in reversing the order denying a new trial. Appellant insists, however, that the testimony of his witnesses as to the meaning of the word "valhaca" leaves no doubt; that, in effect, it is wholly uncontradicted. As to the primary meaning of the word, this is true. Standing alone, as a single word, it does not imply want of chastity, but, like many words in the English language, no definition of which, as found in the dictionaries, refer to chastity, or the want of it, are nevertheless used to imply a want of chastity. There are other words, however, corresponding very closely to the word "valhaca," which, in their ordinary use, do not refer to the subject of chastity, but yet imply qualities which embrace chastity. The word "dishonest," for example, corresponds very nearly, in its primary meaning, to the word "valhaca." The first definition given by Webster is: "Wanting in honesty; void of integrity; faithless; fraudulent; disposed to deceive or cheat," while the third meaning given is "dishonorable; disgraceful; shameful; wanton; unchaste." So Shakespeare used the word "honest" to denote chastity: "Wives may be merry, and yet honest too." Even the word "occupy" was formerly used to express sexual intercourse, though now never so used. That the word "valhaca" is capable, without greatly distorting some of the definitions given to it, of expressing the imputed meaning, is reasonably clear, and the evidence in this regard is sufficient to support the verdict.

It is also specified by appellant that the court erred in giving the first and second instructions requested by the plaintiffs. It is sufficient to say of these instructions that, if they had been the only instructions given, they were too general to be of much aid to the jury. But the court, in other instructions given of its own motion, fully and very fairly instructed the jury that they must, in order to warrant a verdict against the defendant, not only find that the words charged were spoken by the defendant, but that they have a meaning imputing, and were intended to impute to Mrs. Matts, a want of chastity; that it was not sufficient to find that they were insolent and reviling or opprobrious, but that they had the meaning charged in the complaint; and that, in ascertaining the meaning of the speaker, reference must be had to the words used, and the circumstances under which they were spoken. These and other expressions used by the court must be taken with the more general statements in the instructions excepted to, there being no real inconsistency between them.

Plaintiffs offered in evidence a lease of the land where they resided, and where the alleged slanderous words were spoken. The lease was made to the husband, and had not expired. The difficulty arose from a new tenant going upon the premises with several teams, hauling lumber to erect a barn; one of the teams being driven by defendant, between whom and the plaintiffs ill feelings existed. Objection was made to the introduction of the lease, and, to the ruling of the court permitting its introduction, defendant excepted. We see no ground upon which it can be said that defendant was prejudiced, even if it be conceded that the evidence was immaterial.

After the defendant had examined his witnesses, and rested, the plaintiffs called several witnesses, who were permitted, against defendant's objection, to testify that the word "valhaca" meant "whore." The objection was that it was testimony in chief, and not in rebuttal. This evidence might have been properly received in chief, and indeed was of the same character, and given by witnesses having no better qualifications as to learning than those first examined. Appellant contends that the court erred in overruling his objections, no reason being given why they were not called in chief, and cites several cases in support of his contention. These cases were all where the testimony offered in rebuttal was in fact evidence in chief, and was excluded by the court, and the exclusion was sustained upon appeal. In this case, if the evidence offered in rebuttal had been excluded upon the ground urged by appellant, we see no reason why such ruling would not have been affirmed, for the same reason that the action of the court in receiving it should be affirmed. In Lux v. Haggin, 69 Cal. 414, 10 Pac. 674, it was said: "All agree that it is within the discretion of the trial court to admit additional evidence in support of the plaintiff's case after the defendant has rested. Of course, it is always safer to admit evidence claimed to be in reply, if the court entertains doubts of its admissibility." Section 2042, Code Civ. Proc., is as follows: "The order of proof must be regulated by the sound discretion of the court. Ordinarily, the party beginning the case must exhaust his evidence." And subdivision 3 of section 607 provides: "The parties may then respectively offer rebutting evidence only, unless the court, for good reason, in furtherance of justice, permit them to offer evidence upon their original case." Defendant's witnesses having testified to the meaning of the word as given in the dictionaries, and its primary meaning as used by educated people, it would have been competent for plaintiffs to rebut by showing that a secondary or corrupted meaning had been given it. If the evidence ostensibly introduced in rebuttal proved not to be properly of that character, the defendant still had recourse to a motion to strike out, when the court, with the evidence before it, could more accurately determine its character. The record does not show the ground upon which it was received; that is, whether it was regarded as properly in rebuttal, or whether the court, in the exercise of its discretion, and in the furtherance of justice, permitted the plaintiffs to strengthen their case by the admission of original testimony; nor do we think it necessary that it should appear. Upon the point in question there was already sufficient evidence to have supported the verdict, and hence we cannot say that the defendant was prejudiced, or that upon a new trial the evidence given by these witnesses could be disproved.

Upon the conclusion of the evidence, it was agreed that the cause be submitted to the jury without argument; that thereupon the attorney for the plaintiffs arose, and said to the jury: "I do not care to argue this case, but I want to make this statement to the jury: That, plaintiffs having commenced this case in the superior court, they cannot recover any costs unless they recover three hundred dollars damages." Defendant's counsel said: "I object to that statement." The Court: "You must not make those statements." No request was made of the court to instruct the jury to disregard the statement of counsel, nor was any exception taken. The conduct of plaintiffs' counsel in this regard was highly improper, but it was at once met by a prompt and decided rebuke from the court. This the court no doubt considered sufficient to inform the jury that they must not be influenced by it. If defendant thought it not sufficient, he should have requested the court to give such instruction as he deemed proper, and, upon a refusal, to have taken an exception. Conceding that the verdict was for a sum suspiciously near the line ($305), we cannot say that the improper remarks of counsel in fact influenced the jury. Such irregularities can usually be dealt with by the trial court so as to protect parties against injury, and in proper cases afford relief by granting a new trial. We do not think the court erred in refusing to grant a new trial upon this, nor upon any of the grounds assigned. We advise that the judgment and order appealed from be affirmed.

STOCKTON COMBINED HARVESTER & AGRICULTURAL WORKS v. HOUSER. (No. 19,366.)

CHANGE OF VENUE—CONVENIENCE OF WITNESSES.

It is no abuse of discretion to refuse plaintiff a change of venue for the convenience of witnesses, when defendant files a stipulation admitting the truth of the facts alleged in the complaint.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; Lucien Shaw, Judge.

Action by the Stockton Combined Harvester & Agricultural Works (a corporation) against Daniel Houser on a stock assessment. Plaintiff's notice for a change of venue denied. Plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Nicoll & Orr, for appellant. Stanton L. Carter and Anderson & Anderson, for respondent.

BELCHER, C. This is an appeal by the plaintiff from an order of the superior court of Los Angeles county denying its motion for a change of the place of trial of the action from that county to San Joaquin county. The motion was made upon the ground that the convenience of witnesses and the ends of justice would be promoted by the change. The plaintiff was a corporation organized under the laws of this state, and having its principal place of business at the city of Stockton, in San Joaquin county. Its capital stock was $300,000, divided into 3,000 shares, of which about 2,800 had been actually subscribed for and taken. On October 4, 1892, the defendant was the owner and holder of 400 shares of the said capital stock, and at that time $50 on each share of the subscribed capital stock had been fully paid up. The action was brought to recover an assessment of $25 per share, levied on October 4, 1892, on the stock held by defendant. The complaint averred that the plaintiff was indebted to divers persons, companies, and corporations in sums aggregating $150,000, and was unable to meet its liabilities and satisfy the claims of its creditors, and that to meet such liabilities an assessment in the sum of $25 per share on the subscribed capital stock was necessary; that the assessment was duly levied as required by statute, and notice of the order, in the form prescribed, was published, and copies of the notice were sent through the mails, addressed to each of plaintiff's stockholders, including the defendant, at his place of residence; that the defendant had not paid the assessment on his stock, or any part thereof, and that before the time fixed for the sale of the delinquent stock the board of directors of the plaintiff corporation, by resolution duly adopted, elected to waive further proceedings, under chapter 2, tit. 1, pt. 4, of the Civil Code, for the collection of delinquent assessments, and elected to proceed by action to recover the amount of said assessment due from defendant. The only issues raised by the answer were as to the indebtedness of the plaintiff, its inability to meet its liabilities, the necessity of the levying the assessment, the adoption of the resolution levying the assessment, the publication by the secretary of the corporation of the notice of the assessment set out, the sending a copy of such notice through the mails to each of the said stockholders, and the adoption by the board of directors of plaintiff of the resolution electing to waive further proceedings, under the chapter of the Civil Code above referred to, for the collection of said alleged assessment, and ordering an action commenced to collect the same.

The motion to change the venue was based upon an affidavit of the plaintiff's president, which stated that all the transactions referred to in the complaint occurred in the county of San Joaquin; that all the officers and agents of the plaintiff resided in that county, except one, who resided in the county of Butte; that the affiant and certain other persons would be material and necessary witnesses at the trial of the action, and were the only ones by whom the plaintiff could prove the necessary facts; and that no witness except the defendant, whose testimony would be material or needful, resided in the county of Los Angeles. The affidavit also set out what the plaintiff expected to prove by each of its said witnesses. When the motion was called for hearing, counsel for defendant produced and filed a stipulation, signed by them, which admitted, in substance, that all the facts alleged in the complaint were true, and thus practically rendered it unnecessary for the plaintiff to call and examine any of its said witnesses. After the stipulation was filed, and upon due consideration, the court denied the motion, and the plaintiff excepted to the ruling. In support of the appeal it is claimed that, as no counter affidavits were filed, it was, in effect, admitted that the convenience of witnesses and the ends of justice would be promoted by the change asked for, and that, under the circumstances shown, plaintiff had a statutory right to have the motion granted. This claim cannot be sustained. Applications like this are addressed to the sound legal discretion of the trial court, and its action cannot be disturbed on appeal unless it clearly appears that there was an abuse of that discretion. Hanchett v. Finch, 47 Cal. 192; Avila v. Meherin, 68 Cal. 478, 9 Pac. 428; Clanton v. Ruffner, 78 Cal. 268, 20 Pac. 676; People v. Vincent, 95 Cal. 427, 30 Pac. 581. Here we are unable to see that the court in any way abused its discretion in denying the motion. The stipulation admitted the facts, and obviated the necessity of proving them. No counter affidavits were necessary. The order appealed from should be affirmed.

We concur: VANCLIEF, C.; HAYNES, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the forgeoing opinion, the order appealed from is affirmed.

FIELD v. ANDRADA et al. (No. 19,461.)

Bond on Appeal.

A bond on an appeal from an order denying a motion to dismiss, and an order denying a new trial, must state that an appeal has been taken from both orders.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; Walter Van Dyke, Judge.

Action by Field against Andrada and others. From an order denying their motion to dismiss the action, and from an order denying a new trial, defendants appeal. Dismissed.

R. Dunnigan, for appellants. Wells, Munroe & Lee and E. A. Meserve, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. Upon the authority of Berniaud v. Beecher, 74 Cal. 617, 16 Pac. 510; Schurtz v. Romer, 81 Cal. 244, 22 Pac. 657; Crew v. Diller, 86 Cal. 554, 25 Pac. 66; and Paving Co. v. Bolton, 89 Cal. 154, 26 Pac. 650,—the appeal from the order denying defendant's motion to dismiss the action, and the appeal from the order denying a new trial, are dismissed.

SAVINGS & LOAN SOC. v. BURNETT et al. (No. 14,553.)[1]

(Supreme Court of California. June 27, 1894.)

Trust Deed—Security for Future Advances—Conveyance by Grantor — Sale by Trustees — Title of Purchaser — Quieting Title — Pleading.

1. A deed of trust to secure $20,000, and also all further indebtedness of the grantor to the third party that might be contracted during the continuance of the trust, not exceeding $35,000, provided that on payment the trustees should reconvey to the grantor, his heirs or assigns, and contained a power of sale on default. Held, that where such grantor afterwards made an absolute conveyance to B., and paid the original debt secured, such deed of trust afforded no security for other sums advanced by such third party to the grantor for the purposes stated therein, with actual notice of such conveyance, and that a purchaser at the trustee's sale made on default in payment of such advances held the title in trust for B.

2. In an action by such purchaser to quiet title, the court found that the grantor was seised in fee originally, that he executed the deed of trust, and that default was made, and the property sold to plaintiff. Held, that such findings did not establish a full fee-simple title in plaintiff, where it appeared that such default in payment was of sums not secured by the deed of trust.

3. Even if $2,000 of the original debt secured was unpaid, a sale of the property regarded by plaintiff as sufficient security for $35,000 did not give an absolute legal title to the purchaser having knowledge of all the facts.

4. The complaint in an action to quiet title alleged that the grantor was holding the property against his own deed, and that plaintiff was seised of and holds all the estate, right, title, and interest, at law or in equity, which such grantor ever had or could acquire. The answer specifically denied such allegations, and alleged the execution of a deed to one B., but asked no affirmative relief. Held, that the pleadings warrant findings and sustain a judgment for defendants.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; John F. Finn, Judge.

Action by the Savings & Loan Society against John M. Burnett and others to quiet title. From a judgment for defendants, and from an order denying its motion for a new trial, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

A. N. Drown, for appellant. Jarboe & Jarboe and Robt. H. Countryman (Robt. Y. Hayne, of counsel), for respondents.

HAYNES, C. This action was brought by the Savings & Loan Society against Denis Mahoney, John M. Burnett personally, and also as trustee, and the nine children of Mahoney, for the purpose of quieting the title of the plaintiff to certain real estate in the city of San Francisco, and determining the adverse claim of the defendants thereto. The defendants had judgment, and the plaintiff appeals therefrom, and from an order denying its motion for a new trial.

On May 22, 1868, Mahoney, being then the owner of the land in question, borrowed $20,000 from appellant, and gave his promissory note therefor, and also executed a deed of trust of the premises described in the complaint to E. W. Burr and B. D. Dean to secure said sum, and also "all further indebtedness of the party of the first part to the party of the third part [appellant] that might be contracted during the continuance of the trust, not exceeding $35,000 at any one time, whether evidenced by promissory notes or otherwise, whether for interest, insurance, or for moneys expended in and about said premises for repairs, taxes, liens, or incumbrances," etc., and provided that upon full payment of all existing and accruing indebtedness the trustees should reconvey to Mahoney, his heirs or assigns. It also contained a power of sale upon default in the repayment of the sum borrowed and the interest thereon, "or in the reimbursement of any amounts herein provided to be paid, or of any interest thereon, and all future advances, disbursements, accounts, balances, and dues,"—the power to be executed, on the application of appellant, by sale at public auction, and by conveyance to the purchaser,—and further provided that such deed of conveyance, with its recitals of default and notice of sale, should be conclusive proof thereof, "and effectual and conclusive against the party of the first part, his heirs and assigns, and all other persons." On December 28, 1881, the premises in question (the same as described in said deed of trust) were sold thereunder by the trustees in the manner provided, and appellant became the purchaser, its bid being $17,250 (that being the amount then claimed to be due appellant, and secured by the deed of trust); and on the next day the trustees executed a deed in due form to appellant, and under this deed it claims title. Respondents answered, taking issue upon appellant's seisin and ownership, and claimed and alleged title to the land in question in John M. Burnett, as trustee under a deed executed to him by said Denis Mahoney on March 6, 1869, declaring certain trusts in favor of Mahoney's nine children, a copy of which deed is attached to the answer. The trusts declared in this deed were "to receive the issues, rents, and profits of said premises, and apply the same, or such portion thereof as shall be necessary, for the support, maintenance, and education of the nine children of Denis Mahoney," until the youngest of said children should arrive at age; that any surplus profits should be invested, and, when the youngest child should arrive at majority, to convey to them the said lands,—each taking an equal undivided interest, and a like interest in the accumulations. It was also provided that no estate should vest in the trustee, directly, contingently, or otherwise, except for the purposes of the trust. Said deed of trust also contained the following clause: "And in case it should become advisable, in the judgment of the said Denis Mahoney and Burnett, to make improvements upon said property, the said trustee is hereby authorized to raise money, by mortgage or otherwise, on said property, or such part thereof as may be necessary for that purpose, and to pay the same, and all charges and interest thereon, out of the rents and profits of the whole of said property, after the application of so much thereof as may be necessary for the support, maintenance, and education of said children, in place of investing the said surplus as hereinbefore provided."

The point of the controversy is this: Appellant claims that the amount for which the property was sold to it under said first deed of trust was due to it for moneys loaned and advances made for taxes, street assessments, and other purposes, directly connected with the property, including part of the original loan, and that all these sums, whether loaned or advanced before or after the execution of the trust deed to Burnett, were secured by said first deed of trust, and that, the sale being in all respects regular, the entire title to the premises passed to it by the sale and conveyance thereunder, while respondents claim that the original loan, and the interest thereon, and all advancements made by appellant prior to the execution of the trust deed to Burnett, were paid and discharged; that the sum for which the property was sold by appellant consisted of loans and advancements made after the conveyance in trust to Burnett, and with knowledge of such conveyance, and therefore were not secured by said first deed of trust; that the sale was therefore without authority, and the deed to appellant pursuant to said sale conveyed no title.

The findings state the facts very fully, and, in addition to the general facts above stated, other facts found by the court are essential to a consideration of the points made by appellant. The original loan of $20,000 was to be paid in 72 monthly installments, commencing in September, 1868, and at the date of the trust deed to Burnett, March 6, 1869, the amount of that loan remaining unpaid was $19,754.49. Appellant paid the taxes on the property covered by the deed of trust for the years 1869–70, 1870–71, and 1871–72, and also a considerable sum for insurance. On May 25, 1871, money was required for repairs and improvements on the property; and, on that day, appellant, at the request of Mahoney and of Burnett, claiming to act as trustee, loaned or advanced $500 for that purpose, and on March 5, 1872, for some purpose connected with the property, and, at the like request, loaned the further sum of $650. For these sums, respectively, Mahoney and Burnett gave their promissory notes payable at one year,—the latter signing the notes as trustee,—and in each of these notes it was recited that they were secured by the deed of trust made by Mahoney to Burr and Dean, reciting its date, and where recorded. Prior to the execution of these notes the insurance above mentioned, and the taxes for 1869–70, had been repaid; and on June 11, 1870, all of the original loan had been paid, except the sum of $2,000. On November 13, 1873, there remained unpaid said balance of $2,000 and the said two promissory notes above mentioned, together with interest and two years' taxes paid by appellant; and Mahoney and Burnett then desired to obtain the further sum of $249, with which to pay a street assessment charged upon the property. Upon a statement of these several matters, with accrued interest, it was found that they amounted to $4,565; and thereupon Mahoney and Burnett—the latter claiming to act as trustee—executed a promissory note for that sum, payable to appellant, at one year, with interest, and this note also recited that it was secured by said deed of trust made by Mahoney to Burr and Dean; said Burnett signing the note, "John M. Burnett, Trustee of Mahoney Estate." In this connection the court, after finding the indebtedness for which said note was given, and setting out the note in full, proceeded to find as follows: "And that the said note last above referred to was taken and received by the said Savings & Loan Society, as and in payment and satisfaction and extinguishment of all sums of money then due to it by said Denis Mahoney or the said John M. Burnett, and of all claims and demands which it then had against the said Mahoney or the said Burnett, or either of them; and that at the time of the execution of the note last herein referred to the said plaintiff stamped, and marked as paid and canceled, and surrendered up and delivered up to the said Denis Mahoney, the promissory note for the sum of $20,000, hereinbefore referred to, and marked and entered the same as satisfied and canceled upon the books of record kept by it; and that the note last above referred to was taken in payment and satisfaction of all the sums of money hereinbefore above referred to." After this transaction, appellant paid the taxes on the property up to and including the fiscal year 1881–82, and certain insurance on buildings, and also paid several street assessments, at the request of Mahoney and Burnett, which had become liens upon the property in question; and these payments, together with said promissory note of November 13, 1873, for $4,565, and accrued interest on all said sums, made up the amount of the claim for which said property was sold by the trustees, Burr and Dean, to appellant, after deducting certain payments of interest on said note, which payments were continued to August, 1878. It is also found that the sale of the property was several times postponed, at the request of Mahoney and Burnett, upon payment by them of the cost of publishing the notices of sale.

Appellant's first point is that the findings do not support the judgment, inasmuch as they show that plaintiff was seised in fee of the land at the commencement of the suit. It is not claimed that there is an express finding of title in fee in the plaintiff, but that it is found that Denis Mahoney was seised in fee originally; that he executed the deed of trust to Burr and Dean; that default was made, and the property sold and conveyed to the plaintiff. And these facts, it is argued, "establish irresistibly and completely an absolute and full fee-simple title in appellant at the dates alleged." But this argument assumes either that such title was vested in the trustees, Burr and Dean,—that they could, under any and all circumstances, convey a good title,—or that a default was in fact made, under which the trustees were authorized to sell and convey. The deed of trust specified the only condition upon which the trustees could sell and convey; and unless that condition existed the sale and conveyance were each void, under section 870 of the Civil Code, which provides: "Where a trust in relation to real property is expressed in the instrument creating the estate, every transfer or other act of the trustees, in contravention of the trust, is absolutely void." By the express terms of the deed of trust, the power to sell depended upon Mahoney's default in the payment of moneys secured thereby, and upon payment they were bound to reconvey to Mahoney. It may be conceded that their deed to appellant vested a prima facie title in appellant; but, as this is a suit in equity to quiet title, appellant must have something more than an apparent title. But, in this connection, appellant insists that no title was vested in Burnett by the trust deed to him; that, by the deed of trust to Burr and Dean, Mahoney "emptied himself of his whole estate, and there was nothing left in him to be conveyed to Burnett." The learned counsel is mistaken. There was left in Mahoney the right of possession, carrying with it the rents and profits, and the right, upon payment of his indebtedness to the Savings & Loan Society, to have the entire estate and title as he had held and enjoyed it before; and this right to the possession and use of the property, and the right to have again the unincumbered estate and title upon payment of his debt, he could and did convey to Burnett. Whether the deed of trust to Burr and Dean vested in them the legal title to the land is controverted by respondent; but, assuming that it did, upon payment or satisfaction of the debt thereby secured the trustees had, at the most, the dry legal title, without any interest or ownership in the land. "When the purposes for which an express trust was created cease, the estate of the trustee also ceases." Id. § 871. And for that reason, if the purposes of the trust here created had ceased by payment of the debt, the subsequent deed of the trustees to appellant conveyed no estate or interest in the land; and whether such payment had been made before such conveyance is therefore a vital question in the case, unless it shall be held that the deed of trust to Burr and Dean was a valid security for all advances made by appellant,—as well those made after knowledge of the conveyance to Burnett as of those made before.

1. All the advances made by appellant after the original sum of $20,000 were optional. The terms of the deed of trust did not require it to make further advances. Assuming that appellant had actual notice of the conveyance to Burnett in trust for the children of Mahoney, it had notice that Mahoney no longer had power to deal with or incumber the property. To the extent the terms of the contract between them, expressed in the deed of trust, required them to make loans or advancements, if any, the Savings & Loan Society might safely go, as any conveyance Mahoney might make would be subject to its requirements. Mahoney not only conveyed all the interest he had in the property to Burnett, but he reserved no power or right over it. It is obvious that those cases cited by counsel as to the rights of a subsequent mortgagee, where advancements have been made by a prior mortgagee after notice of the second mortgage, involve quite different facts, for in those cases the mortgagor remained the owner of the property mortgaged, with full power to create additional liens upon it, so that the question there was not as to the validity of the liens, but as to which had priority. The principles involved are applicable here, however, with even greater force. In such cases the great weight of authority seems to establish the following propositions: (1) A mortgage for obligatory advances is a lien from the date of its execution, and will therefore secure such advances, although other incumbrances are put upon the property before such advances are in fact made, and such advances are not affected by the mortgagee's knowledge of the subsequent incumbrances. (2) But where the mortgagee is not bound to make the advances, and has actual notice of a later incumbrance, such later incumbrance will take precedence of the first mortgage, as to all advances made after such notice. For a discussion of these propositions, see 1 Jones, Mortg. §§ 369-371, and the numerous cases there cited, and also Tapia v. Demartini, 77 Cal. 387, 19 Pac. 641. If, therefore, Mahoney had mortgaged the property in question to Burnett, and appellant, with actual notice of such mortgage, had made these advances to Mahoney, such advances would have been postponed, and, as to Burnett's mortgage, would have taken the place of a junior mortgage. Much more, then, would an absolute conveyance by Mahoney cut off the lien of future advances to Mahoney which appellant was not obliged to make. If, therefore, the further advances made with actual notice of the deed to Burnett were secured by the deed of trust to Burr and Dean, it must have been because of Burnett's relation to these advancements, or because of the purposes to which the money advanced was applied. It cannot be questioned that both Burnett and the beneficiaries under the deed of trust to him were charged with notice of the deed of trust to Burr and Dean, and of all sums of money loaned or advanced thereunder prior to the date of the deed to Burnett, and that the property was liable therefor, and for all moneys thereafter advanced (if any were advanced) prior to actual notice to appellant, of such conveyance. But, after such notice to appellant, the deed of trust, which operated as security for moneys theretofore loaned or advanced, could not be extended to further advances unless Burnett had the power, as trustee, to bind his cestuis que trustent, not only for moneys borrowed, but by a security to which he was not a party.

The powers of trustees are thus defined: "A trustee is a general agent for the trust property. His authority is such as is conferred upon him by the declaration of trust and by this chapter, and none other. His acts, within the scope of his authority, bind the trust property to the same extent as the acts of an agent bind his principal." Civ. Code, § 2267. The only clause in the deed of trust of Burnett, empowering the trustee to raise money, has been hereinbefore quoted. No reference is made in any manner to the deed of trust to Burr and Dean as a means of securing money for improvements, nor of any reservation of a power in Mahoney to secure further advances thereunder for any purpose; and, as Burnett did not execute a mortgage or other instrument pledging the trust property, a discussion of his power to do so under the terms of the trust deed is not necessary, for if it be conceded that he had the power to procure all these advancements, and to secure the same by a mortgage with a power of sale, or by a deed of trust such as that in question, which ordinarily creates a strict legal right which may be enforced without the aid of a court of equity, no such legal right was created by Burnett, and the advancements could only be made a charge upon the trust property by the aid of a court of equity. The deed of trust given to secure appellant did not restrict the use of the money loaned to any particular purpose, except as to the payment of taxes, insurance, etc., which the appellant or the trustees were empowered to pay of their own volition; and if, instead of taking the note of November, 1873, for $4,565, the bank had loaned to Mahoney at that date the difference between that sum and $35,000, to which the security was limited, and had taken the note for the last-named sum, and this sum had been used by Mahoney for his individual purposes in no way connected with the property, it would hardly be contended that Mahoney or Burnett, or both jointly, could charge the estate of the children with such a liability; and, if not, it is apparent that appellant's claim is based upon an equity arising from the fact that the moneys so advanced were used to relieve the trust estate from liens which endangered the estate of the beneficiaries, and not because of the deed of trust under which appellant claims they were made, and such equity could not be enforced through or under the terms of a dry legal contract to which Burnett was not a party. The sale to appellant, therefore (assuming the facts found by the court to be sustained by the evidence), did not vest in appellant an absolute estate in the land. Burr and Dean were not only trustees for the bank, but were also trustees for Mahoney, and were bound to reconvey to him or his assigns upon the condition expressed in the deed; and unless the facts existed, authorizing a sale, appellant took the conveyance subject to the same trust imposed upon them. It is true the deed of trust under which the sale was made contained a provision that the recitals in the deed to be made by them to the purchaser "shall be conclusive proof of such default, and of the due publication of such notice [of sale], and any such deed or deeds, with such recitals therein, shall be effectual and conclusive against said party of the first part, his heirs, assigns, and all other persons." But such recitals could only avail for the protection of an innocent purchaser without notice of any want of authority in the trustees to sell, and could not be invoked by appellant for its protection. The deed of trust to Burr and Dean was not an absolute deed of trust, but a deed of trust in the nature of a mortgage. The distinction between these instruments is clearly stated in the recent case of Powell v. Patison, 100 Cal. 235, 34 Pac. 676, and in Perry, Trusts, § 602d. Speaking of mortgages with power of sale and deeds of trust, it is said: "At law, both kinds of deeds purport to convey the legal title to the grantee or creditor or trustee; but in equity the land, the title, and deeds stand for security of the debt. The debt is the principal thing, and the conveyance of the land is collateral to the debt. The mortgagor in both cases has an estate in the land, called an 'equity of redemption.' If he fails to pay the debt, his equity of redemption is barred upon due proceedings had; but, if his debt is paid at any time before his equity is defeated by the steps appointed to be taken, it becomes absolute, and he is entitled to a reconveyance, or a discharge of the mortgage, as the case may be." Courts do not favor constructions that confer upon trustees absolute and uncontrollable powers. Burr and Dean were not the absolute owners of the property, but were the donees of a power over it for the benefit of appellant; and, if the debt legally secured by the deed of trust to them had been satisfied before the sale, they could convey no greater interest in the property than was then vested in them, and appellant in such case holds the legal title in trust for respondents.

2. Appellant contends, however, that the finding that the note for $4,565, dated November 13, 1873, was taken and received by appellant in payment and satisfaction of all claims and demands which it then had against Mahoney or Burnett, or either of them, is not justified by the evidence; that, if said note was not so taken, at least the $2,000 remaining unpaid of the original loan of $20,000 was a valid lien upon the property, and sufficient to sustain the validity of the sale by the trustees to appellant. We think the evidence sufficient to support the finding. At the time the note for $4,565 was given, there was a balance of $2,000 due upon the original note for $20,000, for which Mahoney alone was liable. In addition to that, some taxes had been paid by appellant, and two small notes for moneys loaned had been given by Mahoney and Burnett, the latter signing as trustee.

The note for $4,565 covered the amount of these several items, and the accrued interest, and upon its execution the $20,000 note was canceled and surrendered; and the note then taken represented the entire claim of appellant at that date, and this note purported to be secured by the deed of trust. There does not appear to have been, in words, any express agreement as to the effect of this transaction in relation to the question of payment. Nothing was said upon that subject. Mr. Burr testified, in substance, that the whole balance was made into one note, instead of having three notes upon which to carry the interest every month, and to that extent the $4,565 note was made at his instance; that the consolidation was merely to facilitate the bookkeeping of the bank. It is conceded that the mere fact of the acceptance of a note for a pre-existing debt does not extinguish it, or that one simple executory contract does not extinguish another for which it is substituted, unless such be the agreement of the parties. Whether such was the agreement of the parties is a question of fact, which the court, in the absence of a jury, was required to determine. Griffith v. Grogan, 12 Cal. 324. In Brown v. Dunckel, 46 Mich. 32, 8 N. W. 537, it was said: "The giving of a note for the debt did not, as a matter of law, operate as a payment of the debt, unless it was so expressly agreed; but it should be understood to be so expressly agreed if the jury could ascertain from the facts and circumstances that it was so mutually understood between the parties." In Stanley v. McElrath, 86 Cal. 455, 25 Pac. 16, it was said: "The payment of money is not necessary to the extinguishment of an obligation. A debt may be paid by the giving of a note, if it be offered and accepted as payment." The facts that, as to the balance of the $20,000 note, a new party was added as a joint maker; that the old note was surrendered; that there was not at any time an offer to return the new note, nor any demand for the redelivery of the former; that the new note was set down in the statement of the items comprising the sum for which the property was sold as constituting part of the appellant's claim; that the new note, upon its face, purported to be secured by the deed of trust, which provided for securing other sums besides the $20,000 note,—tend strongly to show such understanding. The giving of a new note is at least a conditional payment, and suspends the first obligation until the maturity of the new note, when the creditor may suspend or cancel the new obligation, and proceed upon the original. Brewster v. Bours, 8 Cal. 506. "When suit is brought against a defendant upon a debt, whether evidenced by a note or otherwise, and it appears that he has given a bill or note for the same debt, which has become mature and is unpaid, while it does not operate as a bar to the suit, it is essential to the plaintiff's recovery that it be produced and surrendered up, or otherwise satisfactorily accounted for at the trial. This is necessary as a safeguard to the defendant, for, if the plaintiff should have passed it off before maturity to a third party, the defendant might be compelled to pay the debt a second time." 2 Daniel, Neg. Inst. § 1275. See, also, Burdick v. Green, 15 Johns. 247; Rayburn v. Day, 27 Ill. 47; Morrison v. Welty, 18 Md. 176. We think there is such evidence as forbids us to set aside the finding that the new note was given and received in payment of the balance due upon the original note. But, even if it were otherwise, we think a sale of the whole property, which was regarded by appellant as sufficient security for $35,000, should not be held to give an absolute legal title to a purchaser having knowledge of all the facts, but that, in such case, appellant, by the purchase, became a trustee, and held no other or better title than that held by Burr and Dean.

3. Appellant further excepts to the findings, in that it is there said that Burnett "claimed to act as trustee," while appellant contends that the evidence shows that he "did act as trustee." What Burnett did, and how he did it, are fully set out in the findings. Whether these acts were the authorized and valid acts of a trustee is a conclusion of law. That he "claimed to act as trustee" is the finding of a pure matter of fact.

4. The finding that the $20,000 note was canceled upon appellant's books is amply sustained by the evidence. Mr. Burr testified that the new note was taken to simplify or facilitate the bookkeeping of the bank, as the monthly interest would be computed upon one note, instead of three. The plain inference is that the account of the $20,000 note was balanced, closed, or canceled. If it had not been closed, the books of the bank would have shown the debt to be $2,000 more than is claimed. Besides, no mention is made of any balance of that account in the statement under which the property was sold.

5. E. W. Burr, a witness on behalf of the plaintiff, was asked by counsel for the plaintiff the following question: "To what extent, if at all, was it the intention of the bank, or of yourself acting for the bank, at the time of taking this $4,565 note, to receive it in extinguishment or satisfaction of the existing obligation or indebtedness?" An objection was sustained, and the same question, varied somewhat in form, was several times repeated, and objections sustained to each. It is not necessary to consider whether the court erred in these rulings, since the final question of the series was not objected to, and in response to that, as well as in the testimony of the same witness to preceding questions, the witness stated all that could be properly said upon the subject, even to including the "purpose" for which, as well as the circumstances under which, it was taken.

6. The finding that appellant had full knowledge of the deed to Burnett from and after the time it was recorded is sustained by the evidence. It is clear that on May 25, 1871, appellant required Burnett, as trustee, to sign the $500 note. Some small amounts had been advanced for taxes and insurance; but these sums were all repaid prior to the making of this note, except the taxes for 1870–71, amounting to $415.37, which was included in the note of November 13, 1873, which the court found was received in payment of all sums then unpaid. While there is no direct evidence of actual knowledge or notice of the Burnett deed prior to May 25, 1871, there was evidence tending to show that such actual notice was obtained from the record presumably at or about the date at which the deed was recorded.

7. The objection that the pleadings do not warrant the findings nor sustain the judgment is not maintainable. The complaint alleged that Denis Mahoney was holding the same against his own deed, and "that plaintiff is seised of, and now holds, all the estate, right, title, and interest, at law or in equity, which said Denis Mahoney ever had, or could at any time acquire, of, in, or to said real property, or any part of the same," and that defendants wrongfully claim, etc. The answer specifically denied all these allegations, and alleged the execution of the trust deed to Burnett. No affirmative relief was prayed for by defendants, and none was given. The issue was upon the title of the plaintiff,—whether, as against the defendants, it had such title as would authorize a decree in its favor,—and the judgment was upon that issue.

The conclusions reached have not been arrived at without difficulty. It has been impossible to notice in detail the very extended and able arguments of counsel, or to close our eyes to the hardship of appellant's situation. Whether any relief may yet be obtained has not been considered, and any language used which might be construed as an intimation upon that point must be disregarded. I think the judgment and order appealed from should be affirmed.

We concur: SEARLS, C.; BELCHER, C.

103 Cal. 280

RYAN et al. v. JACQUES et al. (No. 19,250.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 27, 1894.)

STOCKHOLDERS IN CORPORATION — LIABILITY FOR UNPAID SUBSCRIPTIONS—ACTION BY CORPORATE CREDITOR—PLEADING.

1. The complaint in an action by judgment creditors of a corporation alleged that defendant stockholders were the original subscribers for stock, and had only paid a certain amount on the shares, and that a certain amount was yet "due" thereon, for which the stockholders were "liable." Defendants simply denied that any sum was due, and that they were liable for any sum. The court found that no sum was due from defendants, and that they were not liable for any sum. Held, that as the allegations "due" and "liable" in the pleadings and findings were mere allegations of law, and as the allegation that only a certain amount had been paid by the stockholders on the share was not denied, judgment for defendants was erroneous.

2. The complaint is not subject to a general demurrer on the ground that it merely alleges that only a certain sum has been paid on the subscriptions by defendants, when it also alleges that defendants were the original subscribers, as it cannot be presumed that defendants sold the stock to persons who made additional payments thereon, and then resold to defendants.

3. In an action by judgment creditors of a corporation for the unpaid balances of stock subscriptions, the defense that defendant stockholders purchased their shares in open market and in good faith, without notice that any amount was unpaid thereon, must be pleaded.

4. A complaint in an action by judgment creditors of a corporation to compel stockholders to pay the unpaid balance on their stock, which, after alleging that the defendants were the owners of the capital stock as original subscribers thereto, and stating the amount held by each, alleges that only a certain sum has been paid on each share held by them, is not demurrable, on the ground that it joins a joint liability of defendants with a several liability, as the complaint shows that the latter allegation was used merely to show the amount paid on the shares, and not the manner in which they were held by defendants.

Commissioners' decision. In bank. Appeal from superior court, San Diego county; George Puterbaugh, Judge.

Action by Henry L. Ryan against Burkill Jacques and others, and Oscar Trippett intervenes. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiff and intervener appeal. Reversed.

Trippett, Boone & Neale, for appellants. J. E. Deakin, James E. Wadham, and Hunsaker, Britt & Goodrich, for respondents.

HAYNES, C. This action was brought against several stockholders in the Santa Rosa Land & Improvement Company by appellant Ryan, to subject an alleged balance remaining unpaid to the corporation upon the stock held by the defendants in satisfaction of a judgment recovered by him against the corporation. Trippett, the other appellant, is also a judgment creditor of the corporation, and came in as an intervener, and sought similar relief. All the defendants had judgment, and this appeal is upon the judgment roll from the judgment in favor of four of the defendants, viz. Burkill Jacques, William H. Anderson, J. E. Deakin, and T. C. Stockton. The appeal as to Anderson was dismissed.

The principal question is as to the sufficiency of a certain allegation of the complaint. Certain other allegations should be stated, however, in order to a proper construction of the clause more particularly in question. After alleging that the capital stock of said corporation is $600,000, divided into 6,000 shares of $100 each, all of which were subscribed for, it is alleged as follows: "On information and belief, plaintiff alleges that the following are the owners of said stock of the said corporation, as original subscribers thereto, and were such owners at the time of the commencement of this action, excepting the defendant George Neale, who is a transferee of an original stockholder." "Burkill Jacques is the owner of three hundred shares of said capital stock, and was such owner at the time this action was commenced." Then follows a similar allegation as to the number of shares held by each of the defendants, and immediately succeeding these allegations is the following: "Upon information and belief, plaintiff alleges that only the sum of $9.50 has been paid by said stockholders upon the capital amount of each and every share of said stock of said corporation held and owned by them, and the present holders thereof are, and each of them is, liable for the balance due upon said stock, to wit, the sum of $90.50 upon each and every share of said capital stock held and owned by them." After alleging that the corporation had failed and refused to levy an assessment to pay plaintiff's judgment, the complaint further alleges: "On information and belief, the plaintiff alleges that there is remaining due to said Santa Rosa Land and Improvement Company from the defendant Burkill Jacques the sum of $27,150, upon the capital stock of said corporation held and owned by him." Allegations in the same language, except as to names and amounts, were made as to each of the other defendants. The complaint in intervention of appellant Trippett was in the same form. The defendants severally demurred to each complaint for misjoinder of parties defendant; also for misjoinder of causes of action, in that a several cause of action against each defendant was joined with a several cause of action against each of the other defendants; and also that the complaint did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. The demurrers were overruled, and the defendants answered severally. The only denials necessary to be noticed are the following, taken from the answer of respondent Jacques, the denials of the other respondents being in the same form: "Denies upon and according to his information and belief that the present holders of any or all of the stock mentioned in the said amended complaint are liable, or that any of them is liable, for the sum of $90.50, or any other sum, upon each or any share of the said capital stock." "This defendant denies that there is remaining due the Santa Rosa Land and Improvement Company from this defendant, upon the capital stock of said corporation, now or ever held or owned by him, the sum of $27,150, or any other sum." The court found that plaintiff obtained judgment against the corporation, as alleged; that it remained unreversed and in full force; that execution was issued thereon, and returned wholly unsatisfied; that respondent Jacques, at the time suit was commenced, was the owner of three hundred shares of said stock, Anderson of four hundred shares, Stockton of forty shares, and Deakin of five hundred shares. Then follows this general finding: "(12) That the sum of $90.50 is not, nor is any sum, due upon each and every or any share of stock of said corporation, held or owned by the defendants, from said defendants, or either or any of them, to the Santa Rosa Land and Improvement Company, or any other person. (13) That the sum of $27,150 is not, nor is any other sum, due from said defendant Burkill Jacques to the Santa Rosa Land and Improvement Company, or any other person, upon the capital stock of said corporation." The same finding is made as to each of the other defendants. As conclusions of law, the court found that none of the defendants were indebted to said corporation or to plaintiff or to the intervener, Trippett, in any sum on account of subscriptions to the capital stock or otherwise, and that defendants have judgment for costs.

If the complaint is sufficient as against a general demurrer,—and we think it is,—the findings do not support the judgment. There was no misjoinder of parties or causes of action. There are in the complaint several matters stated which are purely conclusions of law, and some of the facts are not stated with the clearness and precision which good pleading requires. Whether a demurrer for ambiguity would have been sustained, it is not necessary to consider, as no such objection was taken. If, however, facts are stated showing the liability of the defendants, the complaint must be sustained, notwithstanding they are imperfectly stated. Brown v. Weldon, 71 Cal. 393, 12 Pac. 280; Tehama Co. v. Bryan, 68 Cal. 57, 8 Pac. 673; Harnish v. Bramer, 71 Cal. 155, 11 Pac. 888.

There is no finding as to the amount that had been paid or remained unpaid upon each share of the subscribed capital stock, but it is alleged that the par value of the shares is $100, and that only $9.50 had been paid thereon; and neither of these allegations was denied. No finding was therefore required of either fact. Under such circumstances, the court was bound to draw the conclusion that $90.50 remained unpaid upon each share. Any other conclusion would contradict admitted facts. But respondents contend that the allegation in question was of a "joint" ownership and holding, while the other allegations are of a several holding. The references in the clause in question to the preceding allegations by the word "said," and the whole frame of the complaint, show that this clause was not intended to allege how the stock was owned or held, but to show how much had been paid on each share, and how much remained unpaid. It is also contended that this allegation pleads evidence only; that "it might be admitted that the defendants had paid only $9.50 per share on the stock held by them, and yet some precedent owner may have paid the remainder upon each share necessary to complete payments in full, or that defendants may have purchased the stock in open market in good faith, and without notice that any part was unpaid." But, if the defendants had purchased the stock under such circumstances as to relieve them from liability for the amount unpaid, it was matter of defense, to be pleaded and proved by them, and the plaintiff was not bound to anticipate and negative such defense; and, as to the objection that others than the defendants may have paid the $90.50 not paid by them, it is sufficient to say that it was alleged that the stock held by each of the defendants, except Neale, was held by them as original subscribers, and it will not be presumed that they sold their stock after paying $9.50 per share, that the purchasers paid the remainder, and then sold the stock back to the defendants. The allegation that the defendants were the subscribers, that they only paid $9.50 on each share, required them, if they admitted they had only paid that amount, and claimed that they were not liable for the remainder of the subscription price, to plead the facts which exonerated them from such liability. If they still held the stock subscribed for by them, no one else had the right to pay therefor; and if payment had been made by a third party, under such circumstances as entitled the defendants to credit for such payment, it was a payment by them, and might be proved under a proper denial of the averment that only $9.50 had been paid. If defendants had demurred upon the ground of ambiguity or uncertainty, there would be much force in respondents' objections above noticed; but they do not show that a cause of action is not stated, though they point out its imperfections. If a complaint, or any allegation of a complaint, is capable of different constructions, that which the plaintiff gives it or which the court finds necessary to support the action will be given, in the absence of a special demurrer. In other words, a pleading must be construed, for the purpose of determining its effect, with a view to substantial justice between the parties. Code Civ. Proc. § 452.

The allegation of the complaint that defendants are "liable for the balance due upon said stock, to wit, $90.50 upon each and every share," is but a conclusion of law, and the denial by the defendants of their "liability" for that or any other sum raised no issue; and the finding "that the sum of $90.50 is not, nor is any sum, due" is a conclusion of law also, and not the finding of a fact, nor is any fact found from which that conclusion could be drawn. Respondents contend that the word "due," in the finding, is equivalent to "unpaid;" but it must have the same meaning in the complaint, and, if we substitute "unpaid" in the complaint in the place of "due," we have a fact which is not denied in the answer, and is therefore admitted, and hence the finding, as construed by respondents, would contradict the admission. In the absence of a special demurrer, that is pleaded with sufficient certainty which is capable of being certainly ascertained from the complaint. It was so said of findings in Ward v. Clay, 82 Cal. 512, 23 Pac. 50, 227. And that which is sufficiently certain in findings must be sufficiently certain in a complaint. The obligation being to pay $100 on each share, and it being alleged that "only $9.50" had been paid thereon, it is certain that $90.50 remains unpaid. Nor will it help respondents to treat the conclusion of law drawn by the court that defendants are not "indebted" as a finding of fact, for such finding would be contrary to the admission that only $9.50 had been paid, no fact being averred or found which discharged them from liability to pay the remainder of the par value of the stock. The cases cited by respondents to this proposition merely hold that a common count that "defendant is indebted to the plaintiff for goods sold and delivered," etc., was sufficient as a complaint; but it has not been held that an answer to such complaint was sufficient which only denied the "indebtedness." How these so-called "issues," involving only conclusions of law, were treated upon the trial, we cannot know, the appeal being upon the judgment roll alone; but, as the conclusions of law are inconsistent with the facts found, taken with the admission, for want of a denial, that only $9.50 had been paid on each share, the judgment is wrong. I advise that the judgment be reversed, with leave to the parties to amend their pleadings.

We concur: BELCHER, C.; SEARLS, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment appealed from is reversed, with leave to both parties to amend their pleadings.

GREEN et al. v. GREEN et al. (No. 15,380.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 13, 1894.)

DEED—AFTER-ACQUIRED TITLE—RECORDING—ASSIGNMENT OF ERRORS.

1. A deed purporting to convey a fee-simple estate, and also all the after-acquired interest of the grantor, causes any after-acquired interest of the grantor to inure to the benefit of the grantee.

2. Where, at the time of the execution of a deed, the land conveyed was situated in a county which has been subsequently divided, the deed is properly recorded in the county it is in at the time of the recording.

3. An assignment that a certain finding is contrary to the evidence cannot be considered if not raised on motion for new trial.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, San Mateo county; W. G. Lorigan, Judge.

Action by Lulu Green and another against Jasper N. Green and another. There was a judgment for plaintiffs, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Z. N. Goldsby, for appellants. Edw. F. Fitzpatrick, for respondents.

VANCLIEF, C. Action to quiet plaintiffs' alleged title to 160 acres of land situated within the present boundaries of the county of San Mateo. The action was tried and judgment rendered in favor of the plaintiffs, except as to a life estate in the defendant Delana Green, in October, 1888. The defendants moved for a new trial on a statement of the case, which was settled and allowed by a succeeding judge on January 21, 1893. This appeal by the defendants is from an order denying their motion for a new trial, made January 11, 1893.

The land in controversy was pre-empted in 1863 by Havilah Green, husband of the defendant Delana Green. He declared a homestead upon the premises January 2, 1865, and died July 21, 1865. After his death, the land was entered by his heirs, and a United States patent was issued to them on January 10, 1868, pursuant to Rev. St. U. S. § 2269. On December 28, 1867, the defendant Jasper N. Green, and his brother John R. Green, two of the sons and heirs of the deceased, Havilah Green, executed a grant, bargain, and sale deed of the land to their brother Henry H. Green, under whom the plaintiffs claim title by descent, as his heirs. This deed purported to convey absolute title to the land, and also all present and future interest of the grantors therein. On March 12, 1883, Delana Green, widow of Havilah, conveyed the land to defendant Jasper N. Green, reserving a life tenancy in herself. On June 11, 1883, the superior court set the premises apart as a homestead for the use of the widow, Delana, and on July 9, 1883, she conveyed the land to William H. Bias, subject to her life estate therein; and on January 31, 1884, Bias conveyed all his rights to Jasper N. Green. The judgment quieted the title of plaintiffs as against Jasper N. Green, and also against Delana Green, excepting her life estate, as to which the judgment quieted her title as against the plaintiffs.

1. Upon these facts, which are principally taken from the answer of the defendants, I think the judgment is clearly right. The conveyance by the defendant Jasper N. Green, on March 28, 1867, to Henry H. Green, being of a title in fee simple absolute, and expressly purporting to convey all after-acquired interest of the grantor, operated upon all the interest thereafter acquired by him, causing it to inure to the benefit of Henry H. Green, and of his heirs, the plaintiffs. Hitchens v. Nougues, 11 Cal. 28; Clark v. Baker, 14 Cal. 613; Quivey v. Baker, 37 Cal. 465; Dalton v. Hamilton, 50 Cal. 423; Civ. Code, § 1106.

2. Appellants contend that a certified copy of the record of the deed of March 28, 1867, was not competent evidence of the contents or execution of that deed, for the reason that the deed was not recorded in Santa Cruz county, in which the land was situated at the time that deed was executed. The land was situated in Pescadero township, in Santa Cruz county, at the time the deed was executed and acknowledged, and the execution thereof was acknowledged before Robert Knowles, a justice of the peace in that township, on the day the deed was executed. In March, 1868, Pescadero township was severed from Santa Cruz county and annexed to San Mateo county. The deed was not recorded until June 20, 1872, when it was recorded in San Mateo county. The acknowledgment is in due form; and besides, Knowles, who took it, also signed as a witness to the execution, and testified at the trial that the deed was executed in his presence. The deed was properly recorded in the county in which the land was situated at the time of recording (Civ. Code, § 1169), and a certified copy of the record was prima facie evidence of the execution of the deed, since it was proved that the original was not in the possession or under the control of the plaintiff. Code Civ. Proc. § 1951, as approved March, 1874 (in force at the time of trial); Anthony v. Chapman, 65 Cal. 73, 2 Pac. 889.

3. Appellants contend that the finding by the court that plaintiffs' cause of action was not barred by the statute of limitations is not justified by the evidence. But there is no specification in the statement on motion for a new trial of any deficiency of evidence in respect to that finding.

Other points made are so obviously untenable that they merit no special consideration. I think the order should be affirmed.

We concur: TEMPLE, C.; BELCHER, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the order appealed from is affirmed.

DIMOND v. SANDERSON. (No. 15,359.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 13, 1894.)

NOTE BY HUSBAND TO WIFE—PRESUMPTION—UNDUE INFLUENCE—BURDEN OF PROOF.

Civ. Code, § 158, provides that husband or wife may enter into any transaction with the other, respecting property, which either might, if unmarried, subject "to the general rules which control the actions of persons occupying confidential relations with each other, as defined by the title on trusts." Section 2235 provides that all transactions between a trustee and his beneficiary, by which the former obtains any advantage, "are presumed to be entered into by the latter without consideration and under undue influence." Sections 1614, 1615, provide that a written instrument imports a consideration, and that the burden of showing want of it lies with the person seeking to avoid it. Held that, in an action on a note given by a husband to his wife, the burden was not on plaintiff to show sufficient consideration and absence of undue influence, and that no presumption of undue influence could arise until defendant showed want of consideration, or that an unfair advantage was obtained by plaintiff.

Action by Lydia E. Dimond against Lemuel A. Sanderson on a promissory note. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Jacob Samuels, for appellant. Andrew Thorne, for respondent.

HAYNES, C. This action was brought upon a promissory note made by the defendant June 1, 1888, whereby he promised to pay Lydia Emma Sanderson $6,000 at 24 months after date, with interest payable monthly. The complaint is in the usual form, except that it alleges "that Lydia Emma Sanderson was the name of the plaintiff prior to her marriage with Henry P. Dimond on the 25th day of June, 1890; that the name of the plaintiff is now Lydia Emma Dimond; and that the subject-matter of this action concerns and is the separate property of the plaintiff." Defendant's answer contained three defenses: (1) Admitted the making and delivery of the note, but denied that anything remained unpaid, due, or owing thereon, or that he was indebted thereon. (2) That he received no consideration for the note. And (3) that at the time the note was made the plaintiff and defendant were husband and wife; alleged certain misconduct of the wife; that her affections were alienated by another; that he gave the note under certain promises made by the plaintiff, which were not kept, and with a view to regain her affections, and upon no other consideration; that she remained with him but a short time; that he procured a divorce in December, 1889; and that plaintiff and Dimond intermarried in June, 1890. Upon the trial the plaintiff testified in chief that defendant was her former husband, and that certain payments, and no other, had been made upon the note. Upon cross-examination she stated her maiden name; that she was married to defendant in 1877; and that she and defendant were husband and wife until December 29, 1889. Plaintiff put the note in evidence and rested, and the defendant offered no evidence. Findings and judgment were in favor of plaintiff, and the defendant appeals from the judgment upon the judgment roll, and a bill of exceptions setting out the evidence above stated.

Appellant insists that the plaintiff failed to make out her case, because it appeared that she and defendant were husband and wife at the time the note was given, and that that fact threw upon her the burden of proving a sufficient consideration for the note, and that it was not given under undue influence. This contention he bases upon the following provisions of the Civil Code:

"Sec. 158. Either husband or wife may enter into any engagement or transaction with the other, or with any other person, respecting property which either might, if unmarried, subject, in transactions between themselves, to the general rules which control the actions of persons occupying confidential relations with each other, as defined by the title on trusts."

"Sec. 2235. All transactions between a trustee and his beneficiary during the existence of the trust, or while the influence of the trustee remains, by which he obtains any advantage from his beneficiary, are presumed to be entered into by the latter without sufficient consideration and under undue influence."

The only cases cited by appellant, involving the confidential relation of husband and wife, are Brison v. Brison, 75 Cal., at page 528, 17 Pac. 689, and Jackson v. Jackson, 94 Cal., at page 461, 29 Pac. 957. It is conceded, however, that neither of these cases decides the very point at issue, and that this court has never expressed an opinion upon the question here presented. In each of the cases above cited the husband had conveyed real estate to the wife, and sought to compel a reconveyance, and of necessity assumed the burden of proving the circumstances under which the conveyance was made, and which entitled them to a reconveyance. Laying aside the distinction between the subject of those actions and of this, if the action here had been brought by the husband to have the note canceled upon the ground that it was without consideration, or had been obtained fraudulently or by undue influence, these cases would have been in point. Appellant's contention would destroy the effect of another presumption declared by the Code, as well as an express provision as to the burden of proof. Section 1614 of the Civil Code declares that "a written instrument is presumptive evidence of a consideration;" and section 1615 provides that "the burden of showing a want of consideration sufficient to support an instrument lies with the party seeking to invalidate or avoid it." These, it is said, are general provisions, while sections 158 and 2235 of the Civil Code are special, and therefore control. But all these provisions should be harmonized and given effect, if possible, and this, we think, may be accomplished. Section 2231, Civ. Code, is as follows: "A trustee may not use the influence which his position gives him to obtain any advantage from his beneficiary." And the transactions referred to in section 2235, to which the "presumption" there mentioned attaches, are those by which the trustee "obtains any advantage from his beneficiary." The relation of husband and wife is not that of trustee and beneficiary, though it is a confidential relation, and transactions between them are to be considered in the same light and controlled by the same general rules affecting the confidential relation of trustee and beneficiary; but whether any particular transaction between husband and wife creates a trust, and, if so, which is the trustee and which the beneficiary, must depend upon the facts of the particular transaction involved in the controversy. The giving of the promissory note in question does not indicate a trust. It is an ordinary contract. Being in writing, the law presumes a sufficient consideration, though it may be in fact wholly without consideration. If it had been given in consideration of $6,000 then loaned by the wife, or for the amount of a debt then owing to her, no presumption of undue influence could arise to defeat the obligation, because it would not appear that she had obtained any "advantage" over the defendant; and the presumption arising from the written obligation that the consideration is sufficient repels the assumption that plaintiff obtained any advantage by the transaction. The moment it appears, however, that "an unfair advantage" has been obtained, the presumption that it was procured by undue influence arises out of the existence of the confidential relation of husband and wife; but this cannot appear until the presumption of a sufficient consideration, arising from the written obligation, has been overcome by proof. "Undue influence consists: (1) In the use, by one in whom a confidence is reposed by another, or who holds a real or apparent authority over him, of such confidence or authority for the purpose of obtaining an unfair advantage over him." Civ. Code, § 1575, subd. 1. In Brison v. Brison, 90 Cal. 336, 27 Pac. 186 (second appeal), in speaking of the above provision of the Code, it was said: "Such influence the law presumes to have been undue whenever this confidence is subsequently violated."

We think, therefore, that it must appear upon the face of the transaction, or by proof, that there was no consideration, or that the marital confidence was used to take an unfair advantage, or that this confidence was subsequently violated, before the burden is cast upon the plaintiff of sustaining the fairness and the consideration of the transaction against the presumption invoked by appellant. It is manifest that there may be a fair and honest transaction between husband and wife upon a good and sufficient consideration, and this may be one of them, while it is also true that the use of a confidential relation to obtain an unfair advantage is a fraud upon the other party to the transaction. Civ. Code, § 2234; Brison v. Brison, 75 Cal. 525, 17 Pac. 689; Id., 90 Cal. 336, 27 Pac. 186; Jackson v. Jackson, 94 Cal. 461, 29 Pac. 957. In the notes to the leading case of Huguenin v. Baseley, under the title "Husband and Wife" (2 White & T. Lead. Cas. Eq. pt. 2, p. 1215), it is said: "The relation of husband and wife obviously admits of an influence that may be carried beyond just bounds, but it seems that either of the parties to it may accept a benefit from the other without the necessity of proving that it was not obtained by undue influence. In Hardy v. Van Harlingen, 7 Ohio St. 216 (one of the cases cited in the above note), it was said: "The transaction will be viewed with a jealous eye, on account of the peculiar facilities enjoyed by the husband for the exercise of an improper influence. At the same time, undue influence is not to be presumed from the mere relation of the parties. It must be shown, either by direct proof, or by circumstances from which it may fairly be inferred." This quotation possibly states the rule more broadly than a fair construction of the Code provision requires; but we think that, before the presumption contended for can apply, it must appear that plaintiff, in obtaining the note sued upon, obtained some advantage over the defendant, and that the possession of the note is not of itself evidence that any advantage had been obtained. Upon appellant's theory, a sufficient answer in this case would have consisted merely of the allegation that at the time said note was made and delivered the plaintiff and defendant were husband and wife. Such answer would have been clearly insufficient. Here, however, in addition to this relation, defendant sets out facts tending to show that the obligation was unfairly obtained, and was without consideration. The true issue was therefore upon the implied replication to the answer setting up the new matter; but how the pleader could expect these affirmative allegations to aid the defense, without evidence in support of them, we do not understand. It may be that in this case defendant's error in relying absolutely upon the presumption insisted upon may prove to be a serious one, but that cannot change the law. For the purpose of shifting the burden of proof, or creating a presumption, his answer cannot take the place of evidence. We think the judgment should be affirmed.

BRODER et al. v. SUPERIOR COURT OF MONO COUNTY. (No. 15,512.)

WRIT OF PROHIBITION.

A writ of prohibition will not be granted to restrain a court from proceeding in a cause of which it has jurisdiction of the parties and the subject-matter.

In bank.

Application for a writ of prohibition by R. C. Broder and others to restrain the superior court of Mono county (W. H. Virden, judge) from proceeding with a cause. Denied.

Rich. S. Miner, for petitioners. P. Reddy and W. H. Metson, for respondent.

HARRISON, J. This is an application for a writ of prohibition, and is the counterpart of a proceeding between the same parties (No. 15,513, this day decided), 37 Pac. 143. At the same time that the superior court denied the petitioners' motion to enter judgment upon the findings that had been filed therein, it granted a motion of the defendants, and fixed a day for the trial of the cause, in accordance with its previous order of May 13th. Thereupon, the plaintiffs made application here for a writ of prohibition restraining the superior court from proceeding in the trial of the cause. That application must be denied, for the reason that the order of the court was made in a cause then pending before it, in which it had jurisdiction over the subject-matter and the parties thereto, and which had not been fully tried. If the court committed any error in the order, or should commit any error in its further proceedings during the trial of the cause, the plaintiffs have a complete and perfect remedy by an appeal from the judgment that may be rendered therein. The application for the writ is denied.

WESTERN GRANITE & MARBLE CO. v. KNICKERBOCKER et al. (No. 15,196.)

Easements—Passage of Light and Air—Division Fences—Constitutional Law—Rights of Adjoining Owners.

1. A landowner cannot acquire by user an easement over adjoining land for the passage of light and air.

2. Act March 9, 1885, regulating the height of division fences and partition walls in cities and towns, is a general law.

3. Act March 9, 1885, forbidding the erection of division fences and partition walls more than 10 feet high, in cities and towns, without the consent of the adjoining proprietor, relates solely to fences and walls erected on the boundary line resting partly on the adjoining land, and is constitutional.

4. The phrase "partition wall," as used in such act, means a wall used as a fence.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Santa Clara county; W. G. Lorigan, Judge.

Action by the Western Granite & Marble Company against Eugene Knickerbocker and others to enjoin the erection of a fence. From a decree granting the injunction, and from an order denying a new trial, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

William L. Gill, for appellants. D. W. Burchard and Francis E. Spencer, for respondent.

TEMPLE, C. The defendants appeal from the judgment, and from a refusal of a new trial. The appellants and respondent own adjoining lots in the city of San Jose. The complaint contains two counts. The first describes plaintiff's lot, and avers that it has erected a building thereon for its offices, which building has six windows in the northerly wall, through which, only, light and air are or can be admitted into that portion of the building, and, if such light and air be materially obstructed, said portion of plaintiff's building will become useless. Plaintiff has been using the building and office for more than six months. Defendant owns the adjoining lot which he occupies as a residence, but, until the grievances complained of, has never obstructed the passage of light and air over that part of his premises to plaintiff's building, and has no use whatever for that portion of his premises whereby said light and air would be obstructed. Nevertheless, on the 19th of June, 1891, defendant commenced to build along the division line a solid board fence, 20 feet high, in such manner as to prevent the passage of light and air into said windows. That the defendant has not obtained the permission of the city council to build such fence, nor has plaintiff ever consented thereto. That defendant will build the fence unless enjoined, and plaintiff will suffer irreparable injury therefrom. The second count adds an allegation that the building of the fence is wanton and malicious. The court found the facts as stated in the first count of the complaint, but did not find that defendant was acting wantonly or maliciously.

The doctrine that a proprietor may by user acquire an easement over adjoining land for the passage of light and air does not prevail in this country, and, if it did, the facts stated in the complaint would be insufficient to show such easement. Indeed, no facts are averred or found which would give plaintiff any right whatever in the lands of defendant. The sole ground, therefore, upon which the judgment is based, is that the proposed structure is unlawful, and, as it interferes with the comfortable enjoyment of plaintiff's property, it is a private nuisance, which may be enjoined or abated. It is claimed to be unlawful because it violates the provisions of the act of the legislature passed March 9, 1885, entitled "An act regulating the height of division fences and partition walls in cities and towns." The act consists of three sections, the first two of which read as follows:

"Section 1. It shall be unlawful for any owner of real property in any city or town in this state, or any person having possession thereof, to construct, erect, build, permit or maintain upon such premises any fence or partition wall which shall exceed ten feet in height, without first obtaining a permit to do so from the board of supervisors or city council of the city or town in which said fence or wall is to be erected and maintained.

"Sec. 2. No permit to construct or maintain any fence or division partition wall having a greater height than ten feet, shall be granted by the board of supervisors or city council of any city or town in this state, unless the person applying therefor, and to whom such permit is granted, shall first obtain and present to such board of supervisors or city council the written consent of the person or persons having ownership or possession of the adjoining premises affected thereby: provided, that where such fence or wall is constructed around a public garden, or place of public resort where an admission fee is charged, no signature or consent of adjacent owners shall be required."

The third section declares that a violation of section 1 shall be a misdemeanor, and provides a penalty.

It is contended that this act is unconstitutional.

1. It violates section 11 art. 11, of the constitution, which confers upon counties, cities, and towns the power to make and enforce such police regulations as are not inconsistent with general laws. This position must be that the act is not a general law. This position cannot be maintained. It operates alike upon all who are within the reason of the act. There are reasons in the nature of things why it should not affect some property.

2. It is claimed that it is unconstitutional, because it gives the owner of the adjoining property the power to prevent such a structure. If the act must be construed as rendering it unlawful for the owner to erect such a structure upon his own land, although along the line, I think it is obnoxious to this objection. Merely owning the adjoining lot does not give the proprietor an easement over the property of another for the passage of light and air; nor is it competent for the legislature to vest in such proprietor the power to prevent his neighbor from building such structures as he pleases, provided it is not a nuisance, and it is not such merely because it obstructs the passage of light and air. The legislature cannot thus create an easement in favor of certain proprietors over the lands of another, nor declare the usual and ordinary use of property a nuisance when such use infringes upon the legal rights of no one. The court found in this case that the plaintiff's windows open towards defendant's lawn. That this portion of his premises shall be secluded and private may be a matter of great importance to defendant. That he has the right to secure such privacy, if he can, by building obstructions on his own land, has always been recognized by the courts. In Chandler v. Thompson, 3 Camp. 80, Le Blanc, J., said "that, although an action for opening a window to disturb the plaintiff's privacy was to be read of in the books, he had never known such an action maintained, * * * and that the only remedy was to build on the adjoining land, opposite to the offensive window." Washburn lays down the rule as follows: "And the cases are uniform that such adjacent owner may deprive his neighbor of the light coming laterally over his land by the erection of a wall, for instance, upon his land, within the period of prescription, although he may do it for the mere purpose of darkening his neighbor's windows." It is well settled that he may build upon his property, although the effect may be to entirely close the windows of his neighbor. But, if the statute is capable of a construction which will bring it within the legislative power, it should be so construed, rather than in a way to render it unconstitutional. The power has been conceded to the legislature to provide for and regulate the construction of division fences. It may authorize their construction upon the boundary line; that is, resting partly upon the land of the adjoining proprietor. It may provide for the character of the fence which may be thus built, so as to make it certain that the adjoining proprietor, who may be compelled to contribute to the expense, thereby secures something of value. While there are expressions in the statute that might well be understood as prohibiting a structure inclosing defendant's lot more than 10 feet high, although not on the boundary line, still the language is entirely consistent with the other view; and we should therefore presume that it was the intent of the legislature to do that which it had the power to do.

It is said that the act forbids a partition wall as well as a fence, and that, under the statute, one may not build a house on his land extending to his boundary line without the consent of his neighbor. But understanding the law as simply applying to fences or walls built upon the line, and so resting partly upon the land of the adjoining proprietor, it takes nothing from the owner, for he could build no such wall upon his neighbor's land without his consent. But I think the phrase "partition wall," in the first section, and "division partition wall," in the second, must be understood as applied to a wall which is merely a fence. "Partition wall" is not a phrase which in legal technology is used to designate a wall used by adjoining owners as a party wall. A party wall is always, at least in this state, such by agreement. A division fence is provided for in our Code (section 841, Civ. Code). Confining the operation of the statute to division fences, I see no objection to a requirement that they shall not be of such a character as to injure the neighboring proprietor. If my neighbor enjoys the privilege of resting his fence upon my land, he may justly be prevented from inflicting special injury upon me by the structure which partly belongs to me, and to the expense of building which I may be made to contribute. The finding is to the effect that plaintiff's building is about 18 inches from the line; that defendant Knickerbocker commenced the construction of the fence "upon his said premises and upon said boundary line." The evidence shows that there was already upon the boundary line a division fence, and that defendant cut into this old fence to let in the frame work of his new structure, which is therefore upon the old fence, and partly upon the land of plaintiff. By the decree, defendant is enjoined from erecting or maintaining any fence more than 10 feet high "on the division line," and is required to remove all that portion of the "division fence which is more than ten feet high," and he is enjoined from "obstructing the light and air coming from his said premises into the windows of said granite and marble company by any division fence or wall more than ten feet high." This shows how the trial court regarded the statute. The judgment has no effect upon the right of defendant to erect any kind of a structure upon his own land. I think the judgment and order should be affirmed.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment and order are affirmed.

SOUTHERN PAC. R. CO. v. PIXLEY. (No. 15,105.)

CONTRACT FOR SALE OF LAND—SUIT TO FORECLOSE—VENUE.

Plaintiff alleged a contract to sell land in another county to defendant, whereby the latter was put in possession, and it prayed judgment against him for the sum due on the contract, and asked that, in case defendant failed to pay the same within a certain time, all his rights in said land by virtue of said agreement be foreclosed. Held that, as Const. art. 6, § 5, provides that all actions for the recovery of real estate or the enforcement of liens thereon shall be brought in the county in which the land is situated, the court had no jurisdiction of the action.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; John F. Finn, Judge.

Action by the Southern Pacific Railroad Company against Frank M. Pixley. There was a judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

Robert Harrison, for appellant. Joseph D. Redding, for respondent.

McFARLAND, J. This is an appeal by defendant from a judgment in favor of plaintiff. The action was brought in the superior court in and for the city and county of San Francisco. In the complaint it is averred that on September 17, 1887, plaintiff was the owner of certain described tracts of land situated in the county of San Diego, and that on said day plaintiff entered into certain contracts with defendant, by which the former agreed to sell and the latter agreed to buy said tracts of land. All of said contracts were alike, except that each referred to a different tract of land; and it is averred that the terms of each were that a certain part of the purchase money should be paid on the execution of the contract (which was done), and the balance, with interest annually, in manner as provided in said contract. The contracts provide that defendant may take possession of the lands therein mentioned, and averred that he did so take possession, and continues in possession. The complaint was filed in September, 1891, and it is averred that defendant has wholly failed and refused to make any of said deferred payments, although requested so to do. The prayer of the complaint is that it be adjudged that there is due from defendant to plaintiff a certain sum of money,—being the amount of said deferred payments; and that it be decreed that, if said amount be not paid within 30 days after the judgment, "then, and from that time, the defendant, and all persons holding said premises under said defendant shall be forever barred and foreclosed of all claim, right, or interest in said land and premises by virtue of said agreement, and be forever barred and foreclosed of all right to a conveyance thereof, and that plaintiff be let into the possession of said premises, and that said contracts be declared null and void." Defendant demurred to the complaint upon the ground, among others, that the court had no jurisdiction of the subject-matter of the action. The demurrer was overruled, and defendant filed an answer, and also a cross complaint, to which plaintiff answered. The judgment was substantially in accordance with the prayer of the complaint.

There is no necessity of discussing the questions which arose after the overruling of the demurrer to the complaint, for it is quite clear that the court had no jurisdiction of the subject-matter of the action. It is provided in section 5, art. 6, of the state constitution that "all actions for the recovery of the possession of, quieting the title to, or for the enforcement of liens upon real estate, shall be commenced in the county in which the real estate, or any part thereof, affected by such action or actions, is situated." Taking respondent's own view of the nature of the action, to wit, that it is for a "strict foreclosure," still it is clearly an action "for the enforcement of liens upon real estate," leaving out of view the prayer for the "recovery of the possession" of the lands. Moreover, the question has been decided adversely to respondent in Urton v. Woolsey, 87 Cal. 38, 25 Pac. 154, which was a case precisely like the one at the bar, except that the judgment in that case decreed a sale of the lands covered by the contract. See, also, Pacific Yacht Club v. Sausalito Bay Water Co., 98 Cal. 487, 33 Pac. 322; Fritts v. Camp, 94 Cal. 393, 29 Pac. 867. The jurisdiction of the action was therefore in the superior court of San Diego, and there was no jurisdiction thereof in the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco. The demurrer to the complaint should have been sustained. And, as the cross complaint was a mere dependency of the original complaint, it falls with the original. The judgment is reversed, with directions to the superior court to dismiss the action.

WAGNER v. HANSEN et al. (No. 15,403.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 13, 1894.)

MECHANIC'S LIEN—NOTICE OF CLAIM — ENFORCEMENT—VARIANCE.

1. Code Civ. Proc. § 1187, requires the statement for a mechanic's lien to be essentially true. Held, that a notice of lien was insufficient where it stated that the claim was for labor and materials, while only labor was furnished.

2. Where the complaint and claim of lien state that the work was done for an agreed price, and the evidence shows no price was agreed on, there is a fatal variance.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, San Francisco county; John Hunt, Judge.

Action by Ferdinand Wagner against Margaret Hansen and another to enforce a mechanic's lien. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Reversed.

Morrison & Foerster, for appellants. Henry H. Davis for respondent.

TEMPLE, C. This action was brought to enforce a mechanic's lien. Plaintiff had judgment, and defendant M. Hansen appeals from the judgment and from an order refusing a new trial. In his complaint plaintiff avers that he agreed with defendants "to furnish, and did furnish, the labor, at their special instance and request, in completing the foundation of said premises, build the chimneys, laying wall plates, laying out building, underpinning walls, building scaffolding, carrying brick, completing brick walls and brick foundation upon said dwelling house, upon said lot of land, and for all which said work, labor, and materials said defendants agreed to pay said plaintiff the sum of $163." It is again alleged that plaintiff agreed with defendants to perform the work and labor, and defendants "agreed to pay plaintiff the sum of $163 in the gold coin of the United States, but that no time was specified for the payment other than that said defendants were to pay plaintiff when said work was completed." In the notice of lien which is set out in the complaint, plaintiff, to show compliance with section 1187 of the Code of Civil Procedure, states the terms, time given, and conditions of his contract, as follows: "I, Ferdinand Wagner, am the contractor for the brick work and foundation and extra work, who, on the 9th day of April, 1889, as such contractor for the brick work and foundation, entered into a contract with said M. Hansen and Margaret Hansen, under and by which I completed said foundation and brick work and extra work, and the following is a statement of the terms, time given, and condition of said contract, to wit: 'I, Ferdinand Wagner, was to furnish the labor and materials in completing the foundation of said premises, build the chimneys, laying wall plates, laying out building, underpinning wall, building scaffolding, carrying brick, completing brick walls and brick foundation, for which I was to receive upon said completion of said work the sum of $163 in United States gold coin for said extra work,'"

The complaint was demurred to for insufficient facts and as being uncertain, also for ambiguity, and under each head it was specified that it could not be ascertained from the complaint whether plaintiff was to be paid $163 for work and materials or for work only, nor for what work he was to be paid; also, that the complaint averred that he was to be paid $163 for work only, while his claim of lien stated that he was to be paid $163 for work and materials furnished. The demurrer was overruled, and that ruling is now complained of. I think the demurrer should have been sustained. Such a notice and claim of lien does not contain a true statement of the terms of the contract, as required by section 1187 of the Code of Civil Procedure. There was no other statement as to the nature of plaintiff's demand in the claim of lien. There was no account of services rendered. The purpose of the record and statement must be to inform the owner, in case of a contractor and laborers rendering service under such contract, as to the extent and nature of a lienor's claim, to facilitate investigation as to its merits. Such a statement as the above would be misleading. The lienor is required to verify the statement. In all essential particulars it must be true. See, on this point, Frazer v. Barlow, 63 Cal. 71; Malone v. Mining Co., 76 Cal. 578, 18 Pac. 772; Eaton v. Malatesta, 92 Cal. 75, 28 Pac. 54. Respondent's only reply to this objection is that it is a mere technicality. Plaintiff's claim to a lien is a mere technicality. He is given a right upon condition that he complies with the statute, and there must be a substantial compliance with all these conditions to the right. Wood v. Wrede, 46 Cal. 637.

On the trial, plaintiff testified that, except as to one item, amounting to only $18, there was no agreed price for any work done; that there was no agreement to pay for plaintiff's labor, or for labor and materials, $163, or any other specified sum. No other evidence was given upon the subject. Defendants moved for a nonsuit on the ground that there was a fatal variance between the evidence and the statement in the complaint and in the claim of lien, in both of which it was stated that the work was done under a contract by which he was employed to do specified work at a price agreed upon. The nonsuit should have been granted. This was not only a variance, but it showed that the statute had not been complied with, and that plaintiff had acquired no lien. It is difficult to conceive of any terms of the contract of employment more material than this. In the case of a laborer employed by a contractor, the owner might well venture to pay a claim, where the amount had been agreed upon as between the laborer and the contractor, without further evidence than the lienor's oath. Had the statement shown that the value of the service was left open, the owner would be compelled to agree with the contractor, and perhaps with other lienors, as to the amount, or to pay such sum only as he could undertake to show was reasonable. There was no contractor here between the lienor and the owner, but the statute has made one rule for all, and that must be determined in view of all cases likely to arise under the statute. I think the judgment and order should be reversed.

We concur: SEARLS, C.; HAYNES, C.

HART v. CARNALL-HOPKINS CO. (No. 15,467.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 16, 1894.)

Justice of the Peace — Jurisdiction—Title to Land—When Put in Issue — Construction of Pleadings—Appeal to Superior Court.

1. Plaintiff alleged that defendant agreed to locate him on vacant government land, which it failed to do. Defendant admitted the contract, and alleged that it did locate plaintiff on vacant government land; "that defendant is informed and believes that plaintiff claims that said lands were not vacant government lands, but that they were in the possession of some other person; and that defendant alleges that they were not in the possession of some other person at the time of the location of plaintiff thereon." Held, that the title and possession of real property was not necessarily put in issue by the pleadings, so as to deprive a justice of the peace of jurisdiction.

2. On appeal from a justice of the peace to the superior court, the latter court, on determining that the justice had no original jurisdiction, because title to land was involved, may properly try such question of title as a court of original jurisdiction.

3. If the issue of title or possession of land is so involved that it must be decided in order to determine the case, although only "incidentally" involved, the superior court has original jurisdiction.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; J. C. B. Hebbard, Judge.

Action by James D. Hart against the Carnall-Hopkins Company for damages for nonperformance of a contract. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Wm. H. Chapman, for appellant. Edwin L. Forster, Fisher Ames, and S. V. Costello, for respondent.

VANCLIEF, C. This action was commenced in the court of a justice of the peace to recover damages consequent upon the alleged nonperformance of an agreement. It was alleged in the complaint that, in consideration of $100, the defendant agreed "to locate the plaintiff on certain vacant government land in the county of San Benito, state of California; but this plaintiff avers that said defendant failed to carry out and fulfill said contract and agreement, in that they [it] failed and neglected to locate this plaintiff on said or any lands pursuant to their said contract." A copy of the contract is set out in the complaint as follows: "San Francisco, July 22, 1892. Received of J. D. Hart, Esq., one hundred ($100) dollars, in full payment for ten (10) shares of the capital stock of the San Carlos Oil Company, and our services for locating the said J. D. Hart, Esq., on the limit of the number of acres allowed by the homestead law, not to exceed one hundred and sixty (160) acres. Said location to be on vacant government land in San Benito county, California. The Carnall-Hopkins Co., by Gibbs and Zimmerman, Mngs. C. A. Dep."

Those parts of the verified answer of the defendant pertinent to the questions raised on this appeal are substantially as follows: (1) Defendant alleges "that the determination of this action will necessarily involve the question of title and possession to real property, to wit, the title and possession of the northwest quarter of section 27, township 16 S., of range 10 E., county of San Benito, state of California." (2) Admits the execution of the instrument of July 22, 1892, above set out, and the receipt of $100 therein mentioned; and alleges "that defendant did locate plaintiff on vacant government land in San Benito county, Cal., and said location was on the northwest quarter of section 27, township 16 S., R. 10 E., in said county, and said property was at said time open to location, and no other person had any valid claim thereto. * * * That defendant is informed and believes that plaintiff claims that said lands were not vacant government lands, but that they were in the possession of some other person; and defendant alleges that they were vacant government lands, and not in the possession of any other person at the time of the location of plaintiff thereon; and, in consequence thereof, the determination of this action involves the title and possession of real property. * * * Wherefore defendant asks that judgment be rendered and entered in favor of defendant for its costs, that plaintiff take nothing herein, and that this court suspend all further proceedings herein." The docket of the justice of the peace shows that the action was tried January 3, 1893, the parties being represented by their attorneys; that three witnesses testified on behalf of plaintiff, and that no evidence was offered on behalf of the defendant; and that the cause was submitted by the parties, and that judgment was rendered in favor of the plaintiff for the sum of $165 damages and for costs. From this judgment the defendant appealed to the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco "upon questions of both law and fact." The cause was tried de novo in the superior court, where plaintiff again recovered judgment against the defendant for the sum of $168.85 and costs, from which, and from an order denying its motion for a new trial, the defendant appealed to this court.

Respondent moved in department 1 of this court to dismiss the appeal on the ground that the judgment of the superior court was final. On this motion an opinion denying it was written by Mr. Justice Paterson, concurred in by Mr. Justice De Haven. 35 Pac. 633. Mr. Justice Harrison concurred in the order denying the motion, but, after alluding to the averments of the complaint and answer above set out, said: "From these averments we cannot determine whether the title or possession of real property is necessarily involved. What significance must be given to the term 'locate' must depend upon the sense in which it was used by the parties to the agreement, and whether the property upon which the defendant claims to have 'located' the plaintiff in purported performance of its agreement was 'open to location,' or whether any person had a 'valid claim' thereto, may present questions involving the title or possession of real property. Upon the present motion we are limited to the averments in the pleadings, and cannot look at the evidence introduced in support thereof. If, upon the hearing of the appeal on its merits, it shall appear that the case before the court below did not involve the title or possession of real estate, we can then dismiss the appeal. But upon the matter as now presented the motion should be denied." Upon the whole record, including the evidence brought up in the bill of exceptions on which the motion for a new trial was made, the sense in which the word "locate" was used, understood, and acted upon by the parties is quite apparent. It is that the defendant was to lead or direct the plaintiff to, and point out to him, public land of the United States, which was subject and open to be settled upon and entered as a homestead by any person having the qualifications required by law to settle upon and enter such land. Of course, the settlement and entry were to be made by the plaintiff himself, according to the laws of the United States, which will not permit these acts to be done for him by another, and so the plaintiff understood and acted upon the contract. After the northwest quarter of section 27, township 16 S., had been pointed out to him by defendant, the plaintiff applied at the United States land office "to file upon" that quarter section under the homestead laws, and paid the requisite fees, etc., for that purpose; and it appeared from the evidence on the trial in the superior court that his only complaint was that the land was not subject or open to a homestead settlement or entry, for the reason that one Benvenga had made a prior settlement thereon, and was in possession thereof at the time the land was pointed out to him by defendant, and at the time he applied to the land office to file his application. On the trial in the superior court, it having been proved and admitted that the land had been selected and pointed out to plaintiff by defendant, and that it was government land, the question arose whether or not Benvenga was a settler upon and was entitled to the possession at the time the land was pointed out to plaintiff by defendant; and this question was material for the purpose of determining whether the defendant had complied with its contract to point out vacant public land, and was the principal question contested in the superior court, although it does not appear to have arisen or to have been tried in the justice's court; and I think, as suggested by Mr. Justice Harrison, that the pleadings do not show that title or possession of real property was or would be necessarily involved in the trial. The allegation of the complaint is that the defendant failed to point out ("to locate the plaintiff on") any land pursuant to the agreement; and, had the proof shown that defendant had failed to point out to plaintiff any government land, such proof would have disposed of the case in plaintiff's favor, regardless of any question of title or possession of real property; and, for aught that appears, such may have been the proof in the justice's court, where, as shown by the record, the defendant introduced no evidence whatever. Nor did it appear by the answer of the defendant that title or possession of real property was necessarily involved, but only that it would become involved upon the happening of certain contingent events, namely, if, in case of proof that defendant pointed out to plaintiff government land, the plaintiff should then claim, as defendant was informed and believed he would, that such land was not vacant government land, but was in the possession of some other person. Besides, the answer contained no prayer for a transfer of the cause to the superior court, nor does it appear that either of the contingent events above mentioned happened in the justice's court.

For aught that appears on the face of the record here, the justice of the peace did not exceed his jurisdiction in proceeding to try the case, nor in rendering final judgment, since it does not appear that the predicted contingent events occurred on the trial in the justice's court. Had they occurred during that trial, however, the justice, in obedience to section 838 of the Code of Civil Procedure, should have declined to hear evidence touching the question of possession thereby raised, and should have certified the pleadings (both written and oral), with a copy of his docket, to the superior court; and, if he had failed or refused to do so, the defendant might have appealed on questions of law alone, whereupon, by a statement according to section 975 of the Code of Civil Procedure, he could have shown the occurrence of the contingent events predicted in his answer, and that evidence had been admitted upon the question as to whether the land "was in the possession of some other person;" but in no other way could he have made it appear to the appellate court that the right of possession of real property became involved on the trial in the justice's court, since it did not so appear on the face of the pleadings, nor from the copy of the docket, or any other paper which the justice was required to transmit to the superior court. It is true, however, that if the pleadings had shown that the right of possession of real property was necessarily involved, or if the docket or other papers properly sent up by the justice had shown a want of jurisdiction for any other reason, there would have been no necessity for a statement (Southern Pac. R. Co. v. Superior Court, 59 Cal. 474); but in the case at bar no error appears in the docket or other papers sent up by the justice. Besides, instead of appealing on questions of law alone, the defendant appealed upon questions of both law and fact, thereby necessitating a trial de novo in the superior court; yet, when the case was called for trial in that court, and the plaintiff proceeded to offer evidence, defendant objected to any trial de novo on the alleged ground that the superior court had no jurisdiction, for the reason that the justice's court had not jurisdiction of the subject-matter originally, claiming that it appeared by the answer that a question as to the possession of real property was necessarily involved. The court overruled this objection, and proceeded with the trial, to which the defendant excepted.

The principal point urged here by appellant is that the superior court erred in overruling this objection, and in trying the case de novo, whereas it should have reversed the judgment of the justice's court, and remanded the cause, with instruction to certify a transcript thereof back to the superior court in the mode provided by section 838 of the Code of Civil Procedure. Conceding, for the sake of the argument, that the justice's court had not jurisdiction of the subject-matter, and that the superior court had no appellate jurisdiction to try the issue as to the possession of real property, yet the superior court had original jurisdiction of all questions pertaining to possession of real property, and, having jurisdiction of the parties, properly tried the issue as to whether Benvenga was entitled to possession of the land; that being the only material issue contested in the superior court. City of Santa Barbara v. Eldred, 95 Cal. 378, 30 Pac. 562. The defendant cannot be heard to deny that the superior court had jurisdiction of the parties, since it not only appealed the case to that court to be there tried on questions of both law and fact, but it voluntarily appeared and moved for judgment of reversal on the record which it had procured to be transmitted to that court, and also made its defense on the merits by offering evidence on the trial; and all this, without even suggesting that its appearance was limited to any special purpose. Nor, as before remarked, did it appear on the face of the transcript transmitted to the superior court that the right of possession of real property was necessarily involved, nor that any issue relating to such possession had been tried in the justice's court. For aught that appears, that issue was first developed in the course of the trial in the superior court, by proof that defendant had pointed out to plaintiff government land, representing it to be vacant, and by evidence on the part of plaintiff tending to prove that the land so pointed out was not vacant. When this issue was thus developed, the superior court was not obliged, as contended by appellant, to reverse the judgment of the justice of the peace, and to remand the case for the purpose of having it transferred to the superior court, according to section 838, Code Civ. Proc., in order to obtain original jurisdiction to try it, since the superior court had such original jurisdiction without this circuitous, dilatory, and vain process. Yet the relief asked here by appellant requires a still more circuitous and dilatory proceeding, which is that this court reverse the judgment and order of the superior court, and remand the cause, "with instructions to vacate the judgment of the justice's court, and order the papers certified to the superior court in accordance with section 838, Id.;" and all this, it is claimed, is necessary to give the superior court original jurisdiction of the subject-matter.

From the foregoing considerations it follows that the superior court obtained original jurisdiction of the issue as to the possession of Benvenga, and did not err in trying the case de novo; and, from this conclusion that the superior court properly exercised original jurisdiction, it further follows that this court has appellate jurisdiction, and should deny respondent's motion to dismiss the appeal. In opposition to this second conclusion, however, it is urged by respondent that possession of real property was only incidentally involved, and, therefore, the superior court had not original jurisdiction, and to this point respondent cites the case of Shroeder v. Wittram, 66 Cal. 636, 6 Pac. 737, in which the opinion of Mr. Justice McKee (in bank) seems to countenance his contention. But that opinion was concurred in by only one of the other justices, while two justices concurred in the judgment only, upon other grounds, and the chief justice wholly dissented. Therefore the opinion of Mr. Justice McKee on this point cannot be regarded as authoritative, and was not so considered in the later case of Copertini v. Oppermann, 76 Cal. 181, 18 Pac. 256. It is clear that it was developed by the plaintiff's evidence on the trial in the superior court that Benvenga's prior settlement and right of possession were conditions upon which plaintiff's right to recover depended, and that the court must have decided whether or not these conditions existed, in order to determine the case; and it appears that evidence tending to prove them was introduced by plaintiff. It follows that the possession of real property was necessarily involved, in the sense of section 4, art. 6, of the constitution, which gives this court appellate jurisdiction "in all cases at law which involve the title or possession of real estate," without excepting cases in which the title or possession is only incidentally involved. If the issue of title or possession is so involved that it must be decided in order to determine the case, the superior court has original, and this court appellate, jurisdiction, whether the involution may be said to be merely incidental or not. Copertini v. Oppermann, 76 Cal. 181, 18 Pac. 256; Holman v. Taylor, 31 Cal. 341; Code Civ. Proc. § 838; Const. art. 6, §§ 4, 5, 11.

On the hypothesis that the superior court did not err in trying the case de novo, counsel for appellant contend that the judgment should be reversed for errors occurring at the trial. Only two of these points are sufficiently plausible to merit consideration, one of which is that the court erred in sustaining plaintiff's objection to the introduction in evidence of the following letter, offered by defendant: "San Benito County, July 24, 1892. Gentlemen: I have located upon the N. W. quarter of section 27, T. 16 S., R. 10 E., and am well pleased with my location, and have found everything as represented to me by your agent. James D. Hart." Conceding that the court should have admitted this letter, I think the error was harmless. Plaintiff filed his application in the land office August 1, 1892, 6 days after writing this letter, and 23 days before Benvenga filed his application for the same land and gave notice of his contest, which he did on August 24, 1892. Before the letter was offered by defendant, plaintiff had repeatedly testified that until he received notice of Benvenga's adverse claim he was well pleased and fully satisfied with the land, and there was no evidence to the contrary. The proffered letter would have added nothing to plaintiff's testimoney and admissions on the trial.

It is also contended that there is no finding upon the issue tendered by the answer "as to the land being open and vacant." The finding is: "But that said defendant failed to carry out and fulfill its contract and agreement, in that it failed and neglected to locate this plaintiff on said land, or any land or lands, pursuant to its said contract; nor has said defendant, since the date of said contract and agreement, ever offered to locate said plaintiff on any vacant, unoccupied government land, in said San Benito county or elsewhere." This is a finding that no land upon which defendant located the plaintiff was vacant, and fully disposes of the issue. I think respondent's motion to dismiss the appeals should be denied, and that the judgment and order appealed from should be affirmed.

We concur: HAYNES, C.; BELCHER, C.

McFARLAND and FITZGERALD, JJ. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion respondent's motion to dismiss the appeals is denied, and the judgment and order are affirmed.

MARTIN v. EDE. (No. 15,360.)

STATUTE OF FRAUDS — AUTHORIZATION TO SELL LAND—REAL-ESTATE BROKERS—RIGHT TO COMMISSIONS—INTEREST.

1. An authorization in writing to sell land, signed by the party to be charged, is valid under Civ. Code, § 1624, subd. 6.

2. A broker's right to commissions for procuring a purchaser for land under an agreement therefor is not affected by the fact that he knew the principal had title to only five-sixths of the land.

3. One who is entitled to certain fixed damages, the right to recover which is vested in him on a particular day, is entitled to interest thereon from that day, except during such time as the debtor is prevented by law or by the creditor's act from paying the debt. Civ. Code, § 3287.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; John Hunt, Judge.

Action by Wheeler Martin against William Ede. From a judgment for plaintiff, and an order denying a new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

J. C. Bates, for appellant. Sullivan & Sullivan, for respondent.

SEARLS, C. This is an appeal from a judgment in favor of the plaintiff, Wheeler Martin, for $905.45, and from an order denying a motion by defendant for a new trial. The action was brought to recover the sum of $750 for commissions due to the plaintiff (who is respondent here) as a broker in effecting the sale of certain property belonging to appellant. The authorization under which the former acted is in writing, and in the following language: "San Francisco, August 3, 1887. Mr. Wheeler Martin: As you stated you could get thirty thousand dollars for the place you occupy on Market street, and if you can, we will sell at that price any time before the 1st day of September, 1887, and allow you two and one-half per cent. on said price, and, if no sale is made, no expenses made to us. Yours, truly, William Ede."

This authorization was never revoked by defendant. Subsequent to the execution of said paper, and on the 22d day of August, 1887, plaintiff found a purchaser for said lot of land, who was willing and able and offered to pay to said defendant said sum of $30,000 for said property. At the date of said agreement the legal title to said property stood in the name of defendant, but one Josephine Cory owned an equitable interest therein to the extent of one-sixth thereof, and was, at the date of the agreement, willing to sell. Plaintiff had heard that said Cory had an interest in the property, but was ignorant of the nature or extent of her claim. The testimony showed that Charles Grant was the party offering to purchase the property, and that he afterwards commenced an action for the specific performance of the contract to convey against the defendant Ede, which action was decided in favor of said defendant, appealed to this court, and the judgment affirmed. Grant v. Ede, 85 Cal. 418, 24 Pac. 890. Defendant set up two counterclaims to this action,—one for $261.50, on account of expenses incurred in the defense of the action of Grant v. Ede, which was not allowed; the other for $120, on account of four months' rent of a house, which was allowed by the court.

Appellant assigns the following errors as cause for reversal: (1) The court erred in ruling out the testimony of appellant proving his counterclaim of $261.50 on account of money expended in Grant v. Ede. (2) That plaintiff exceeded his authority in agreeing to sell the whole of the property, and is therefore liable for damages suffered by his principal by reason thereof. (3) Plaintiff exceeded his authority in agreeing to sell the whole of the property, and is not entitled to compensation. (4) The authorization, if valid, would only entitle plaintiff to recover five-sixths of $750, less counterclaims. (5) The alleged agreement authorizing plaintiff to sell the real estate was invalid, because not signed by both the parties to be charged. These contentions are so intimately connected and blended that they may properly be considered together.

The authorization by defendant was in writing, signed by him who is the party charged, and is not, therefore, obnoxious to the provision of subdivision 6 of section 1624 of the Civil Code.[1] The contention of appellant upon which the first error is assigned is founded upon the theory that the plaintiff knew that defendant owned only five-sixths of the property, and exceeded his authority in agreeing to sell the whole property, and is consequently liable for the damages sustained by defendant. A reference to the authorization will show the authority to plaintiff to get a purchaser for the land at $30,000, and, in the language of the agreement, "if you can, we will sell at that price any time before the 1st day of September, 1887, and allow you two and one-half per cent.," etc. As said on the appeal here in Grant v. Ede, 85 Cal., at page 420, 24 Pac. 890: "It does not say that Martin is authorized to sell and convey for the price named, nor is any form of deed or time of payment, or of delivery of possession specified. Martin was authorized simply to find a purchaser who would pay thirty thousand dollars, and if he should succeed in finding such purchaser he was to receive a commission of two and one-half per cent.;" citing Duffy v. Hobson, 40 Cal. 244; Treat v. De Celis, 41 Cal. 202; Armstrong v. Lowe, 76 Cal. 616, 18 Pac. 758. To entitle plaintiff to recover his commissions under the agreement, it was only necessary to show that in pursuance of his employment, and within the time specified therein, he found a purchaser ready and willing to purchase the property on the terms specified in the authorization. This he did beyond dispute. With the title or ownership of the property he had nothing to do, and his knowledge as to the title or the equitable estate of Josephine Cory therein was of no consequence. These were questions for the defendant to determine when he made the agreement. It is matter of common knowledge that, in the business world, men do frequently obtain what are termed options upon real property,—that is to say, the right to purchase,—and then employ brokers to negotiate a sale at an enhanced price, the title being all the while in others. Brokers sell tons of wheat for future delivery on account of principals who do not or may not own a kernel of that commodity, yet, in the absence of law prohibiting such sales, they are entitled to their commissions, and knowledge of the nonownership of their principals does not defeat their right to recover. A. may possess such knowledge as justifies him, in his judgment, in contracting to sell, or in contracting with a broker to sell for him, or to find a purchaser for, property which he does not own. If he does so without so guarding his agreement as to save himself in case of failure to secure title to the thing he has authorized to be sold, he cannot be heard to complain of the result of his own folly or lack of foresight. If A. is employed by B. to labor at a monthly stipend upon land which they both know B. does not own, and the services are performed in consonance with the contract, a recovery cannot be defeated by such knowledge on the part of A. As was said in Gonzales v. Board, 57 Cal. 225: "The plaintiff did all he was bound to do, under his contract, to entitle him to the remuneration agreed on. He procured a purchaser ready and willing to buy the property at the price for which the defendant proposed to sell it, which purchaser was acceptable to the defendant. The plaintiff could do no more. His right to compensation did not in any way depend, according to the contract, on the validity or invalidity of the defendant's title to the property." Phelps v. Prusch, 83 Cal. 628, 23 Pac. 1111; Phelan v. Gardner, 43 Cal. 311; Smith v. Schiele, 93 Cal. 149, 28 Pac. 857,—as well as many other cases in this court, are to like effect.

[1] Civ. Code, § 1624, subd. 6, provides that an agreement authorizing a broker to sell land for commission must be in writing, and signed by the party to be charged.

If it be affirmed that the plaintiff acted in excess of his power by giving to Grant an agreement for the sale of the property, the answer is: (1) There is no evidence of such agreement in the record or statement from which its contents can be divined. (2) If we may look to the case of Grant v. Ede, as reported, for its contents, it is there apparent that it was not of such a character as to bind defendant. It follows that plaintiff did not exceed his authority, and was not legally liable for the expenses incurred in Grant v. Ede, and hence that the exclusion of the record in that case and the evidence of those expenses on the part of defendant was proper.

The foregoing reasoning applies equally to the other errors mentioned, except as to the point made that the defendant was entitled to interest on the sum of $120 due him August 1, 1891, on account of rent. When that sum fell due the defendant, there was due to plaintiff, on account of interest on his demand of $750, a sum in excess of $120, hence the court properly applied the $120 on the interest then due the plaintiff. Plaintiff's demand was due September 1, 1887, and was capable of being made certain by computation. It therefore drew interest under section 3287 of the Civil Code.[2] The judgment and order appealed from should be affirmed.

We concur: VANCLIEF, C.; BELCHER, C.

WATSON v. SUTRO et al. (No. 15,213.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 19, 1894.)

REVIEW ON APPEAL.

Where there is a substantial conflict in the evidence the findings of the trial court will not be disturbed.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; J. C. B. Hebbard, Judge.

Action by William C. Watson against Adolph Sutro and others for partition. From that part of the judgment that allows plaintiff $5,000 attorney's fee, defendant Sutro appeals. Affirmed.

Lloyd & Wood and B. McKinne, for appellant. Stanly & Hayes, for respondent.

GAROUTTE, J. This is an appeal by Adolph Sutro from that portion of a judgment in partition proceedings that awards to the plaintiff in the action an attorney's fee of $5,000. In the trial of the action of partition the amount of the respective equitable interests of plaintiff and appellant, Sutro, to the realty involved in the litigation was warmly contested, and as to such matters the litigation resulted adversely to this appellant. At the hearing the report of the referees was acquiesced in by all the parties in interest, and the only contest that was made was as to the amount which should be allowed to plaintiff, under section 796 of the Code of Civil Procedure, for reasonable counsel fees expended by him for the common benefit. The court, after hearing the testimony of 19 witnesses, fixed the fee at $5,000, and determined that defendant Sutro's proportion was $4,828.25, and the propriety of this order is the sole question involved in this appeal.

Section 796 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides that: "The costs of partition, including reasonable counsel fees expended by the plaintiff, or either of the defendants, for the common benefit, fees of referees and other disbursements must be paid by the parties respectively entitled to share in the lands divided, in proportion to their respective interests therein. * * * When, however, litigation arises between some of the parties only, the court may require the expenses of such litigation to be paid by the parties thereto, or any of them." The fees of the referees, and all other costs in the case, except the counsel fee of plaintiff, have been adjudged without dispute, to be paid in proportion to the several interests of the parties. There is a sharp conflict in the evidence as to what would be a reasonable attorney's fee for the labor performed, and under these circumstances we will not disturb the judgment. The amount of the attorney's fee was a question of fact, essentially within the province of the trial court to determine from the evidence; and to disturb the trial court's finding in this regard, where, as in this case, there is a substantial conflict in the evidence, would be a trespass upon well-settled principles long recognized by this court. Thomas P. Stoney, attorney for plaintiff, stated in detail the character and amount of the services he had performed as attorney for plaintiff in the action, and he further testified that such services were reasonably worth $10,000; and this testimony was corroborated by various other eminent members of the bar, as to the value of the services rendered. We think this evidence is amply sufficient to support the judgment. While it is true the witness Stoney did not segregate the value of the services rendered by his firm in furtherance of the personal interests of his client in contesting the claim of title from the value of the services rendered for the common good in the matter of the partition proceedings proper, still the amount and character of labor performed for the common benefit was in evidence before the court; and upon that evidence alone, without the advice of experts, the court had the power to fix the amount of the fee, and we are not prepared to say from the record before us that the amount awarded is too large. It was said in Pennie v. Roach, 94 Cal. 520, 29 Pac. 956, and 30 Pac. 106: "It is true three witnesses for the plaintiff, equally eminent in the profession, testified that his services were worth only $75,000; but it was for the court to decide the conflict, and in such cases its ruling will not be interfered with by the appellate court unless there is a clear abuse of discretion;" citing Stuart v. Boulware, 133 U. S. 78, 10 Sup. Ct. 242. We see no abuse of the court's discretion in this case. For the foregoing reasons, it is ordered that the judgment be affirmed.

[2] Civ. Code, § 3287, provides that every person who is entitled to recover damages certain, or capable of being made certain by calculation, and the right to recover which is vested in him upon a particular day, is entitled also to recover interest thereon from that day, except during such time as the debtor is prevented by law, or by the act of the creditor, from paying the debt.

I concur: VAN FLEET, J.

HARRISON, J. I concur in affirming the judgment. I do not, however, consider that the fact that there was a conflict of evidence upon the subject of compensation is a reason for its affirmance. The court below was authorized to ascertain what services had been rendered by the plaintiff for the common benefit, including those of his counsel, and to determine the compensation which would be proper to allow him therefor. This is a matter, however, which the court is to determine in the exercise of its judicial discretion, and not necessarily in accordance with the testimony of witnesses. It may fix the compensation to be allowed, in accordance with the practice of the court, and its own knowledge of the usual compensation for such services, without calling to its aid the views and experience of other attorneys, or it may ask their aid, as expert witnesses, for its enlightenment. Yet, if it does call them to its assistance, it is not required to make its decision in accordance with their testimony, but may disregard their testimony entirely. Like determining the amount to be allowed for counsel fees in the foreclosure of a mortgage, or in a suit for divorce, the court is called upon to exercise a judicial discretion in consideration of all the circumstances in the individual case; and, even though the testimony of the witnesses whose opinion it may ask will sustain it in the amount which it allows, yet, if it should appear that it had abused the discretion intrusted to it, its action should be disregarded in this court as readily as an abuse of its discretion in any other respect. The action of a trial court in any matter depending upon its discretion is not conclusive, though it is approved by bystanders, or even by witnesses under oath. Judicial discretion—"discernere per legem"—is only the application of rules of law to the circumstances of the case in which the discretion is exercised; and, whenever a question depends upon the exercise of this discretion, it is as open to review as any other question. As error, however, is never to be presumed, the action of the court in the exercise of its discretion must be assumed to have been correct, and the burden is always upon the appellant to make it clearly appear that the court committed error; otherwise, its action must be affirmed. In the present case the court was called upon to determine the amount of labor that had been rendered by the plaintiff's counsel for the common benefit of all parties to the action, and fixed the amount of compensation to be allowed therefor at the sum of $5,000. While this would appear to be an unusual compensation to be allowed in an ordinary action of partition, and while the amount estimated by the several witnesses as proper to be allowed varied from $2,000 to $15,000, it cannot be said, in view of the character of the action, the time occupied in its trial, the questions presented in the case, the value of the property involved, and the services shown to have been rendered by the plaintiff's attorney, that the sum fixed by the court is so grossly disproportionate to its value as to constitute an abuse of its discretion.

COBURN v. TOWSEND et al. (No. 15,246.)
SAME v. BROOKS et al. (No. 15,247.)
SAME v. JOSSELYN et al. (No. 15,248.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 26, 1894.)

Condemnation Proceedings — Action on Bond —Counsel Fees.

1. No action lies against the sureties on a condemnation bond for damages already recovered in an action of trespass against the principal.

2. Counsel fees cannot be allowed on a general judgment for defendant in condemnation proceedings.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; Walter H. Levy, Judge.

Actions by Loren Coburn against M. D. Towsend and others on bonds. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Thornton & Merzbach, for appellant. Fox & Kellogg, for respondents.

McFARLAND, J. These cases are substantially alike, and will be considered together. Each action was against the defendants as sureties upon a bond in certain condemnation proceedings. The bond was given in pursuance of an order of the court in the condemnation proceedings that the plaintiff therein might, at the commencement of said proceedings, take possession of lands claimed by plaintiff in these present actions and sought therein to be condemned, upon giving an undertaking as provided by section 1254 of the Code of Civil Procedure as it stood prior to 1880. The court in each case rendered judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals in each case from the judgment, upon the judgment roll alone.

The judgments must be affirmed. In the first place, the provision of the Code, and of the statute which preceded the Code, under which the orders for possession were made in the condemnation proceedings, was held to be and was unconstitutional, and the bonds or undertakings here sued on were void. Water Works v. Sharpstein, 50 Cal. 284; Sanborn v. Belden, 51 Cal. 266; Vilhac v. Railroad Co., 53 Cal. 209. In the second place, it is found by the court that plaintiff commenced a certain action against Charles Goodall and others, in which he recovered damages in the sum of $10,000, which was paid; and "that the said damages so recovered by the said plaintiff, Coburn, and so paid as aforesaid, cover all the alleged damages sued for in this action and other damages (except the counsel fees hereinbefore stated), and that the alleged possession and trespass in said action of Coburn vs. Goodall covers and includes all the alleged possession and trespass for which recovery is sought to be had in this suit, and that said damages were recovered by the said plaintiff upon the claim that the said alleged use and possession named in the complaint herein as being held against said Coburn was really and in fact the possession of said defendants in said suit of Coburn vs. Goodall." This being so, appellant cannot again recover from the sureties what was paid by the principals. As to the counsel fees, in the first place, it does not appear that they were withdrawn or were not litigated and determined in the case of Coburn v. Goodall; and, in the second place, we do not know of any law that allows counsel fees in a general judgment for a defendant in a proceeding for condemnation. Mitchell v. Hawley, 79 Cal. 301, 21 Pac. 833. We see no reason for a reversal of the judgment. The judgment appealed from in each of the above cases is affirmed.

DE HAVEN and FITZGERALD, JJ. We concur in the judgment on the second ground discussed in the opinion of Mr. Justice McFARLAND.

McDOWELL'S ESTATE v. HIS CREDITORS. (No. 18,227.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 26, 1894.)

HOMESTEAD—WHAT CONSTITUTES.

A building used primarily as an hotel cannot be regarded as a homestead, though the owner and his wife reside there for the purpose of carrying on the business. 35 Pac. 1031, affirmed.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Siskiyou county; J. S. Beard, Judge.

In the matter of the estate of J. E. McDowell, an insolvent debtor. From an order refusing to set apart to him an hotel as a homestead, he appeals. Affirmed.

For prior report, see 35 Pac. 1031.

Warren & Taylor (T. M. Osmont, of counsel), for appellants. L. F. Coburn, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. Upon further consideration of this cause in bank, we are satisfied with the conclusion reached by department 1 in its opinion filed March 2, 1894 (35 Pac. 1031), and, for the reasons stated in said opinion, the judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

PEOPLE et al. v. MARIN COUNTY et al. (No. 15,426.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 26, 1894.)

DEDICATION OF HIGHWAY—EVIDENCE—EASEMENT AND SERVIENT ESTATE—MERGER IN STATE—DIRECTORS OF STATE PRISON—POWERS.

1. The fact that the board of directors of the state prison have, by the constitution, charge of the prison, does not authorize them to close a public highway passing through the prison grounds because it facilitates the escape of prisoners.

2. Evidence that the owner of land petitioned the county supervisors to declare a road over his land a highway; that the board did so, though without following the statutory requirements; and that the road was used and worked by the public for 25 years as a public highway, —will sustain a finding that there was a dedication and acceptance of the road.

3. The easement which the public has in a highway does not merge in the fee of the servient estate when acquired by the state.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Marin county; F. M. Angellotti, Judge.

Action by the people of the state of California on the information of the attorney general and others against the county of Marin and others. There was a judgment for defendants, and plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Atty. Gen. Hart (Aylott R. Cotton, of counsel), for appellants. Jas. W. Cochrane and Hepburn Wilkins, for respondents.

SEARLS, C. This action is brought by the people of the state of California upon the information of the attorney general, and by W. E. Hale, warden of the state's prison at San Quentin, Cal., and the board of state prison directors, as plaintiffs, against the county of Marin, the supervisors of said county, and J. Edwards, as road master, defendants, to restrain them from interfering with certain gates and obstructions placed by plaintiffs upon a certain road running to, upon, and across the state prison grounds, and alleged to be a private road. A restraining order issued in the case. Defendants answered, averring that the road from San Rafael to Point San Quentin is a public highway, and runs across and over the premises described in the complaint, viz.

the state prison grounds, and admit their intention to remove gates and obstructions therefrom. The cause was tried by the court without the intervention of a jury, written findings filed, and judgment entered thereon in favor of the defendants, from which judgment, and from an order denying a motion for a new trial, plaintiffs appeal.

The court found, among other things, that the state of California is, and ever since the 25th day of August, 1869, has been, the owner in fee of the tract or parcel of land described in the complaint, subject, however, to the easement or right of way in the public of the public road and highway known as the "County Road," leading from San Rafael to Point San Quentin, which said road runs across said tract of land, and which said road is now, and has been for over 35 years last, a public road and highway of the county of Marin, and during all of said times has been used and traveled by the public as a public road and highway by all persons traveling from the town of San Rafael to the village of San Quentin, in the county of Marin, except that in the year 1891 and January, 1892, when W. E. Hale, warden of the state prison at San Quentin, Cal., placed gates and obstructions across the same; that the said county road is not, and never was, a private road, but that the same has been, ever since the year 1854, one of the public county roads of Marin county.

The first point made by the learned counsel for the people seems an extraordinary one. It is, in substance, that, conceding the road in question a public highway, running through the prison grounds, still, as the state prison is, by virtue of section 1573 of the Penal Code, under the charge, control, and superintendence of a board of directors, consisting of the governor, lieutenant governor, and secretary of state, which board, under section 2 of article 10 of the constitution, it is provided shall have charge of the state prison, they may, when they deem it expedient in the control of the prison, authorize the closing of the road; and the board having, by resolution, ordered the highway closed, it ceased to be a public road. The record shows that the state is seised in fee of a tract of land consisting of say 150 acres, bounded in part by the Bay of San Francisco, upon which the state prison is constructed, with necessary buildings and walls for the detention of prisoners, and with dwellings, guard houses, etc., for the accommodation of officers, guards, and attachés, across which tract of land the highway in question runs. Under the allegations of the complaint there was evidence tending to show that a portion of the prisoners perform labor and render services outside the prison walls, and that the proximity of the highway, and the right of the public to travel thereon, enables evil-disposed persons to secrete arms, ammunition, citizens' clothing, opium, etc., upon the grounds, where there are procured by prisoners, and by means whereof the escape of prisoners is facilitated, and the good order and discipline of the prison endangered. Conceding all these objections, and it is not perceived how it strengthens the case of the appellant. If the road in question is a public highway, it is so by virtue of having been dedicated to the public, and abandoned as such by B. R. Buckelew, the owner of the land (under whom, by sundry mesne conveyances, the state holds title), about 1854, and by reason of having been accepted by the public and used as a highway long before any title vested in appellant. The authority to close up, and alter public highways outside of municipalities is conferred upon the board of supervisors of the several counties of the state, and can only be exercised through the instrumentalities and in the mode prescribed by law. The easement of the public in and to a public highway is as sacred as any other property right, and cannot be divested by the action of the owner of the servient tenement in which it exists. No power is given, either by our constitution or laws, to the board of prison directors, to abolish public highways. The Bay of San Francisco and the highway in question may each afford opportunities for evil-disposed persons to come within proximity to the prison for nefarious purposes; and the prison authorities had as much authority to interdict travel upon the one as the other; in other words, it can do neither. It follows that the judgment is supported by the findings. We think the motion for a new trial was properly overruled.

The only question of practical importance relates to the sufficiency of the evidence to sustain the findings of dedication of the road as a public highway by B. R. Buckelew, the owner of the land over which it passed, and its acceptance by the public, or by the constituted authorities of Marin county. Dedication is the setting apart of land for the public use, and an essential requisite to its validity is that it must be of such a character as to conclude the owner. There are two kinds of dedication, viz. statutory and common-law dedication. Of statutory dedication nothing will be said beyond stating the general rule, which is that, in order to constitute a valid statutory dedication, the provisions of the statute, whatever they may be, must be substantially complied with. Common-law dedications are, for convenience of description, frequently subdivided by law writers into two classes,—express dedications and implied dedications. The substantial difference between the two consists in the mode of proof. In the former case the intention to appropriate the land to public use is manifested by some outward act of the owner manifesting his purpose, while in the latter it is usually by such acts or conduct not directly manifesting the intention, but from which the law will imply the intent.

In Waugh v. Leech, 28 Ill. 488, it was said: "The authorities show that dedications have been established in every conceivable way by which the intention of the party could be manifested." And it may be said generally: "If the donor's acts are such as indicate an intention to appropriate the land to the public use, then, upon acceptance by the public, the dedication becomes complete." Elliott, Roads & S. p. 92. The question of intent is paramount, and, without such intent expressly appears, or can be fairly inferred from the acts of the donor, there is no valid dedication. Turning to the evidence set out in the record, and it appears that in 1854 B. R. Buckelew owned the land described in the complaint, and had a sawmill at Point San Quentin; that he needed a road to get to it, and that this road was laid out and graded from the town of San Rafael to Point San Quentin in 1854 or earlier, and was the only traveled road between the two points, and was used by the public generally. The widow of B. R. Buckelew testified as follows: "My husband always intended it for a public road. He said so before the year 1855." And again: "He always intended a road there, and he was obliged to have one to get to the sawmill. * * * He wanted it as a public road, so that every one could travel on it." William Patton testified, in substance, that in 1858 the road was a good wagon road, over which the stages from Point San Quentin ran to San Rafael; that it was graded so that two teams could pass, and was called the "County Road." A number of other witnesses had known the road since 1870 as a public highway in charge of the county officers, who kept it in repairs, built bridges, culverts, etc. Convicts from the prison worked on it under the road overseer, working out the poll tax of the officers and attachés of the prison. There was also evidence tending to show that prior to August 6, 1855, B. R. Buckelew filed with the board of supervisors a petition asking that the road be declared a public highway. This petition was lost or mislaid. On the 6th day of August, 1855, an order appears in the record of the board of supervisors reciting the petition of Buckelew for this road from Point San Quentin to San Rafael as being presented. On February 4, 1856, the board of supervisors of Marin county entered an order in their records, which recites that, in pursuance of the petition of a large number of the citizens of Marin county, praying for a public road between the town of San Rafael and the state prison in said county, etc., it appearing that a public road is necessary and important for the convenience of the citizens of said county, "it is hereby ordered by said board of supervisors that the road now leading from San Rafael to said state prison be and the same is hereby declared to be one of the public roads and highways of said county." The order required the county surveyor to survey the road, and appointed viewers; also that a copy of the order be served upon said Buckelew forthwith, "to ascertain whether he has any objections to the above road." The road was surveyed by the county surveyor, who shortly afterwards saw Buckelew, and told him what he had done, whereupon the latter said it was all right. The field notes of this survey were recorded in the office of the county surveyor, but, so far as appeared, no plat was ever recorded. That the general public used the road as a public highway is established by the evidence beyond reasonable doubt. It is said that all of this testimony fails to establish a statutory dedication of the highway. This may be conceded, but "in many instances a dedication invalid as a statutory one will be a good common-law dedication." Elliott, Roads & S. pp. 85, 86. When Buckelew petitioned the board of supervisors to declare the road a highway, it was evidence of an intent on his part to dedicate it to the public use; and when the board of supervisors so declared it, although the proceeding was not accompanied by all the forms required by the statute to constitute it a highway in a statutory sense, still it was evidence of an acceptance by the board for the public as such highway; which evidence, coupled with its uses for a highway, and its improvement as such by public authority, is ample to support an acceptance. Elliott, Roads & S. pp. 115-118. Section 2619 of the Political Code, as it existed prior to February 28, 1883, provided that "all roads used as such for a period of more than five years are highways." In Bolger v. Foss, 65 Cal. 250, 3 Pac. 871, this court said, alluding to the section quoted supra: "This is more than a declaratory law to the effect that the fact of use of a road as a public road for more than five years shall be evidence, prima facie or conclusive, of dedication by the owners of the lands through which it runs. It is in the nature of a statute of limitations, which gives to the public the right to use the road as a highway, in case it has been so used." Since 1883, section 2618 of the Political Code reads as follows: "In all the counties of this state public highways are roads, streets, alleys, lanes, courts, places, trails and bridges, laid out or erected as such by the public, or if laid out or erected by others, dedicated or abandoned to the public, or made such in actions for the partition of real property." In any view we take of the case, the evidence in support of the findings establishes the fact that the road in question, as early as 1856, was dedicated as a public highway and accepted by the public as such, and by their agents, the supervisors of the county of Marin, and ever since has remained, and now is, a public highway.

The objection that it is not shown to have any specific width is without force in this action, which involves no question as to its width, or of encroachment upon it as a highway, but the simple question whether it is in fact a highway. It may be said, however, that where the right of the public is acquired by user, the boundaries of the road are generally ascertained by reference to the user. Where there is a statute fixing the width of all highways, it has been said that the dedication to the purpose of a highway will be presumed to be the width fixed by the statute; and, where discretion is given to certain officers to determine the width of a highway, such discretion will not be interfered with, except in cases of fraud or oppression. Humboldt Co. v. Dinsmore, 75 Cal. 604, 17 Pac. 710.

So, too, the theory is advanced that when in 1869 the state became the owner of the land over which the road is located, the easement, if any, which previously existed therein being in the state, was merged in the estate which the state acquired to the land. As applied to the law of real property, it may be stated as a general rule that where a greater estate and a lesser coincide and meet in one and the same person in the same right, without any intermediary estate, the lesser is immediately annihilated, or, in the law phrase, is said to be merged—that is, sunk or drowned—in the greater. In equity the rule is different. Rumpp v. Gerkens, 59 Cal. 496. If a trustee holds a leasehold estate in a piece of land in trust for A., or in trust for a specific purpose, and should receive a conveyance of the reversion in the same land in his own right or in trust for B., it could not be said the leasehold estate was merged, because they would not vest in the same right. In the present case, if it can be said the state holds the easement to all the highways within its boundaries, which, under our statutes, cannot, we think, be upheld, still, if it does so hold, it is as the representative of the people, and in trust for the objects of their creation, viz. to enable the people to pass and repass over such roads at will; and such easements are not held in the same right as the title of the state to lands which it has purchased. To attempt to apply the doctrine of merger to such a case is to wrest it from the objects of its creation and existence. In strictness, all public highways belong to the state, which holds them for public use subject to legislative control. In this commonwealth their custody and control outside of municipalities is confided to the supervisors of the several counties in which they are located. The legislature may, by general statute, legislate in reference to them. It has provided, by section 2621 of the Political Code, that "a road laid out and worked, and used as provided in this chapter, shall not be vacated or cease to be a highway until so ordered by the board of supervisors of the county in which said road may be located." This statute is binding upon the state as well as individuals. The general rule is that "whoever takes an estate upon which a servitude has been imposed holds it subject to the same servitude, and in the same manner, as it was held by his grantor." Washb. Easm. p. 7. In Flagg v. Flagg, 16 Gray, 175, it was said that a private way, established under a Massachusetts statute for the use of one or more individuals of a town or proprietors therein, is not discontinued by the unity in one person of title to and possession of all the land through which the road is located. The reasons for a like doctrine in case of a public highway in which the general public has an interest are even stronger.

The objections to evidence are either untenable or relate to testimony which, upon the finding that the road in question was and is a public highway, are wholly unimportant.

The question of costs need not be considered, for the reasons: (1) The record fails to show any objection to costs, if any were allowed by the court, either before or after judgment; and there is no bill of exceptions showing any ruling upon the question of costs. (2) While the court below found as a conclusion of law that the defendants were entitled to costs, the judgment does not include costs, and it may well be that defendants waived the recovery thereof. The judgment and order appealed from should be affirmed.

We concur: VANCLIEF, C.; BELCHER, C.

In re HUNT. (No. 21,143.)

Custody of Children.

The father and mother being the natural guardians of a child, can only be deprived of the custody of its person by a proceeding under Civ. Code, § 203.

In bank.

Application for habeas corpus by Henry Hunt in behalf of Henry Hunt and Lizzie Hunt, his minor children. Granted, and children discharged from custody.

John R. Aitken, for petitioner. Mr. O'Grady, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. The children above named having been brought before the court by writ of habeas corpus, and, the court being fully advised as to the matter, it is hereby ordered that said minor children be discharged from the custody of Frank Kane, and restored to the custody of the petitioner. The father and mother, being the natural guardians of a child, can be deprived of the custody of its person only by a proceeding under section 203 of the Civil Code. The proceeding by which the superior court has committed these children to the custody of a stranger is wholly unauthorized.

GAROUTTE, J. I concur in the judgment, but am not prepared to coincide with the majority of the court upon the important question stated in the last clause of the foregoing opinion without an opportunity for further examination.

CORPORATIONS—ELECTION OF PRESIDENT.

Since Civ. Code, §§ 307, 312, provide that in a corporation election every stockholder must vote his shares in person, or by proxy in writing, a president of a corporation cannot enforce a verbal agreement by the stockholders that he shall continue as president for two years longer, the agreement providing no way for its enforcement. Beatty, C. J., dissenting.

PER CURIAM. Upon further consideration of this case in bank, we are satisfied with the opinion rendered in department (35 Pac. 1045), and, with the conclusion therein reached, and for the reasons given in said opinion, the judgment is affirmed.

LANCASTER et al. v. MAXWELL et al. (No. 15,017.)

NOTICE OF APPEAL.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 940, providing that notice of appeal must be served on every "adverse party," an appeal (in an action by a subcontractor against the original contractor and the landowner to enforce a mechanic's lien) by the landowner from a judgment ordering the sale of the land (any deficiency to be docketed as a personal judgment against the contractor) will be dismissed where no notice thereof is served on the contractor.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; Eugene R. Garber, Judge.

Action by J. R. Lancaster and others against Thomas Maxwell and C. B. Gregory. There was a judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant Gregory appeals. Dismissed.

Ash & Mathews, for appellant. Wickliffe Matthews and A. D. Lemon, for respondents.

McFARLAND, J. This is an action to foreclose certain mechanics' liens. Defendant Gregory is the owner of the buildings involved, and defendant Maxwell was the original contracter. Both defendants suffered default. The liens sued on grew out of labor and materials done for and furnished to the contractor, Maxwell. By the judgment it was decreed that the land, buildings, etc., of Gregory be sold, and the porceeds appropriated to the payment of the amounts found due upon the liens, and that if such proceeds should not be sufficient to pay all the liens "the deficiency thereof shall be docketed as a personal judgment against said defendant Thomas Maxwell." The defendant Gregory appeals from the judgment, and also from an order denying her motion to set aside her default, made upon the grounds of surprise, excusable neglect, etc. The notice of appeal was not directed to or served upon the codefendant, Maxwell, and, for that reason, respondents move to dismiss the appeal.

The court did not abuse its discretion in refusing to set aside the default; and while we have looked through the transcript and briefs, and see no reason why the judgment should, under any view, be reversed, it is not necessary to discuss the other points suggested, because we think that the appeal should be dismissed. A notice of appeal must be served on every "adverse party." Section 940, Code Civ. Proc. And adverse parties are those who are "interested in the judgment, and would be affected by its reversal." O'Kane v. Daly, 63 Cal. 319. "Every party whose interest in the subject-matter of the appeal is adverse to, or will be affected by, the reversal or modification of the judgment or order from which the appeal has been taken, is, we think, an 'adverse party' within the meaning of these provisions of the Code, irrespective of the question whether he appears upon the face of the record in the attitude of plaintiff or defendant or intervener." Senter v. De Bernal, 38 Cal. 637. And it is quite clear that in the case at bar the interest of Maxwell would be "affected by the reversal" of the judgment. Appellant seeks particularly a reversal of that part of the judgment which decrees her property to be sold to satisfy the liens, and it is apparent that such reversal would be adverse to the interest of Maxwell. The appeal is dismissed.

PEOPLE v. STOKES. (No. 21,068.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 23, 1894.)

CRIMINAL JURISDICTION — DIVISION OF COUNTY — EFFECT ON PENDING PROSECUTION—MISCONDUCT OF JURY—READING NEWSPAPER ARTICLES.

1. Where, after a prosecution is commenced, the part of the county in which the offense was committed is organized into a new county, such new county has jurisdiction of the offense, the prosecution in the old county having been dismissed.

2. Where the jury, after retiring to deliberate on a verdict, read newspaper statements that two men will hang the jury, that their identity is known to the public, and that attemps were made to corrupt the jury, the verdict will be set aside.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Kings county; Justin Jacobs, Judge.

Horace L. Smith, for appellant. W. H. H. Hart, Atty. Gen., and M. L. Short, Dist. Atty., for the People.

GAROUTTE, J. The defendant was charged with robbery, alleged to have been committed at Armona on March 2, 1893. He was convicted of grand larceny, and appeals from the judgment and order denying his motion for a new trial. Upon March 2, 1893, the date of the alleged crime, Armona was in Tulare county. On May 29, 1893, the county of Kings was organized out of a portion of Tulare county, and Armona is now, and has been since that time, in the county of Kings. The defendant contends that the superior court of Kings county had no jurisdiction over the alleged offense, and for that reason the judgment of conviction is void. He raised the question in the court below upon motion to dismiss the prosecution for want of jurisdiction, and, on the hearing of his motion, supported it by evidence showing that before the organization of Kings county there was commenced in the superior court of Tulare county a prosecution for the identical offense charged in this case, which prosecution was pending in said court at the date of the organization of said Kings county. The prosecution in Tulare county was dismissed prior to the inception of criminal proceedings against the defendant, upon which he was subsequently convicted in Kings county. Has the accused been tried and convicted in the proper county? We find no case directly in point upon the question here involved. The authorities all agree that the newly-created county has jurisdiction of a defendant charged with the commission of an offense prior to the creation of the new county, and upon territory within its boundary lines. But the question of jurisdiction seems never to have arisen where a prosecution was actually pending at the time the new county was created. As supporting the general principle above stated, see McElroy v. State, 13 Ark. 708; Murrah v. State, 51 Miss. 675; State v. Bunker, 38 Kan. 737, 17 Pac. 651; State v. Jones, 9 N. J. Law, 357; State v. Donaldson, 3 Heisk. 48; Bish. Cr. Proc. § 49. We do not think that the fact of an existing prosecution against the defendant in Tulare county at the date of the creation of the new county of Kings causes any exception to the general rule declared in the foregoing authorities. At the time the accused was tried and convicted, no proceedings were pending against him in Tulare county, and we are unable to see that he occupied any different position than if there had never been any prosecution begun in that county. Possibly, a judgment of conviction under the first prosecution would have been a valid and legal judgment. U. S. v. Dawson, 15 How. 467, but, even conceding such to be the fact, it does not follow that the mere circumstance of the existence of a pending prosecution at the date of the creation of the new county (which was subsequently dismissed) is a bar to a second prosecution. Why should it be? In the absence of the first prosecution, it is conceded that the new county was the proper county for trial; yet, under the first prosecution, it is not claimed that the defendant was either acquitted or convicted, for it is perfectly apparent that jeopardy did not attach. He now stands before the court exactly as if no proceedings were ever taken against him in Tulare county. If the superior court of that county had no jurisdiction to try the defendant, then, beyond question, the prosecution and conviction were properly had in Kings county; and, if the superior court of Tulare county had jurisdiction of the offense and the defendant, it had jurisdiction for all purposes, and consequently it had the power to dismiss the prosecution and discharge the defendant. The fact that the court may have made the order upon insufficient grounds, and thus have committed error in so doing (which is not conceded), is foreign to the question. The dismissal of the case was a matter within the power of the court, and the order of dismissal, as far as the defendant is concerned, was as effectual as though made upon the most incontestible ground. We see no cause of complaint upon his part. He has been deprived of no constitutional right. He has had a speedy and public trial by an impartial jury selected from the county including the territory upon which the crime was committed. Indeed, the defendant is favored in this respect, for he has been tried by a jury selected from a vicinage much more restricted than if the trial had been had in the county where the original prosecution was begun.

2. It is insisted that a new trial should have been granted because of misconduct of the jury after they had retired to deliberate upon their verdict. The misconduct charged consisted in the jury reading from a local newspaper an article containing a report of some of the evidence in the case, given at the trial, which included a matter of evidence the court had rejected as inadmissible, and also contained intimations that two of the jurors had been corrupted. The evidence bearing upon the question was given by the officer in charge of the jury. No contrary showing was made by the affidavits of jurors or otherwise. Indeed, conceding that the article was read by them, they could make no showing that would relieve them of the effects of their own misconduct.

A juror is not allowed to say: "I acknowledge grave misconduct. I received evidence without the presence of the court. But those matters had no influence upon my mind when casting my vote in the jury room." The law, in its wisdom, does not allow a juror to purge himself in that way. It was said in Woodward v. Leavitt, 107 Mass. 466: "But where evidence has been introduced tending to show that without authority of law, but without any fault of either party or his agent, a paper was communicated to the jury which might have influenced their minds, the testimony of the jurors is admissible to disprove that the paper was communicated to them, though not to show whether it did or did not influence their deliberations and decisions. A juryman may testify to any facts bearing upon the question of the existence of the disturbing influence, but he cannot be permitted to testify how far that influence operated upon his mind." There are intimations in the cases of People v. Goldenson, 76 Cal. 328, 19 Pac. 161, and People v. Murray, 85 Cal. 350, 24 Pac. 666, tending to oppose the foregoing views, but they do not express the law. The article of which complaint is made had the following heading: "The Stokes Case—Third Day of the Armona Robbery Trial—Undersheriff Hall Testifies about the Fifty-Dollar Silver Certificate—A Condensed Report of the Trial—A Hung Jury Intimated — Colonel Mazuma's Presence." The article concludes as follows: "It is currently reported on the streets that the jury will fail to bring in a verdict, and that two men will hang the jury. It is also believed that the two men are known, and that the whereabouts of 'Colonel Mazuma' are also known." It is exceedingly unfortunate that a newspaper should publish such an article pending the trial of an important criminal case. Newspaper comments of this character are well calculated to interfere with the due and proper administration of justice. The jurors should not have read the article. The newspaper should not have published it. The publication of such articles during the pendency of important trials serves no good purpose, but, on the contrary, tends to impede and adulterate the stream of justice. This article results in giving a defendant a new trial in an important case, for we discern no other ground for a reversal of the cause, save the one now under consideration.

We will now pass to an examination of the law. In speaking to this question, Mr. Hayne, in his very valuable work upon New Trials and Appeals, after an exhaustive review of both principle and authority, at section 27, says: "The rule laid down by the foregoing cases, viz. that, where an irregularity is shown which may have influenced the result, it is for the successful party to show that as a matter of fact it did not, rests upon sound principles. Corrupt and other improper actions are usually done in secret, and are carefully covered up; and it would always be difficult, and in many cases impossible, for the moving party to show that the irregularity was in fact followed by some corrupt or otherwise improper influence, while it is comparatively easy for the juror to explain an apparently doubtful act, if it be innocent. * * * The rule above stated is sustained by high authority. The views of such jurists as Shaw, Sharkey, Field, and Clifford are not to be lightly put aside. In California the cases of People v. Backus, 5 Cal. 276, and People v. Brannigan, 21 Cal. 337, and People v. Turner, 39 Cal. 370, seem to conclusively settle the matter. The rule, however, like every other rule, is to have a reasonable, and not a forced, application. It does not apply where there is only a bare possibility of the result having been affected. The case must be such that the court cannot determine with any reasonable certainty whether the result was affected or not." As directly supporting the author's text and the views of this court, we cite Com. v. Roby, 12 Pick. 519; Hare v. State, 4 How. (Miss.) 193; McCann v. State, 9 Smedes & M. 468; Keenan v. State, 8 Wis. 138; Wormley's Case, 8 Grat. 714; State v. Prescott, 7 N. H. 288; People v. Backus, 5 Cal. 276; People v. Brannigan, 21 Cal. 337; People v. Turner, 39 Cal. 370; People v. McCoy, 71 Cal. 395, 12 Pac. 272.

The remaining question presented is, was the article not calculated to prejudice the result of the trial? Is it apparent that it could have had no influence upon the verdict? If not, the defendant should be awarded a new trial, for he has not yet had that fair and impartial trial to which he is entitled by constitution and statute. It is said in People v. McCoy, supra: "There is no doubt, however, that the reading of newspapers by jurors while engaged in the trial of a cause is an inattention to duty which ought to be promptly corrected; and, if the newspaper contains any matter in connection with the subject-matter of the trial which would be at all likely to influence jurors in the performance of duty, the act will constitute ground for a motion for a new trial. * * * If it be proved as a fact, or may be presumed as a conclusion of law, that the verdict may have been influenced by information or impressions received from sources outside of the evidence in the case, such a verdict is subject to be set aside on a motion for a new trial." See, also, Carter v. State, 9 Lea, 440. Without considering that portion of the article containing a misrecital of the evidence, we pass to the extract quoted above. That extract, in effect, states that two men will hang the jury, and that their identity is known to the public. If there were men upon the jury who were wavering as to the character of their verdict, it is impossible for this court to say that this article, when read in the jury room, did not have the effect of directing their final action. We cannot say from an inspection of the record that the reading of it by the jurors had no effect upon the character of the verdict rendered. We cannot say that the verdict of guilty is based wholly upon the evidence introduced at the trial. The article goes to still greater lengths, and intimates that attempts are being made to corrupt the jury. It appears that the term "Colonel Mazuma" not only does not indicate some gentleman with a military title, but it does not even refer to a person at all. We fail to find the term mentioned by our lexicographers, but understand it to be a modern provincialism, probably emanating from the daily press, and used when referring to the corrupt application of money in the accomplishment of certain ends. If these jurors understood this term with the signification thus attached to it, it of itself furnished ample material to demand a retrial of the case. We see no other error in the record. As was said in People v. Mitchell, 34 Pac. 698: "It is unfortunate for the jury system, and for the cause of justice, that such episodes should occur in the trial of causes; but the evil will be soonest suppressed by wiping out verdicts rendered under such circumstances." It is ordered that the judgment and order be reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

CASTLE et al. v. SIEGFRIED et al. (No. 15,092.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 13, 1894.)

TRADE-MARK—INFRINGEMENT.

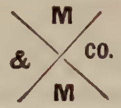
The labels on packages of tea imported by plaintiffs stated that their firm was the importer, and this was followed by an X-mark with the firm's initials in the angles, and a statement of the kind of tea, and that it was imported from Japan, where the packages were put up. Defendants' tea was put up in the same size packages, and the labels were identical, except that the name of the importing firm and the initials in the X-mark were different. It appeared that this kind of a label had been used by tea importers for 20 years, and it did not appear that plaintiffs invented it. The quality of defendants' tea was the superior, and it appeared that persons purchasing tea were influenced merely by the initials in the X-mark. Held, that there was no infringement of plaintiffs' trade-mark.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; William T. Wallace, Judge.

Action by Michael Castle and others, partners under the firm name of Macondray & Co., against John C. Siegfried and Max Brandenstein, partners under the firm name of Siegfried & Brandenstein. From a judgment for defendants, and an order denying a new trial, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Galpin & Zeigler, for appellants. Mastick, Belcher & Mastick, for respondents.

HARRISON, J. Action for the infringement of a trade-mark. The plaintiffs, a mercantile house in San Francisco, under the name of Macondray & Co., have been for many years engaged in importing teas from Japan, which are put up for them in that country in pound and half-pound packages, on each of which is affixed a label, the lines of which are printed in different colors, designating them as the importers, and containing also a characteristic mark or brand, as follows:



—the whole surrounded with a gold border. The defendants are also importers of teas into San Francisco from Japan, and have for many years imported teas put up in pound and half-pound packages, marked with labels containing an X-shaped character similar to that used by the plaintiffs, but with different initial letters in the angles thereof. The plaintiffs brought this action, alleging that the acts of the defendants are an infringement of their right to a trade-mark, and praying that they be enjoined from its further use. The court below held that the marks used by the defendants do not infringe upon any trade-mark of the plaintiffs, and are not a colorable or any imitation of any trade-mark of the plaintiffs, and rendered judgment in favor of the defendants, dismissing the complaint. The plaintiffs moved for a new trial, upon the ground that the decision of the court was not sustained by the evidence. This motion was denied, and the plaintiffs have appealed.

A trade-mark may be appropriated by any one dealing in an article of commerce, "to designate the origin and ownership thereof;" but such dealer cannot exclusively appropriate any designation or part of a designation which relates only to the name, quality, or the description of the thing or business, or the place where the thing is produced or the business is carried on. Civ. Code, § 991. There is a marked distinction between the appropriation by an individual of some mark or symbol, coined or invented by him, to designate an article or proprietary compound which he manufactures, and his appropriation of a mark to designate an article of commerce dealt in by him in common with others. There can be no exclusive right to put up or sell tea in packages of any particular form or size, or to designate the packages by any particular arrangement of words, which indicate no more than the name or amount or quality of the tea, or the place where it is produced or sold. The plaintiffs did not give any evidence in the court below tending to show that they had invented or devised the trade-mark called by the witness the "sawbuck" or "cross-bar" mark or brand, but merely that they had made use of it, with their initials in the angles, for many years; nor did they show that they were the first who had made use of this brand as a distinguishing mark for their goods; and there was evidence before the court that this mark had been used by dealers in tea long anterior to the time when the plaintiffs claim to have first made use of it, and that it had been used in San Francisco as a brand or mark upon packages of tea for upwards of 20 years by other persons who were dealing in tea in San Francisco and on the Pacific slope. The court finds that the only parts of the labels which were invented or designed or solely used by the firm of Macondray & Co. are the combination of the X-shaped character with the letters "M. M. & Co.," and the name "Macondray & Co." This is, indeed, all of the label that could be appropriated by the plaintiffs as a trade-mark, and is what is claimed by them in the complaint to be their trade-mark, and to which the evidence at the trial was directed. It was also shown that the packages in which both the plaintiffs and the defendants, as well as other importers, are accustomed to have the tea imported, are of the shape and size in which it is usually put up and sold; that the paper in which it is wrapped is manufactured in Japan, and that the labels thereon are printed there; that these labels are in the usual form of type used upon tea labels, and are printed in alternating colors, such as are commonly used in that country, and are surrounded with a gold border; that the only distinguishing mark of the several importers is their own name printed upon the label, or their initials in the angles of the X. It was also shown, and the court found, that the defendants had sold to dealers tea put up in packages marked with labels containing the names of such dealers, instead of the names of the plaintiffs, and having their initials in the angles of the X, instead of the initials "M. M. & Co.," and having also the same descriptive name of the tea; that the size and shape of the packages and the labels thereon were similar to those on the packages of tea sold by the plaintiffs, and were of the form and character in common and general use in the tea trade, and used by most importers and dealers in tea; that all of these teas were so packed and marked at the direction of the dealers to whom they were sold, and the initial letters placed in the angles of the X were in each case the initials of the name or firm name of such dealer. The teas thus put up and sold by the defendants were of a quality equal, if not superior, to those put up and sold by the plaintiffs; and the court finds that the defendants acted in good faith, and were free from any fraudulent intent, in their dealings in the teas. It was also shown that persons wishing to buy tea were governed by the initials within the X, or by the name of the importer stamped upon the packages, and that the different colored letters on the labels had no significance with those purchasing teas; and the court found that no person had been, or was likely to be, deceived by any resemblance between the packages of tea sold by the defendants and those sold by the plaintiffs. We are of the opinion that the evidence fully sustains the findings of the court, and that its judgment is correct. The judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

RUGGLES v. SUPERIOR COURT OF CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO et al. (No. 15,682.)

CONTEMPT—WHAT CONSTITUTES — EFFECT OF APPEAL.

Where the superior court makes an order for family allowance from which an appeal is taken, an administrator is not guilty of contempt for not paying said allowance pending an appeal. Beatty, C. J., dissenting.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; J. V. Coffey, Judge.

Petition by James Ruggles for a writ of prohibition against the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco, and J. V. Coffey, judge thereof. Writ allowed.

M. T. Moses and Chas. A. Sumner, for petitioner. Garret W. McEnerney and Stanley, Hayes & Bradley, for respondents.

VAN FLEET, J. Application for prohibition. Petitioner is the administrator of the estate of one Henry Welch, deceased, in course of administration in the department of said respondent superior court presided over by said Hon. J. V. Coffey, judge thereof. On February 16, 1894, an order was made and entered in said estate directing petitioner, as such administrator, to pay to the widow of said deceased $7,375, as accrued and unpaid family allowance. From this order the administrator on February 20, 1894, perfected an appeal to this court. Thereafter the widow moved this court to dismiss said appeal, which motion was subsequently, on the 5th day of March, denied, and the appeal is still pending and undetermined. Subsequent to the denial of said motion, the respondent judge, on the 7th day of March, at the instance of the widow, caused a citation to be issued and served upon petitioner, requiring said petitioner to show cause before the respondent superior court, on the 8th day of March, 1894, why he should not be punished for contempt in failing and refusing to obey the order of February 16th requiring him to pay said family allowance. On the last-mentioned date petitioner, in obedience to the citation, appeared before said court, and in response thereto brought properly to the attention of the court the said appeal and the order of this court denying the motion to dismiss the same, and then objected that neither the superior court nor the judge thereof had any power or jurisdiction to proceed with or hear said matter of contempt, or to enforce said order for the payment of family allowance, by reason of the pendency of the appeal. But notwithstanding the showing so made by petitioner, and disregarding his objections, said superior court and the judge thereof, respondents, threatened to proceed in said matter, and to punish petitioner for his refusal to obey said order; whereupon this application for prohibition was made.

The sole question arising is as to whether the superior court is acting in excess of its jurisdiction in the premises. Under the facts stated, we are constrained to hold that it is. The appeal from the order in question operated as a supersedeas, and stayed all further proceedings in the court below in the particular matter involved in the order appealed from. By the appeal the order or decree is set at large, and the subject-matter removed from the jurisdiction of the lower court until the appeal has been determined and the matter remitted back from the appellate court. In the case of Pennie v. Superior Court, 89 Cal. 31, 26 Pac. 617, the lower court made an order for family allowance, from which an appeal was taken. Pending the appeal, the lower court made an order directing the administrator to pay the money allowed by the previous order. The latter order was annulled by this court on certiorari, upon the ground that the appeal had removed the subject-matter of the order from the jurisdiction of the superior court, and it had not authority to further proceed with its enforcement pending the appeal. And in the recent case of Ex parte Orford (opinion filed in department 2 of this court, June 8, 1894), 36 Pac. 928, the same question arose. An administratrix of an estate in probate had been ordered to pay a certain claim against the estate; she appealed from the order, but, notwithstanding her appeal, the lower court proceeded against her as for a contempt in refusing obedience to its order, and punished her by imprisonment until she should comply with the order. This court discharged her on habeas corpus, holding that "the petitioner, having appealed and stayed all proceedings upon the order which she is charged with violating, cannot, pending her appeal, be punished for a failure to obey it." It is urged here by the respondents, however, as it was on the motion to dismiss the appeal, that the appeal attempted to be taken by petitioner herein is ineffectual to stay the hand of the lower court, because no appeal lies from an order such as the one under consideration. But that question does not arise in this proceeding. An appeal from the order has been taken to this court, and this court has refused to dismiss it; this determination is as effectual for the purposes of this case as if determined for all purposes. Its effect is that this court is thus far entertaining the appeal, and while it does so the respondents are not at liberty to proceed in the matter. Whether the order in question shall be ultimately held appealable is a question that will properly arise in the matter in which the appeal is pending, but, for the reason stated, it is not involved here.

The proceedings complained of being in excess of the jurisdiction of respondents, a peremptory writ should issue as prayed. It is so ordered.

On Rehearing.

(July 17, 1894.)

PER CURIAM. Rehearing denied.

BEATTY, C. J. I dissent from the order denying a rehearing of this cause, and, having concurred at the time in the decision heretofore pronounced by the court, I desire to state the grounds of my present conviction that said judgment was erroneous. When the superior court has made an order or judgment from which there is no appeal, and which is therefore a final adjudication of the rights of the litigants, the prevailing party is entitled to demand the enforcement of such order or judgment; and it is not only the right but the duty of the superior court to accord the proper relief by the appropriate process. That court is not relieved of such duty by the fact that the defeated party has attempted to appeal to this court, and thereby to stay the proceedings. When asked to enforce its order, and the fact is brought to its knowledge that an appeal has been taken or attempted, a question is then presented as to its jurisdiction to proceed, dependent for its solution upon the further question whether the order is final and unappealable or not; and this question it must decide. If it should erroneously decide that the order is not appealable when it is appealable, then alone has this court the power to interpose by prohibition and arrest its process. No one denies the truth of this proposition, as applied to a case where there has been no motion made in this court to dismiss the appeal upon the ground that the order is nonappealable; but because in this case the prevailing party in the superior court raised the question here by a motion to dismiss, which was disposed of without any decision of the question involved, a distinction is made, and it is held that the superior court is exceeding its jurisdiction in enforcing the order in question, whether it is final and nonappealable, or not; in other words, that it is exceeding its jurisdiction in enforcing an order which it holds to be final, and which we have never held, do not now hold, and may never hold to be appealable. For it should be understood—a fact which does not clearly appear from the opinion of the court—that the order overruling the motion to dismiss the appeal was made expressly without prejudice, which, whatever else it may or may not mean, certainly does mean that the question involved in the motion was left open and undecided. That is to say, the motion was disposed of, and taken as completely out of the case, for all purposes, as if it had never been made, but the question whether the order of the superior court is final or appealable was left at large; neither party was estopped; nothing was foreclosed. Such being the case, the party claiming the benefit of the order, having been turned out of this court without a decision of a question which undoubtedly he could have presented in the first place to the superior court, returned to that tribunal and demanded the enforcement of its order, a right to which he is clearly entitled if it is final. I can see nothing in the proceedings here which relieved the superior court of the duty of hearing and determining the question so presented. The fact that we were "entertaining the appeal" is no answer to this proposition. It might just as truly, and with as much meaning, have been said that we were "entertaining the appeal" if no motion to dismiss it had ever been made. We are always entertaining appeals in cases in which no motion to dismiss has been made, and in which there is a question whether the order or judgment of the lower court is appealable or not. In all such cases, the question of our jurisdiction is pending and undetermined in the same sense and to the same extent that it is pending and undetermined in this case. But no one would contend for a moment that in such a case we could properly prohibit the enforcement of the order appealed from without determining that it was appealable, for unless we did hold it appealable we could not say that the lower court was exceeding its jurisdiction. If a proposition so plain needed authority to support it, such authority is found in the case of Tyler v. Connolly, 65 Cal. 28, 2 Pac. 414.

In every appeal in which a question may be raised as to the finality of the order or judgment of the lower court, that question must be ultimately decided here, but, upon the question of enforcing the order or judgment pending the appeal, the lower court not only can, but must, decide in the first instance whenever its decision is properly invoked. This court may decline to decide the question upon a preliminary motion, and in the absence of a full record, as was done in this case, but when it chooses to take that course (disposing of the motion, but reserving the right upon the final submission of the cause to consider the question of jurisdiction then, and meantime leaving it undetermined) the case is put in precisely the same condition as if the motion had not been made, and no valid distinction can be raised by the suggestion that we are "entertaining the appeal."

For these reasons I am of the opinion that, until we are prepared to say that an appeal lies from the order of the superior court, we have no right to prohibit its enforcement.

VALLENS et al. v. TILLMAN et al. (No. 15,458.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 23, 1894.)

BREACH OF CONTRACT—DAMAGES.

Defendants, being indebted to plaintiffs, agreed to buy from them 50,000 cigars per month until the profits thereon paid the debt; cigars to be of specified brands, and to correspond to samples. After defendants received a part of the cigars, they wrote plaintiffs they were not according to sample, and that they would take no more. Plaintiffs replied that if the cigars were not according to sample they would send them some that were, which defendants refused to accept. Held, plaintiffs could recover the debt, less the profits on the cigars accepted by defendants.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; John Hunt, Judge.

Action by Eugene Vallens and another against Frederick Tillman and others for damages for breach of contract. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiffs appeal. Reversed.

Edmund Tauszky, for appellants. Daniel Titus, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. The plaintiffs are manufacturers of cigars at Chicago; the defendants, wholesale dealers at San Francisco.

Prior to February 4, 1889, defendants had purchased goods from plaintiffs, and, differences having arisen between them, a compromise was made through an agreement in writing of that date. In that agreement, among other things, it was stipulated that the plaintiffs claimed to have lost in the settlement $2,983.75, which defendants were willing "to assist in making up to them," and therefore agreed to purchase from plaintiffs 50,000 cigars per month for two years, "or until said party makes up said loss." The contract then proceeds to specify the brands to be furnished, which were to correspond to samples, and it was agreed "that the goods shall be equal in size, shape, and quality to said samples." The profit per 1,000 upon each brand was fixed in the agreement. It then states: "Should said party of the second part [defendants] conclude to go out of business of vending cigars at any time hereafter, or for any other reason, it may be released from its agreement to buy 50,000 cigars per month by paying to the said party of the first part the said sum of $2,983.75, or such part thereof as may remain unpaid at the time of so electing to discontinue such purchases." It is alleged by plaintiffs in their complaint that, since this agreement, the defendants have purchased from plaintiffs 180,000 cigars, the profits on which amount only to $380, and that defendants have refused to purchase any more, wherefore plaintiffs demand judgment for the sum of $2,603.75, which is the said sum of $2,983.75, less the said profits. The answer admits the contract; denies that plaintiffs have performed its conditions, that defendants have failed to perform, or have refused to purchase any more cigars from plaintiffs, or that plaintiffs have been willing to sell cigars in accordance with said agreement. Defendants aver that they performed the conditions of said contract in good faith until the plaintiffs committed a breach thereof by sending goods inferior in quality to the samples; that the defendants bought 180,000 cigars, but the goods were not like the samples, nor equal in size, shape, or quality; that defendants called plaintiffs' attention to the breach of the contract, and required them to furnish goods of the quality, size, and shape of the samples, which plaintiffs refused to do. The cause was tried with the aid of a jury, and the verdict and judgment were for defendants. Plaintiffs appeal from the judgment, and from an order refusing a new trial. Appellants contend that the court erred in admitting certain testimony over their objections, in giving instructions asked for by defendants, in refusing instructions asked for by plaintiffs, and in the instructions given of its own motion. Also, that the verdict is against the evidence.

It appears from testimony which is not disputed that, under the contract, defendants continued to take cigars from plaintiffs until July 18, 1889. At that time they had received 160,000 and had paid for 120,000. There had been no complaint in regard to the goods furnished. On that day, however, they sent a telegram to plaintiffs, as follows: "Do not ship any more cigars. Will write particulars." July 29th plaintiffs received at Chicago a letter from defendants explaining the telegram. They complained of the cigars sent as not being like the samples in quality or shape, and say they had suffered heavy loss, and add: "Although by rights we should hold the goods subject to your order, we will keep them and bear the loss ourselves, rather than have any more trouble with you; but at the same time positively withdraw from the contract, and terminate it right here, and will not receive any more cigars from you. Our transactions with you thoroughly satisfy us not to have any more to do with you whatsoever. Our statement as regards the quality of the goods can be substantiated by any reliable and square dealer or manufacturer of cigars who understands his business. Please return contract on receipt of this, and we will withhold payment of bill of June 25th until we hear from you." Two days later Tillman wrote another letter, reiterating the complaints in regard to the goods, and concluding: "Under the circumstances will not receive or purchase any more goods from you, as I certainly shall not deal with parties that I cannot trust." July 27, 1889, plaintiffs replied to the two letters, asserting that the goods sent were according to contract, but admitting that defendants had a right to retire from the contract upon paying the sum of $2,983.75, upon which they admitted defendants were entitled to a credit of $380. They demanded payment of the bill acknowledged to be due and the balance of the $2,983.75. August 7th plaintiffs received a reply to this letter from defendants, in which defendants say that they wish no further argument in the matter, and that they hold the goods not paid for subject to plaintiffs' order. November 29th plaintiffs replied, saying: "If you have any goods which you claim we did not make in accordance with the contract now existing between us, you can return them to us, and we will make others in place of them. We firmly insist upon the completion of this contract, and will either furnish the goods to you as specified in said contract, or you may pay us the amount in cash which is due us on the contract." December 13th defendants replied, taunting the plaintiffs for not having sued, but at the same time consenting to pay for all the cigars they had received, and also to accept 20,000 others which had been stopped in transitu, although not up to the contract. They add: "In withdrawing from the contract which you did not keep we are fully justified, and think that in paying for all the goods that you sent us, at your own price, we are treating you with liberality." This must be held a refusal to accept more goods, even though they were like the samples. Respondents' counsel admits here that the fact that plaintiffs had furnished cigars which did not come up to the samples, which defendants had taken and paid for, did not justify defendants in abrogating the contract and in declining to accept goods thereafter, provided plaintiffs would furnish such goods as were called for in the contract; but he contends that plaintiffs should have tendered other goods, which did come up to contract standard, and that defendants would have been liable only when they declined to accept and pay for such goods. He says defendants have never declined to accept and pay for any goods which were in accordance with the contract. In this, however, defendants' counsel is clearly in error. The correspondence above quoted shows that defendants declined to take any goods from plaintiffs, and notified them that they would receive no more. There were no conditions in this notice. Besides, there were a number of brands, and defendants had the privilege of ordering any of them, and in the absence of such orders plaintiffs could not furnish the goods. The evidence shows that none were ordered. Furthermore, plaintiffs did offer to furnish other goods, and the defendants declined to receive them. And yet, further, under the contract, defendants had the right to discontinue taking the goods upon paying the $2,983.75. Plaintiffs therefore could not force them to accept and pay for goods, even if they had corresponded with the samples. Their remedy was to bring suit, as they have done, for the balance of the $2,983.75.

The evidence was not conflicting upon any material point, but the court instructed the jury, at request of the defendants, as follows: "If you should find from the testimony that the cigars furnished by the plaintiffs were not of the size, shape, and quality of the samples left by them with the defendants, then the defendants were not bound to continue buying cigars of plaintiffs, nor were they bound to pay the amount sued for, nor any part thereof, and your verdict should be for the defendants." The court also refused to instruct the jury, at the request of plaintiffs, in accordance with the views of the law which are now admitted to be correct. This was, of course, error. In fact, as the evidence was not conflicting, or the inference from it doubtful, the court should, if requested, have instructed the jury to find for plaintiffs. The court also gave further instructions of its own motion, and at the request of the jury. These instructions are not excepted to in such way that they can be reviewed here, but may be referred to for the purpose of determining if the errors above alluded to were there corrected. If a different view of the law had been there laid down, it would only have been in conflict with the instruction given at the request of defendants. But, referring to it, we find that the jury were then told: "I think it was an entire contract; that is to say, it was a contract with plaintiffs to purchase cigars. If any portion of them were not up to sample, my instruction to you is that it is a defense, and that defendants need not take them or pay for them." In the oral charge this idea is repeated again and again. There was no question as to whether defendants should take and pay for any cigars which had been furnished. They had all been paid for. The instruction could have had no bearing upon any other question than whether the defendants had a right to abrogate the contract because the cigars furnished, and which had been paid for, were not like the samples. It is now admitted that they had no such right. It is true some portions of the oral charge seem to favor the present contention of the appellants, but the errors in giving the instructions asked for by defendants and refusing the instructions asked for by plaintiffs, which correctly stated the law, are not cured by these confusing and contradictory statements. It is not necessary to consider other alleged errors. The order and judgment are reversed.

PEOPLE v. VITAL. (No. 20,957.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 23, 1894.)

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Santa Barbara county; W. B. Cope, Judge.

Antone Vital was convicted of murder in the first degree, and appeals. Affirmed.

A. D. Splivalo and J. A. Spinetti, for appellant. W. H. H. Hart, Atty. Gen., and A. E. Putnam, Dist. Atty., for the People.

PER CURIAM. The defendant, Antone Vital, has been convicted of the crime of murder in the first degree, and sentenced to be executed. No motion for a new trial was made in the lower court, and the case is now before us upon a direct appeal from the judgment. We have given the record a very careful examination, and find nothing there that would justify a reversal of the judgment. There is not only no substantial and prejudicial error disclosed by the record, but we perceive nothing that borders upon technical error.

Counsel who appear for defendant upon this appeal complain bitterly because counsel who represented the defendant in the trial court did not make a motion for a new trial. The record is entirely silent as to the reasons why such a step was not taken, and such a course, in the exercise of the greatest care for a client's interests, would certainly have been proper, especially in a case involving such grave consequences. But, as far as this court knows, the course adopted may have been pursued for the best of reasons. Counsel do not make any showing, even informally, as to any events or circumstances occurring during the progress of the trial which would justify the granting of a motion for a retrial, if one had been made in the regular course of procedure, and the case was now before us upon a record involving that question. We have examined with great care all the matters discussed in counsel's brief, regardless of the question as to whether they were properly before us or not, and find them without merit. On the appeal from the judgment we can only say that the information is full and complete, and that the charge of the court to the jury as to the law of the case is such as to be without legal exception or objection. The defendant, by his notice of appeal, states that he appeals from an order denying a motion for a new trial; but no motion for a new trial is found in the record; neither is there any order found therein denying the same. His counsel, in their briefs, concede that no such motion was ever made; hence his appeal in that regard is of no avail, and must be dismissed. The judgment is affirmed.

TAYLOR v. KELLY. (No. 15,218.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 23, 1894.)

Constructive Trust—Agreement as to Land—Action to Compel Conveyance—Rulings on Evidence—Review on Appeal.

1. Plaintiff verbally contracted with defendant to join him in the purchase of certain land which defendant had contracted to purchase by a certain time. On plaintiff's failure to pay his share of the money, defendant purchased the land in his own name. Held, that defendant could not be compelled to convey half the land to plaintiff on the ground that there was a constructive trust in favor of plaintiff.

2. In such case, evidence that a demand by defendant's son on plaintiff to pay his share of the purchase price was made by defendant's authority, and that plaintiff then refused to pay, is sufficient to show that plaintiff was given an opportunity to carry out his agreement.

3. Evidence of the value of the property at the time of the purchase is inadmissible in an action to compel defendant to convey to plaintiff half of the land.

4. Where, from the question, it is not apparent that a witness' answer will be material, the exclusion of the same will not be ground for reversal, unless the facts which are expected to be proved are made a part of the record, so as to show the materiality of the evidence.

5. A doubt whether a finding by the court was justified by the evidence is not sufficient cause for setting it aside.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; John F. Finn, Judge.

Action by J. W. Taylor against Annie A. Kelly. There was a judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

J. C. Bates, for appellant. Dorn & Dorn and Joseph P. Kelly, for respondent.

HAYNES, C. This action was brought by Taylor against Michael Joseph Kelly to compel the conveyance to him of an undivided interest in certain real estate situate in the city and county of San Francisco. M. J. Kelly died before the cause was tried, and Annie A. Kelly, to whom he had conveyed the land after the commencement of the action, was substituted as defendant. The defendant had judgment, and the plaintiff appeals from an order denying his motion for a new trial. A brief outline of the facts, as found by the court, is as follows: That on April 9, 1887, Michael J. Kelly entered into an agreement in writing with one Driscoll to purchase the lands in question for the sum of $6,100, and paid thereon $25; the purchaser to have 30 days for examination of the title. That on or about April 15, 1887, Kelly made a verbal agreement with the plaintiff, whereby the plaintiff should pay one-half of the purchase price on or before the expiration of the time allowed for examination of the title, and thereupon should be equally interested with Kelly in the purchase. That on May 7, 1887, the title being satisfactory, Kelly demanded from Taylor the payment of one-half the purchase money, but Taylor neglected to pay it. On May 9, 1887, Kelly paid in full for the land, and took a conveyance in his own name, and on the same day had the deed recorded. On August 29, 1887, the plaintiff inclosed in an envelope a check payable to Kelly or order for $3,050, and caused the same to be delivered to Kelly, who refused to accept it. That at the time the check was drawn, and offered to Kelly, plaintiff had in the bank on which it was drawn $2,947.46, and no more, and that this was the only offer of payment he ever made. The court further found: That certain allegations of the complaint, viz. that plaintiff had paid $10 for a search of the title; that the deed was taken by Kelly for the mutual benefit of both; that he reposed confidence in Kelly; and that by reason of such confidence, and the promises of Kelly, the contract and deed were taken in Kelly's name,—were untrue. That Kelly did not at any time admit that the purchase was for their mutual benefit. That he did not act in bad faith, or fraudulently, towards the plaintiff. And that plaintiff neither paid nor gave any consideration for the verbal agreement made by Kelly with him. Appellant specifies several particulars in which he claims that the findings are not justified by the evidence. Several of these may be considered together.

It is insisted that the verbal agreement mentioned in the findings was made before the written agreement between Kelly and Driscoll was made; that the purchase was in fact made for the joint benefit of Kelly and the plaintiff; that, therefore, it was not a subsequent agreement by Kelly to share his purchase or to sell to plaintiff a half interest in the property, and that the plaintiff negotiated the purchase from Driscoll pursuant to the verbal agreement; that "there is no evidence that it was only on Taylor's payment on or before the time the purchase money would become due and payable that Taylor should become equally interested in the property." The only finding, about which there is any doubt as to its being justified by the evidence, is the one which finds that the verbal agreement between appellant and Kelly was made on or about April 15th, which was after the date of the contract between Kelly and Driscoll. But a doubt will not authorize us to set aside the finding. But, if the finding was that the verbal agreement was made with Kelly before the date of the contract with Driscoll, it would not avail the appellant.

Defendant, as one of her defenses, pleaded the statute of frauds. It is also conceded that appellant did not pay for his interest, and, treating his check as a tender, did not tender payment until some three months after the purchase had been consummated and the whole of the purchase price paid. The agreement alleged in the complaint was that plaintiff and Kelly should purchase; not that Kelly should purchase, and upon payment by Taylor to Kelly of one-half the purchase money, at some time in the future, Kelly would convey. It is not claimed by plaintiff that Kelly agreed to purchase for their joint benefit, though it is claimed that he did so purchase. The only agreement alleged in the complaint, and which appellant, by his exception to the findings, insists was made before the contract of sale between Driscoll and Kelly, required appellant to join in the purchase (not necessarily in the contract of purchase), by furnishing his porportion of the purchase money at the time the purchase was consummated. This was not done. The contract with Driscoll having been made by Kelly alone, he was bound to fulfill it, whether Taylor kept his verbal agreement to join in the purchase or not. If Taylor declined to join in the purchase, and pay his proportion of the purchase money, it was not in Kelly's power to compel him to keep his verbal agreement. A tender of a deed to Taylor for an undivided half of the property, and a demand of payment of one-half the purchase price, the whole of which Kelly was obliged to pay, would have been fruitless, as Taylor could have successfully pleaded the statute of frauds to any action brought to compel payment. Certainly, Taylor is in no better position, for he must rely upon a verbal contract, and that contract one that he had himself failed to comply with.

It is insisted by appellant that Kelly became a trustee of the interest in the land in question for his benefit; that "a trust arises when personal confidence is reposed in one, and accepted by the other." But there was no relation of trust or confidence between these parties, unless the verbal agreement itself created such relation. Here there was no trust or confidence, other than that which is manifested in all business affairs in which the honor or ability of the party is relied upon for performance. There was in this case no reason for the confidence reposed, other than the opinion entertained by appellant that he could rely upon Kelly. "It is not every case where parties trust each other that the law recognizes as confidential." Brison v. Brison, 75 Cal. 528, 17 Pac. 689, and cases cited. Appellant, however, states his proposition in another form, thus: "A person who gains a thing by fraud, * * * in violation of a trust (that is, confidence reposed), or other wrongful act, is an involuntary trustee of the thing gained, for the benefit of the person who would otherwise have had it." In support of this proposition, he cites Civ. Code, § 2224, and Greiner v. Greiner, 58 Cal. 122. The section of the Civil Code referred to is as follows: "One who gains a thing by fraud, accident, mistake, undue influence, the violation of a trust or confidence or other wrongful act, is, unless he has some other and better right thereto, an involuntary trustee of the thing gained, for the benefit of the person who would otherwise have had it." We have seen that there was no violation of a trust or confidence; nor is it alleged, found, or claimed that Taylor made the verbal agreement with Kelly through the fraud or other wrongful act or the undue influence of the latter, or that it was the result of accident or mistake. Taylor never asked or suggested that the agreement be reduced to writing; nor is there any finding, or any evidence upon which a finding could be based, that Taylor was in any manner prevented from joining in the purchase, or that Kelly, at the time the verbal agreement was made, or the time when the contract was made with Driscoll, did not intend to perform that agreement with Taylor. The whole basis of appellant's contention is that Kelly did not, after he had been compelled to pay the whole of the purchase price, instead of one-half, accept payment from appellant, and convey to him the interest in question. The case of Greiner v. Greiner, supra, is not in point. There the husband redeemed certain notes and mortgages belonging to him from a pledgee, with his wife's money, which he had in his possession, and, with intent to defraud the wife, assigned them, without consideration, upon a secret trust in favor of himself; and it was held that, by using her money to redeem the notes and mortgages from the pledgee, he became a trustee for his wife, and that she was entitled to be subrogated to the lien of the pledgee. Comment upon the distinction between that case and this is unnecessary. In Pomeroy's Equity Jurisprudence (section 1056), the learned author says: "In order that the doctrine of trusts ex maleficio with respect to land may be enforced under any circumstances, there must be something more than a mere verbal promise, however unequivocal; otherwise, the statute of frauds would be virtually abrogated. There must be an element of positive fraud accompanying the promise, and by means of which the acquisition of the legal title is wrongfully consummated. Equity does not pretend to enforce verbal promises in the face of the statute. It endeavors to prevent and punish fraud by taking from the wrongdoer the fruits of his deceit, and it accomplishes this object by its beneficial and far-reaching doctrine of constructive trusts." In Sandfoss v. Jones, 35 Cal. 488 (a case cited by appellant), it is said: "Doubtless, the general current of authorities upon this subject is that a dry, verbal promise to purchase lands for the benefit of another is within the statute of frauds, and cannot, therefore, be proved by parol." The facts of that case, however, took it out of the statute, upon well-settled equitable principles, and it is therefore not an authority for appellant. Rose v. Hayden, 35 Kan. 106, 10 Pac. 563, cited by appellant, was where an agent, employed to purchase for his principal, bought in his own name, and paid with his own money; and it was held that the weight of authority was, he could not retain the property so purchased. That, however, is not this case. A parol agreement that another shall be interested in a purchase, or parol declarations by a purchaser that he buys for another, without an advance of money by that other, will not raise a resulting trust, but will be inoperative under the statute of frauds. Bland v. Talley, 50 Ark. 71, 6 S. W. 234.

Appellant further contends that there is no evidence that a demand was made upon him to furnish his part of the purchase price to be paid to Driscoll; that the only evidence of such demand was that of Joseph P. Kelly, who had no power to convey any interest in the property. Joseph P. Kelly testified that his father, M. J. Kelly, left the city a few days before the time expired for the performance of the contract with Driscoll, and instructed him to attend to the payment and securing a conveyance, and for this purpose gave him a check for his part of the purchase money and instructed him to call on Taylor for the remainder; that he did call upon Taylor and asked him to put up his half of the money; that Taylor replied, "Well, there was an arrangement of that kind, but that he would not do it; that he did not propose to go into the thing at all, and did not propose to have anything to do with it." This was denied by Taylor. The fact that Joseph P. Kelly could not make a deed to him did not affect Taylor's duty to pay the money, nor, indeed, was any demand upon Taylor necessary, as Taylor was one of the purchasers under the terms of the agreement, as alleged by him. The conflict between these witnesses will not permit the appellate court to interfere with the findings objected to; and it is clear that, if Joseph P. Kelly's testimony is true, M. J. Kelly gave Taylor a full opportunity to carry out the agreement, and that Taylor declined to do so. Whatever merit there might be in appellant's specifications of insufficiency of the evidence to justify the findings (and I think there are none), if the findings were changed to meet his suggestions, the judgment was right, and the order denying a new trial should be affirmed, unless the court erred in matters of law to the prejudice of appellant.

Appellant was a witness in his own behalf, and was asked by his counsel the following question: "State the fact,—the reason the transaction was done in Mr. Kelly's name, and not in your joint names?" Defendant's objection was sustained. If, by the question, it was intended to call from the witness a statement of the mental operation by which he concluded to have the contract in the name of Mr. Kelly alone, it was clearly incompetent. That this was what he called for is, I think, quite clear from the record. All the facts appear to have been fully testified to by the witness. It is not alleged or claimed that any fraudulent devices or means were resorted to by Mr. Kelly to induce appellant not to appear in the contract with Driscoll. It is not apparent, therefore, that the answer to the question would have been material; and in such case counsel should have stated the fact he expected to prove, and made an offer to prove it by the witness, and thus put in the record the facts which would show whether it was material. In the absence of such statement in the record, we cannot say that the facts expected to be stated in answer to the question were material, or, if material, that appellant was prejudiced by the ruling.

Appellant was also asked the value of the lots at the time of the purchase. Defendant's objection was properly sustained. The value of the property could not in any way affect the validity of the agreement upon which appellant sought to recover.

The other alleged errors of law are covered by what has been said on the principal question. The order appealed from should be affirmed.

We concur: SEARLS, C.; VANCLIEF, C.

McFARLAND and FITZGERALD, JJ. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the order appealed from is affirmed.

DE HAVEN, J. I concur in the judgment.

EDWARDS v. HELLINGS et al. (No. 15,230.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 25, 1894.)

JUDGMENT BY DEFAULT — ENTRY BY CLERK — GROUNDS FOR SETTING ASIDE—ACTION AGAINST PARTNERS.

1. Where defendant was personally served with summons, a judgment by default will not be set aside because the attorney he requested to defend the action, after a demurrer to the complaint was overruled, failed to answer, especially when defendant states that he did not read the complaint, and does not state that he told the attorney of facts which would be a defense, and it appeared that he left the state two days after the service of summons, and did not communicate further with his attorney.

2. An execution on a default judgment will not be quashed because the complaint was defective, as the remedy therefor is by appeal.

3. Code Civ. Proc. § 414, provides that when an action is against two or more liable on a contract, and the summons is not served on all, the plaintiff may proceed against those served as if they were the only defendants. Section 585 provides that, if the defendant fail to answer, the clerk may enter judgment against one or more of several defendants in the cases provided for in section 414. Section 636 provides that on the overruling of a demurrer the plaintiff may proceed as in section 585. Held, that on the failure of defendant to answer after the overruling of a demurrer in an action against copartners, he being the only one served, judgment may be entered by the clerk against him.

4. Under Code Civ. Proc. § 585, providing that, in case of defendant's failure to answer, "the clerk, on application of plaintiff, may enter the default, and immediately thereafter enter judgment," the clerk may enter judgment eight years after entry of default, as the word "immediately" is merely directory.

5. The statute of limitations begins to run on a judgment by default from the entry of the judgment, and not from the entry of the default.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; John Hunt, Judge.

Action by T. C. Edwards against W. B. Hellings and Edward Hellings, traders under the name of W. B. Hellings & Co. There was a judgment of default against W. B. Hellings, and from a judgment denying his application to set aside the same, and quash an execution issued thereon, he appeals. Affirmed.

Henry I. Kowalsky and T. J. Crowley (T. M. Osmont, of counsel), for appellant. H. C. Firebaugh, for respondents.

HARRISON, J. The plaintiff commenced an action against the appellant and another defendant February 16, 1884, for the purpose of recovering from them the amount of a judgment that had been previously rendered in the fifteenth district court for the city and county of San Francisco. The summons in the action was served upon the appellant alone, and was given by him to an attorney, with instructions to defend the action. This attorney filed a demurrer to the complaint, which was afterwards overruled for want of prosecution. Notice of such overruling was served upon the appellant's attorney, and, no answer having been filed, his default was entered by order of the court March 14, 1884. Judgment was not entered against him upon this default until January 18, 1892. An execution was issued upon this judgment March 19, 1892, and levied upon certain real property of the appellant, which was advertised by the sheriff to be sold on the 21st of April, 1892. On the 18th of April, upon the application of the appellant, the court in which the judgment had been entered made an order that the plaintiff show cause why the order of default and judgment theretofore made and entered therein should not be set aside, and the defendant allowed to file an answer; and also made an order staying proceedings in the meantime. Upon the hearing of this order to show cause the court denied the application, and at the same time denied a motion by the appellant to recall and quash the execution that had been issued. From these orders he has appealed, bringing the matters here by a bill of exceptions.

The court properly exercised its discretion in denying the application to set aside the default and judgment against the appellant, and refusing to relieve him therefrom. The summons in the case had been regularly served upon the appellant, and the appearance of the attorney in his behalf was authorized by him. His instructions to the attorney to defend the action were of no avail to relieve him from the judgment, even if his attorney had failed to carry out his instructions. Although he says in his application that he firmly believed that his attorney would defend the action upon its merits, he also says that he did not examine the complaint to ascertain the exact nature of the action; nor does he say that he gave his attorney any statement of the facts in the case, or which would constitute any defense thereto, or that he ever from that time communicated with him in reference to the action. That within two days after the service of the summons upon him he left the state, and it does not appear that he returned to it until December, 1891.

Neither did the court err in refusing to recall and quash the execution. The judgment upon which the execution was issued was regular in form, and was rendered after the appellant's default had been taken for failure to answer in a case in which he had been personally served with the summons, and his demurrer to the complaint had been overruled. The judgment was not void, and the execution had been regularly issued thereon within a few months after its rendition. The defendant did not claim that anything had transpired since its entry to authorize the court to suspend or prevent its execution. If the court had erred in overruling the appellant's demurrer thereto, or if there was any infirmity in the judgment by reason of a defective complaint, the remedy of the appellant was by an appeal from the judgment, and upon such appeal he could have caused a stay of the execution; but these reasons would not authorize the court to stay the execution of the judgment, so long as it remained in force and of record.

The entry of judgment against the appellant, without at the same time entering judgment against his codefendant, who had not been served, was in accordance with the statute. Section 636, Code Civ. Proc., provides that upon the overruling of a demurrer the plaintiff may proceed as prescribed in section 585, upon the failure of the defendant to answer; and in section 585 it is provided that, if the defendant fail to answer, the clerk may enter judgment against one or more of several defendants in the cases provided for in section 414; and section 414 provides that when the action is against two or more defendants, jointly or severally liable on a contract, and the summons is served on one or more, but not on all of them, the plaintiff may proceed against the defendants served in the same manner as if they were the only defendants. The provision that the clerk must enter the judgment "immediately" after entering his default is merely directory. His failure to do so may render him liable to an action by the judgment creditor, but does not render void the judgment subsequently entered upon such default; nor can the defendant against whom the judgment is entered invoke such failure for the purpose of annulling a judgment to which he has no other defense. The statute of limitations upon the judgment runs from the time of its entry, and not from its rendition. Trenouth v. Farrington, 54 Cal. 273. See, also, Franklin v. Merida, 50 Cal. 289. If the appellant had desired to set the statute of limitations running, he could himself have caused the judgment to be entered at any time after its rendition. The orders are affirmed.

SPENCE v. SCHULTZ. (No. 15,137.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 25, 1894.)

NEGLIGENCE—DANGEROUS PREMISES—EXCAVATIONS.

Where a building is being constructed on a city lot, and the excavation in the sidewalk is not protected as required by ordinance, the owner of the lots is liable to persons injured by falling therein, though the work is being done by an independent contractor.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; A. A. Sanderson, Judge.

Action by Andy T. Spence against Louis Schultz. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Alex. D. Keyes, for appellant. Henley, MacSherry & Herrmann, Henley & Swift, and J. W. Oates, for respondent.

McFARLAND, J. This is an appeal by defendant from a judgment in favor of plaintiff, and from an order denying defendant's motion for a new trial. This is an action to recover damages for personal injuries sustained by respondent, and caused by his falling into a deep excavation in a sidewalk on a lot and premises owned by appellant, and situated on the corner of Washington and Kearney streets, in the city and county of San Francisco. At the time of the accident appellant was constructing a building on said lot, and an excavation about 14 feet deep had been made in the sidewalk, and left unprotected by any barricades or lights around it. About 10 o'clock p. m. of the evening of November 19, 1889, the respondent, a stranger in the city, while walking along Washington street, fell into said excavation and was seriously injured. He was not guilty of contributory negligence. The main ground upon which appellant contends for a reversal is that he had made several different contracts with several different parties, by which each of said parties was to do the work and to furnish materials necessary to the completion of particular parts of said building; that said parties were independent contractors, and not servants of appellant; and that, therefore, the doctrine of respondeat superior does not apply, and the parties who made said excavation under said contracts are alone answerable for any injury which respondent may have sustained in the manner alleged in the complaint. Counsel on both sides have argued the case in their briefs with great industry and ability, and have cited many authorities. This was highly commendable in counsel, and has aided the court to see the case from many points of view; but damage cases of this class come here quite frequently, and we cannot be expected in each case to elaborately review the whole field of authorities applicable to such cases.

Counsel for respondent argues with much force that the contracts relied on by appellant have so many conditions and reservations, and give to appellant so much revisory and controlling power over the contractors as to the employment of workmen, choice of materials, etc., as to take the case entirely out of the rule invoked by appellant as independent contractors. But, without passing upon that point, we think that the contention of appellant must be decided against him, upon the authority of the cases of Colgrove v. Smith (Cal.) 36 Pac. 411, and Barry v. Terkeldsen, 72 Cal. 254, 13 Pac. 657. In the first place, the maintenance of the excavation was unlawful, because there was no compliance with a certain ordinance of the city on that subject, and appellant could not relieve himself of the duty of complying with said ordinance by shifting it onto a contractor. Colgrove v. Smith, supra. In the second place, an excavation like the one in the case at bar in the sidewalk of a populous street in a city is "so dangerous a pitfall as to be, in its character, of the nature of a nuisance;" and he who causes it to be done, knowing beforehand its nature and character, cannot escape liability to one who innocently falls into it, upon the ground that he let out the job of creating the nuisance to a contractor. Barry v. Terkeldsen, supra. Most of the specific points made by appellant are involved in the above propositions. We think there was sufficient evidence upon the point of the nature of respondent's injuries to warrant the court in instructing the jury that they might consider "how far permanent and lasting his injuries may be in their character;" and we see no error in the instructions to the jury in any other respect. It was not error to admit the ordinance of the city, offered by respondent. There are a number of minor points made by appellant under the head of "Miscellaneous Exceptions," but we do not think that either of such exceptions was well taken, or that either of them needs special mention. The judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO v. WANGENHEIM et al. (No. 15,537.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 25, 1894.)

TAXABLE PROPERTY — SEAT IN STOCK EXCHANGE.

A seat in a stock exchange, which is a personal privilege of being and remaining a member of a voluntary association, with the assent of the associates, is not taxable property. City and County of San Francisco v. Anderson (Cal.) 36 Pac. 1034, followed.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; A. A. Sanderson, Judge.

Action by the city and county of San Francisco against S. Wangenheim & Co. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

J. E. O'Donnell and Jones & O'Donnell, for appellant. Garber, Boalt & Bishop, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. This is an action to recover money alleged to be due from defendants for city and county and state taxes which were assessed for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1890, upon personal property of defendants, to wit, a seat in the San Francisco Produce Exchange. The court below found as a conclusion of law that the said "seat" was not such property as is subject to taxation under the revenue laws of this state, and gave judgment for the defendants, from which the plaintiff appeals on the judgment roll. The case is in all material respects like that of City and County of San Francisco v. Anderson (just decided) 36 Pac. 1034, and upon the authority of the decision in that case the judgment is affirmed.

ADAMS v. FARNSWORTH et al. (No. 15,312.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 25, 1894.)

REVIEW ON APPEAL—HARMLESS ERROR—RECEPTION OF EVIDENCE.

1. Findings by the court will not be disturbed on appeal where there is evidence to justify them.

2. Error in refusing to permit the maker of a note to testify on cross-examination as to the circumstances under which he signed the note—the witness having been called by plaintiff for the purpose simply of proving his signature—is cured by his testifying in his own behalf in regard thereto.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Santa Clara county; W. G. Lorigan, Judge.

Action by Charles Adams against A. D. Farnsworth and others. There was a judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

W. C. Kennedy, for appellants. Wm. H. Jordan and S. F. Leib, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. This action was brought by plaintiff to recover on the following promissory note: "$2,000.00. San José, Feb. 4, 1888. Thirty days after date, for value received, we, jointly or severally, promise to pay Chas. Adams the sum of $2,000 (two thousand dollars), with interest thereon from date until payment at the rate of —— per centum per annum, payable in thirty days, and, if not so paid, then to be added to, and become a part of, the principal, and bear a like interest; said principal and interest to be paid in United States gold coin only. If any interest on this note be not paid within a month after it becomes due, then the whole of the principal and interest shall, at the option of the payee, become and be immediately due and payable. A. D. Farnsworth. D. R. Martin. G. Wendt." The defendants Martin and Wendt, in their answer, deny that they executed the note for value received, and aver that their signatures thereto were procured by fraudulent and false representations made to them by plaintiff and their codefendant Farnsworth. It is further averred that plaintiff duly released them from all liability on said note, and that the same has been fully paid and discharged. Plaintiff had judgment against the defendants Martin and Wendt. Farnsworth, the other defendant, who was never served with process, made no appearance. From which judgment, and the order denying their motion for a new trial, the defendants Martin and Wendt appeal.

The court, in its decision, found that all the allegations of the complaint were true, and also found adversely to the defendants upon all of the defenses set up in their answer; and, as these findings are fully justified by the evidence, they will not, under the well-established rule of this court, be disturbed.

It is claimed by appellants that the court erred in sustaining plaintiff's objection to the following question propounded on cross-examination by counsel for the defense to the defendants Martin and Wendt, while upon the stand as witnesses for plaintiff, who introduced them as such solely for the purposes of proving the signatures to the note: "Q. State under what circumstances you signed that paper" (referring to the note in question). Conceding, for the purpose of this case only, that the court erred in making the ruling complained of, the error was cured by these witnesses subsequently testifying in their own behalf as to the circumstances under which they signed the note.

As the remaining errors complained of are either untenable or immaterial, it follows that the judgment and order should be affirmed, and it is so ordered.

PEOPLE v. LEONARD. (No. 21,096.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 25, 1894.)

CORPORATIONS—FALSE RECORD ENTRIES—INDICTMENT.

1. An indictment of a corporation officer, under Pen. Code, § 563, for making false entries in a record with intent to defraud, if it set out the entries in haec verba, and allege them to be false, need not state wherein they are false.

2. The indictment alleging that the entries were made with intent to defraud the corporation need not set out how they could have effected the result, if they are such that the court cannot say from their face that they could not possibly have done so.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Santa Clara county; John Reynolds, Judge.

Indictment of H. M. Leonard, under Pen. Code, § 563, for making false entries on the books of a corporation with intent to defraud it. Demurrer to indictment sustained. The state appeals. Reversed.

V. A. Scheller and E. E. Cothran, for the State. Morehouse, Tuttle & Richards, for respondent.

GAROUTTE, J. This is an appeal by the people from an order of the superior court sustaining defendant's demurrer to the indictment. The indictment charged that the defendant was a director, officer, manager, and servant of the Bank of Santa Clara County, a corporation, etc., and as such officer, etc., "there then and there came and was under his control and possession a certain record known as a 'note register,' which said record was then and there the property of and kept by the said corporation; and the said H. M. Leonard, while said record was so in his possession and under his control by virtue of his trust as such director, etc., then and there, to wit, on the 31st day of October, 1892, with intent in him, the said H. M. Leonard, to defraud the said corporation in the sum of three thousand dollars, did willfully, unlawfully, and feloniously make in the said record the following false entries, to wit:

Number.	Date.	Maker.	Amount.
275	Oct. 31, 1892.	Sloan.	$3,000.00.

Section 563 of the Penal Code provides: "Every director, officer or agent of any corporation * * * who, with intent to defraud, * * * makes any false entries in any book of accounts, or other record or document kept by such corporation or association, is punishable by imprisonment in the state prison not less than three nor more than ten years. * * *" The indictment in this case was framed under the foregoing section, and we see no objection that can be made to it. It is urged by respondent that nothing is shown by its face indicating wherein the entry is false. There is no merit in this contention, for the indictment sets out in haec verba the entries made by the defendant, and alleges that they were false entries. If they were false, that is, unauthorized by any existing facts, then they were each and all false, and the allegation is exactly in line with the statute. It is claimed that, conceding the entry to be false, still it was not such an entry as could result in defrauding the bank. The indictment clearly shows that no honest man guided the pen that made these entries. They were made through no mistake of fact. They were not only false, but criminally false, for they were made with intent to defraud. It is not necessary to set out how these entries could have resulted in defrauding the bank. That is purely a matter of evidence. In all penal statutes, where the offense is one requiring the act to be done with a certain intention, as burglary, forgery, and obtaining property by false pretenses, it is only necessary in the accusing paper to set out what the defendant actually did, and that he did it with a certain intent. It is not necessary, therefore, to state facts showing how he could have successfully carried out his nefarious schemes and intentions of defrauding some one. If those matters are material to the case, they are only material as evidence tending to support the charge made.

The case of People v. Ah Woo, 28 Cal. 211, is in direct support of these views. That was a case of forgery, and the court said: "So far as it is claimed that the indictment fails to show in what manner Ah Woo was or could be defrauded by the transaction, it is sufficient to say that all that is matter of evidence. The charge is direct. The transfer was made with intent to defraud Ah Woo, which is sufficient, so far as the indictment is concerned. It may have been passed as security for a loan. All this is to be proved, but need not be alleged." In People v. Palmer, 53 Cal. 615, if the indictment had stated in terms the false entry made by the defendant, it then would have been similar to the one here involved, and would have been sustained by the court, as is clearly evidenced by the opinion in that case. If it was apparent from the face of this indictment that these entries were such that under no possible state of circumstances could they have resulted in a fraud upon the corporation, respondent's contention would have force; but such is not the fact. If these entries were quotations of scripture or poetry, it would be evident the indictment could not stand, for the case would then be in the same position as if it had been attempted to make a nudum pactum the subject of forgery. But by inspection of these false entries we cannot say that they could not have resulted in defrauding the bank, and hence we cannot say they are not sufficient to form the basis of a charge of the character here involved. This question is quite fully discussed in People v. Monroe, 100 Cal. 664, 35 Pac. 326. In conclusion, we say the defendant has no cause of complaint against the indictment. He cannot be misled by it, for it is so direct and certain that he knows exactly the charge he will be called upon to meet at the trial of the case. The indictment charges him with falsely making certain entries in the books of the corporation with a fraudulent intent. The entries are set out in terms. He knows exactly what the prosecution will be required to prove, and what defense he should be prepared to make. We think the indictment sufficient to put him upon his trial.

For the foregoing reasons, the order sustaining the demurrer is reversed, and the cause remanded.

TEVIS et al. v. BUTLER. (No. 15,031.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 26, 1894.)

Review on Appeal—Removal of Trustee.

In an action for the removal of a trustee under Civ. Code, § 2283, granting the superior court jurisdiction when the trustee is unfit, where the trial court did not abuse its discretion, a judgment removing such trustee will not be disturbed.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; J. C. B. Hebbard, Judge.

Action by Lloyd Tevis and others against C. C. Butler. From a judgment for plaintiffs, and an order overruling a motion for a new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Arthur Rodgers, for appellant. Pillsbury, Blanding & Hayne, for respondents.

McFARLAND, J. This is an action brought by three trustees to obtain a judgment for the removal of defendant as a fourth trustee. Judgment went for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals from the judgment and from an order denying a motion for a new trial.

A corporation called the San Francisco & Point Lobos Road Company went out of existence in 1882 by expiration of the term of its charter, and, by the statute under which it was organized, its directors at the time of its dissolution became trustees for the purpose of collecting and paying its debts, settling all its affairs, and dividing its assets among its stockholders. Comp. St. 1850–53, p. 290. It had five directors, and at the time of its dissolution the directors were the three plaintiffs and the defendant herein, and one Alpleus Bull, who died before the commencement of this action. In the complaint certain acts and conduct of the appellant are alleged, which, it is contended by respondents, constituted a violation by appellant of the trust, and show his unfitness to execute it; and this action was brought to have him removed under section 2283 of the Civil Code, which provides that "the superior court may remove any trustee who has violated or is unfit to execute the trust." Findings were waived, and the court entered two decrees. The first decreed that appellant be removed as trustee, and that he account for any moneys and property in his hands; and the second, after reciting the first decree, and also the fact that a referee had been appointed to take an account of the moneys, etc., in appellant's hands, and had made his report, confirmed said report and the former decree, and again decreed that said appellant be removed as trustee, etc., and that he pay over a certain sum of money found to be due, and also deliver a safe and certain books of account. Appellant appeals from both judgments.

Appellant contends for a reversal upon the ground that the evidence is insufficient to sustain the judgment, and argues that it is insufficient to show either that he violated the trust, or that he is unfit to execute it. As findings were waived and no facts were found, a discussion of the question whether the evidence, upon any theory, was sufficient to sustain the judgment, would open a wide field of inquiry, and would make necessary a statement of nearly all of the testimony. We do not deem it needful to enter upon that discussion here; nor do we think that it would subserve any useful purpose to state what facts may be considered sufficiently proved, or to detail the evidence tending to prove them. It is sufficient to say that we have carefully examined the evidence contained in the transcript, and that, in our opinion, the court below did not abuse its discretion in coming to the conclusion, from the evidence, that the appellant should be removed as trustee. There are no other questions involved in the case. Respondents contend that the first decree was interlocutory, and that the appeal from it should be dismissed; but we apprehend that, in this case, it is of no consequence whether such appeal be dismissed, or the judgment affirmed. The judgment appealed from, and also the order denying the motion for a new trial, are affirmed.

We concur: DE HAVEN, J.; FITZGERALD, J.

SUTLIFF v. CLUNIE. (No. 15,346.)[1]

(Supreme Court of California. June 26, 1894.)

Assignment for Creditors — Attorney of Assignee — Purchase of Claims Below Par — Payment by Assignee—Notice.

1. Where an attorney, employed by an assignee to settle claims with the creditors, compromises the claims, giving his own notes in settlement at the rate of 50 cents on the dollar, with the understanding that the estate is to pay them when due, he cannot, on failure of the estate to do so, and after seeing that the estate is in fact solvent, have the claims assigned to a third person, who advanced to him the money to pay the notes, and collect the full amount of the claims for the benefit of such third person.

2. Where, in such case, the attorney is the law partner of the assignee, the latter will be chargeable with constructive notice of all the facts in the transaction coming to the knowledge of the former, so as to render him liable for payments in excess of what the attorney paid for the claims.

3. Where an assignee employs counsel to uphold the validity of an unjust claim against the estate, which he paid, he cannot, in case of defeat, charge the estate with the counsel fees.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; C. W. Slack, Judge.

Action by Henry Sutliff against Andrew J. Clunie to compel an accounting by defendant as assignee. From a judgment denying defendant credits for certain items, he appeals. Affirmed.

James G. Maguire and Robt. Y. Hayne, for appellant. Ben Morgan, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. In this case defendant appeals from the final judgment, and from an order denying a motion for a new trial. Plaintiff also appeals from the final judgment. The two appeals are presented upon a single record, consisting of the judgment roll and a bill of exceptions prepared and filed by defendant in support of his motion for a new trial.

Henry Sutliff, the plaintiff herein, was a retail tobacconist in the city and county of San Francisco. On the 1st day of July, 1887, supposing himself to be insolvent, and unable to pay his debts, plaintiff consulted the law firm of Clunie, Young & Clunie, of which the defendant, A. J. Clunie, was a member, and on the advice of Thomas J. Clunie, who was also a member of said law firm, and a brother of the defendant herein, he made and executed to the defendant an assignment of all his property, real and personal, for the benefit of his creditors, which assignment defendant accepted, filed a bond for the faithful performance of his duties as such assignee, upon which bond Thomas J. Clunie was a surety, and thereupon entered upon a discharge of his duties as such assignee. On the 20th day of July, 1887, plaintiff filed his inventory and schedule of his creditors, etc., as required by section 3461 of the Civil Code, in the office of the county recorder. This action was brought to compel an accounting by the defendant of his transactions as assignee, etc. An account was rendered by the defendant, and the main controversy on this appeal relates to the action of the court below in disallowing portions of two items in the account with which defendant had credited himself. Soon after the assignment, the plaintiff and Thomas J. Clunie, his attorney and friend, conceived the idea of settling with the creditors of plaintiff at 50 cents on the dollar, and with that object in view arranged with Rosenbaum Bros., who held a claim for $5,558.80, and Joseph Brandenstein, who had a claim for $9,156.27, to accept 50 cents on the dollar for their claims, to be paid by said Clunie, and the further sum of 10 cents on the dollar to be secured by plaintiff's notes, payable when the whole estate was settled. Clunie gave his note to Rosenbaum Bros. for 50 per cent. of their claim. Brandenstein was satisfied with the verbal promise of said Thomas J. Clunie. These agreements, the court finds, were made for the benefit of plaintiff, and, as is apparent, with the expectation that he would raise the funds to pay the demands. Defendant professed to have found a man who would advance sufficient funds to pay off all demands due from plaintiff if the latter would pay a bonus therefor of $2,500. Plaintiff revolted at this, but offered to pay $2,000, which was rejected. About this time plaintiff discovered that upon a settlement of his estate he would be able to pay all his creditors in full, and so represented to Rosenbaum Bros. and Brandenstein, and requested them to cancel the note and promise of Thomas J. Clunie, and assured them he would pay them dollar for dollar. They declined to do so. Clunie had taken assignments of these claims against plaintiff to his friends. Before Thomas J. Clunie paid either of the claims, it was arranged between plaintiff, defendant, and Thomas J. Clunie that defendant should deposit with Thomas J. Clunie all the moneys of the estate as realized by defendant, which was done from that time forward. Thomas J. Clunie paid his 50 per cent. obligation to Rosenbaum Bros. about July 30, 1887, and the like obligation to Brandenstein on or about August 26, 1887. Up to the date of payment to Brandenstein, Thomas J. Clunie had received and had in his hands funds of the estate, say $6,000. Subsequently, and by January, 1888, there had come into the hands of said Thomas J. Clunie funds of said estate more than sufficient to pay both of said claims at their face value, viz. $14,715, and thereupon the defendant authorized him to pay himself from said funds the whole face value of said two claims, which was done, and the amount thereof charged by defendant in his account against the estate of plaintiff. There are some other points bearing upon the case, but it is not deemed necessary to set them out here.

The court below decided the case upon the theory that Thomas J. Clunie was the agent of the defendant in the transaction of the business, and that, as defendant could not, in his fiduciary capacity, make a profit inuring to himself out of the administration of the trust estate, so he could not, by the appointment of an agent, accomplish a result which, as a principal, he was precluded from attaining. Appellant's counsel concede, in effect, that the settlement of the claims below their par value was at the date thereof in the interest of and for the benefit of the plaintiff. Their contention, however, is that plaintiff, having failed to raise the money to meet the obligations which Thomas J. Clunie had incurred on his behalf, the latter was at liberty to borrow the money of Turtin to meet his obligations, take an assignment of the claims to Turtin, or for his benefit, and to collect from the assignee the full face value thereof; and hence that the defendant was authorized to make such payment, and to charge plaintiff with the amount thereof. Thomas J. Clunie was a member of the law firm of Clunie, Young & Clunie, and was attorney for plaintiff. He knew, before he took an assignment in favor of Turtin, that the estate of plaintiff was solvent, and able to pay in full all it owed. Under such circumstances he had no equitable right to purchase demands against his client at a reduced rate, and then charge the latter, or, what is the same thing, his estate, with the par value of the claims. When, under such circumstances, an attorney purchases a claim against his client at less than its face value, he cannot be permitted to make a profit thereby against the principal whose agent he is, and more especially where, as in this case, he has in his custody funds in which the client has a beneficial interest to an amount nearly equal to the amount paid out, with an almost certain prospect of receiving the balance in a short time. Thomas J. Clunie was, it is true, the agent of the assignee, A. J. Clunie, who is defendant here. As such agent he received all the moneys of the estate, and paid its debts so far as they were paid. It is also true that this action is against A. J. Clunie, the assignee. But he was the law partner of Thomas J. Clunie, and as such is chargeable with constructive notice of all facts in relation to the transaction coming to the knowledge of his copartner. It is also quite apparent that he had actual notice of most of the facts, and, whether we treat him simply as a principal authorizing his agent, Thomas J. Clunie, to pay himself in full from the funds of the estate, or as the copartner of Thomas J. Clunie, and hence as the attorney of the plaintiff, seems to make little difference. In either situation he had no right, as against plaintiff, to pay or authorize the payment to Thomas J. Clunie of a greater sum on account of the claims than the amount advanced by the latter on account thereof.

[1] Rehearing granted.

The claim of a counsel fee by defendant was properly denied. The main use which defendant appears to have had for counsel in the proceeding was to contest the two items in question, and, as the decision is against him, he is not entitled to counsel fees for setting up an unjust claim in his own behalf and against the estate.

The appeal by the plaintiff is, so far as appears from the record, without merit. The judgment appealed from by the plaintiff and the defendant, and the order appealed from by the defendant, are affirmed.

TAPSCOTT v. LYON. (No. 18,239.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 27, 1894.)

CONVERSION BY RECEIVER—WHAT CONSTITUTES—ACTION FOR DAMAGES.

1. Where a receiver is directed by the court to take possession of property in the possession of a third party, and he demands possession thereof as receiver, and possession is given to him as receiver, he is not personally liable for conversion.

2. In an action for conversion, where defendant claims possession of the property as receiver, and a disposition thereof by order of the court, defendant may introduce the petition for a receiver, the petition for permission to sell, the order of sale, the report of the sale, and the order approving the sale, even though plaintiff admits the receivership.

3. Where an insolvent, with the intent to prefer one creditor over another, sells his property, a few days before filing a petition in insolvency, to one who knows such intent, the sale is void, though the purchaser pays full value, and the proceeds are applied to the payment of an honest debt.

Commissioners' decision. In bank. Appeal from superior court, Tehama county, E. A. Davis, Judge.

Action by Ernest N. Tapscott against D. B. Lyon for conversion. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

L. V. Hitchcock and L. T. Hatfield, for appellant. N. P. Chipman and Jackson Hatch, for respondent.

TEMPLE, C. Action for the wrongful taking and conversion of personal property. The complaint contains two counts charging distinct trespasses. The answer, besides general denials, sets up affirmative matter in defense of each cause of action. It shows that on the 10th day of December, 1889, J. T. Wight & Co., a firm composed of J. T. Wight and J. A. Wight, was engaged in trade at Kirkwood, Tehama county, as retail dealers in general merchandise; that they owed divers persons $15,000 in the aggregate, and were insolvent; that to prevent their property from coming into the hands of an assignee in insolvency, and to prevent the proceeds of the same from being ratably distributed to their creditors in accordance with the provisions of the insolvent act, and to delay and hinder the operation of that act, they secretly and fraudulently, in the nighttime, transferred to plaintiff their whole stock of goods, which was reasonably worth $5,000, and, except their book accounts and notes taken in their business, was their entire assets, all of which together were not worth more than $8,000; that the goods were sold in bulk, and not in due course of business, to plaintiff for $2,000, plaintiff at the time well knowing of the insolvency of the vendors, and that their purpose was to defraud their creditors and prevent their assets from being distributed ratably to their creditors, as required by the insolvent act. The answer then shows, by proper averment, the institution of proceedings in insolvency by the creditors of J. T. Wight & Co. to force them into insolvency, and that in such proceedings a receiver was appointed to take charge of the assets of said insolvents, under the sixty-third section of the insolvent act of 1880. The receiver was authorized to bring, prosecute, maintain, and defend all actions and legal proceedings necessary to take and hold possession of such property, money, and effects, and "especially relating to that certain stock of goods, wares, and merchandise alleged to be the property of the said J. T. Wight & Co., and heretofore forming and constituting the stock in trade of the said J. T. Wight & Co. at Kirkwood, Tehama county, state of California, and the proceeds thereof." The answer avers the due appointment and qualification of defendant as receiver, and that as such receiver he proceeded to demand from plaintiff, —who was in possession, claiming as vendee of J. T. Wight & Co.,—said goods, exhibiting to him the order showing his appointment and proof that he had qualified. That thereupon said plaintiff voluntarily surrendered and delivered to defendant the goods, wares, and merchandise described in the first count of plaintiff's complaint. That defendant took said goods in his capacity of receiver as and for the property of the insolvents and held the same by virtue of his said office as receiver. That plaintiff thereafter served upon defendant, as receiver, a written notice as follows: "To L. V. Hitchcock and C. A. Garter, attorneys for petitioning creditors: You are hereby notified that Ernest Tapscott will, on the 27th day of December, 1889, at 10 o'clock a. m., move the superior court of Tehama county for an order directing D. B. Lyon, receiver, to deliver to him all the stock of goods, wares, and merchandise situate at the town of Kirkwood, in this county, and by the said receiver taken into possession on the 19th day of December, 1889. Said motion will be made on the following grounds: (1) That said affiant was, prior to the commencement of these proceedings, the owner of and in possession of all of said property. (2) That at the time said receiver took possession of the same this affiant was the owner of and in possession of all of said property, claiming the same adversely to said firm of J. T. Wight & Co., and to all the world. (3) That said receiver was never authorized by this court to take possession of said property. (4) That this court had no power to authorize or order said receiver to take possession of said property. (5) That said receiver is not entitled to the possession of said property, and this affiant is entitled to such possession. Said motion will be made upon all the papers on file in this proceeding, upon affidavit, copy of which is herewith served, and upon oral testimony to be adduced at said hearing. Yours, etc., N. P. Chipman and John F. Ellison, Attorneys for Ernest Tapscott." That on the 27th day of December, 1889, the application of plaintiff, according to said notice, came on to be heard in the superior court, when evidence was taken on the part of plaintiff, and also for the receiver representing the creditors of the insolvents, and after a full hearing the court made an order denying the application, which order is still in force, unreversed, and is a final adjudication of the rights of said plaintiff in the matter. That afterwards, to wit, January 20, 1890, said J. T. Wight & Co., and the individuals composing the firm, were adjudged insolvent, and on March 7th an assignee was appointed, who duly qualified. In the meantime the goods had been sold by defendant, as receiver, under the express order of the court. After the appointment and qualification of the assignee, all the property and money in the hands of the defendant as receiver were turned over to the assignee, under the direction of the court, and all of such funds had been distributed to the creditors of such insolvents, under the orders of the court, except fees, costs, and commissions duly allowed prior to the commencement of this suit, and, except such fees and commissions, the defendant had in his hands no part of the goods sued for, nor the proceeds thereof. That plaintiff delayed bringing his action for more than one year after his said demand for a redelivery, and until the property had been sold and the proceeds distributed to the creditors.

The second count is to recover for goods which were not in the store when the receiver took possession, and which, therefore, were not then delivered to the defendant as receiver. In answer to this count, defendant avers that, finding that a portion of the merchandise received by plaintiff from J. T. Wight & Co. had been removed, he demanded possession of it, and, upon a refusal, instituted against plaintiff, in his, defendant's character as receiver, an action of replevin, in which he caused a provisional writ to be issued as authorized by law, by virtue of which such goods were taken by the sheriff and eventually delivered to defendant as receiver; that the plaintiff—defendant in the action of replevin—filed an answer in that action in which he denied the receiver's right to the property, but did not claim a return of the property or its value, but simply asked to recover his costs, and thereupon this defendant as receiver—plaintiff in that action—dismissed the action and paid the costs; that the judgment of dismissal is still in force, unreversed, and is a bar to this action. The case was tried by a jury, which rendered a verdict for plaintiff, and defendant appeals from the judgment and from an order denying him a new trial.

It can hardly be said that appellant has filed his points as required by the rules of this court. He has put in, however, an elaborate brief, in which he discusses certain legal questions, but generally without specifying any rulings to which his argument is applicable. Sometimes, however, the application is sufficiently obvious, and such I propose to notice.

1. It is contended that the defendant, holding the goods as receiver, is not responsible as a trespasser, and that the order refusing to direct the defendant as receiver to deliver the property to plaintiff is conclusive as to plaintiff's right. Naturally, the first consideration in regard to this matter is as to the nature of defendant's possession. Did he take the property from the plaintiff as a trespasser? Was his possession personal or official only? Were the goods in the custody of the court? The order did not expressly direct him to take these specific goods. It did direct him to take into possession all the assets of the insolvents, and authorized him to institute suit to recover these specific goods. It is well settled that under such circumstances he had no right, as receiver, to seize the goods in the possession of the plaintiff, however manifest the fraud through which they were acquired. His duty was to demand them, and upon a refusal to bring suit for their recovery. If he takes the property from one not a party to the proceedings in which he received his appointment, against the will of such party, he does so at his personal risk. He is not acting for the court, and will not ordinarily be protected by it. But if he is lawfully in possession of property claimed to belong to the insolvent, he will be regarded as the servant of the court, and even adverse claimants will not be justified in disturbing his possession without leave of the court. Nor can he be made responsible in an action for the value of such property by such person. The custody is that of the court. The receiver has no right to deliver such property to an adverse claimant without leave of the court, and therefore cannot be held responsible for not doing so. The receiver, contemplating an action to recover these goods, made due demand, expecting a refusal, which would place him in a position to sue. He showed his authority, and the plaintiff, fully advised as to the facts, although, as he claims, misunderstanding the nature of the proceeding, surrendered possession to the receiver. The receiver could not refuse to accept them. He would have had no right of action if he had, provided he was rightly advised that a demand was required, for there must be a demand and a refusal. Probably he would have been liable on his bond had he refused. He was expressly authorized—perhaps it should be said directed—to sue for the recovery of these very goods. Plaintiff, with a knowledge of this fact, voluntarily gave them up. Had the receiver sued for and recovered them, he would then have held them as custodian of the court. I think he did, as it was.

I think the cases cited by both parties are upon questions not here involved. They are cases where it is sought to recover the goods in the possession of the receiver, or to establish some right or interest in the property, as the property of a party to the action, or they are claims arising against the receiver in his management of the property or a business by the receiver. Here it is not sought to interfere with the property. The purpose of the receivership had been accomplished, and, according to defendant's allegations, the property all sold and the proceeds distributed. The defendant is sued as a trespasser, and his plea is that in taking the goods he acted as receiver; that his acts were lawful, and that he cannot therefore be held as a trespasser. As he did not take the goods as a trespasser, and has disposed of them under express direction of the court, I think this position must be sustained. He was then but a servant, executing the commands of the court. The possession of a receiver has been likened to that of a sheriff who has levied upon goods by virtue of an execution, and in many important respects the cases are similar. High, Inj. § 2. But the case of a sheriff in possession of goods under a writ of attachment, and a receiver of goods which he is expressly ordered to take, are not in all respects analogous. If the sheriff, under a writ, seizes property which is in the possession of the defendant in the suit, and therefore presumptively his, third persons claiming such property can ordinarily, after demand, sue the sheriff and recover it if they can show title. But when a receiver is in possession of property which he is specifically directed by the court to take, and which is claimed to belong to the party whose goods are sequestered, and such possession has been acquired without the commission of a trespass, the receiver cannot be held personally responsible as a trespasser by a third party upon demand and refusal to give up the property. The sheriff is the agent of the creditor. He commits no contempt if he refuses to levy upon goods which he has reason to believe do not belong to the debtor. He may release them to a claimant without being guilty of a contempt. He simply takes the responsibility. The receiver has no such discretion. If the goods are described and are in the possession of the party whose property he is directed to take into possession, or are voluntarily delivered to him by the person having them, he must take them, on pain of incurring a contempt, and, having thus taken them, he cannot surrender them to an adverse claimant without leave of the court, which is the real custodian. High, Rec. §§ 139-145; Gluck & B. Rec. § 92; Beach, Rec. 304. Parker v. Browning, 8 Paige, 388, was an appeal by the receiver from an order allowing an action against him for taking, as receiver, goods belonging to third persons. The complaint was that the receiver had forcibly taken goods from the claimants which did not belong to the defendant, whose goods he was directed to take. The chancellor says the receiver is not required to place himself in the position of a wrongdoer, and need not take property from third persons unless under an express order to that effect; that suit should be brought to recover property in the possession of adverse claimants, but, "where the property is legally and properly in the possession of the receiver, it is the duty of the court to protect that possession, not only against acts of violence, but also against suits at law, so that a third person claiming the same may be compelled to come in and ask to be examined pro interessse suo, if he wishes to test the justice of such claim." In that case, it will be seen, the suit was by permission brought against the receiver in his official character. That is the usual and proper mode of presenting such claims, and permission can always be given on such terms as will protect the receiver, while affording full opportunity to the claimant to test his right. Furthermore, it brings the claimant into a court of equity, where he will be required to present his claim without unnecessary delay. In such case the claim of the plaintiff here would have been lost by laches, if the facts alleged in the answer were established. Barton v. Barbour, 104 U. S. 126, is a case in which a receiver was sued for an alleged tort while acting within the scope of his duties as receiver, to wit, operating a railroad. The whole subject is reviewed, and it is held that, while a receiver will be liable as a trespasser if he goes outside of his authority as receiver, still all claims of adverse parties against him arising out of his acts within his authority must be first submitted to the court from which he receives his appointment, and that such court may either try the matter itself or authorize a suit against the receiver. The judge answers the objection which had been urged by some state courts that parties are thereby deprived of trial by jury in cases in which such right is guarantied. The case is all the more decisive because of a vigorous dissenting opinion by Justice Miller, in which he very graphically describes the enormous power which a judge draws to himself by appointing a receiver for a railroad, which may be operating thousands of miles of road and having transactions with thousands of people every day, who in case of disagreement are compelled to submit their suits to the chancellor or seek relief under such conditions and limitations as he may impose. I think these cases and others cited by the respondent are all consistent with the views above expressed, and that the defendant cannot be held responsible for the goods surrendered to him by the plaintiff. This being so, it does not appear to be necessary to hold that the order refusing to direct a redelivery of the property to plaintiff is a bar to plaintiff's right. The court undoubtedly had the power to grant the relief sought in that proceeding. Hulme v. Superior Court, 63 Cal. 240. Whether conclusive or not, the proceeding inaugurated by plaintiff was a recognition and admission that defendant then held the property as receiver.

2. The first point has reference only to the first cause of action, and to the goods found in the store formerly occupied by the insolvents. The second cause of action was for goods not then delivered to the receiver. As stated in the answer, the purport of which has already been set out, these goods were the subject of a further demand, and for them it is charged the defendant, as receiver, brought his action of replevin, which was dismissed, as stated. At the trial the judgment roll in that action was offered in evidence by defendant, and was ruled out on the objection of plaintiff. This ruling is assigned as error. Defendant contends that the judgment of dismissal is a bar to plaintiff's claim. After carefully reading appellant's brief upon this point, I am still at a loss to comprehend upon what this contention is based. Certainly there was no pretense of an adjudication. Appellant says that, as the defendant in the replevin suit set up no claim, the plaintiff had a right to dismiss the action. Conceding that he had such right, he then elected to dismiss without obtaining an adjudication upon his right. He obtained a provisional remedy on condition that he would prosecute his suit and obtain a final adjudication determining his right. Section 512, Code Civ. Proc. He failed to perform this condition. He thereby made himself a trespasser from the beginning, unless he can show title. True, it was a breach of the condition of his undertaking, and the defendant might then have sued upon the bond for such damages as he sustained by the taking. Manning v. Manning, 26 Kan. 98. But that remedy was not exclusive. Plaintiff was not compelled to sue on the undertaking. As to the second cause of action, therefore, the defendant must be considered a trespasser if plaintiff succeeds in establishing his title. Defendant, however, was in fact a receiver, and authorized to represent creditors. As to them, it has often been held in this state that a sale made to hinder, delay, or defraud them is absolutely void, and not merely voidable. Grum v. Barney, 55 Cal. 254; Humphreys v. Harkey, Id. 284; Mason v. Vestal, 88 Cal. 396, 26 Pac. 213. It is therefore necessary to consider some other alleged errors.

3. The defendant was allowed to put in evidence the proceedings in insolvency up to and including the adjudication, but the court excluded: (1) The petition upon which defendant was appointed receiver; (2) the petition of the receiver for permission to sell the property and the order of the court directing the sale; (3) the report of the sale; (4) an order approving the sale; (5) the appointment of an assignee and orders directing payment to creditors. To each ruling the appellant excepted. There can be no question that all this evidence should have been admitted, at least down to and including the appointment of the assignee. It was necessary, to show the jurisdiction and power of the court to appoint a receiver, that a proper petition should have been presented. Of course, the defendant could not show that his acts were all official unless he could show his official character. The court recognized this, and suggested that the plaintiff admit that a proper petition was presented. This admission plaintiff's counsel made, but defendant refused to accept it. The court, however, insisted upon it, and persisted in its ruling. A party legally entitled to certain evidence cannot be compelled to accept an admission in lieu of the evidence to which he is entitled unless the admission be as good for him as the evidence. Here it evidently was not. The petition explained the duties and power of the receiver by showing why he was appointed and what he was expected to do, and especially it showed that the reason why a receiver was appointed was to pursue these very goods, the value of which plaintiff seeks to recover. It explains the language of the order, and shows to what it applies. It was important and proper for defendant to show that he was directed to pursue these very goods, as showing that in taking them he was acting under the direction of the court. It was also proper to show that the property was disposed of under the direction of the court, and that the defendand did not apply it, or any portion of it, to his own use. To do this all the evidence above alluded to was material. A radical mistake of the learned judge of the trial court was that the only question involved was as to the title of the plaintiff. This is not so. Though plaintiff's title be admitted, still the defendant cannot be held in this proceeding as a tort feasor for any act within the scope of his duties as receiver and done under the express order of the court.

4. Appellant complains of the instructions that they are conflicting and confusing, and says: "The defendant, appellant, instead of receiving the benefit of doubts, was treated as an offender, and the fact of his being the 'hand of the court' pretty thoroughly ignored." He says the specifications in his statement sufficiently indicate the instructions objected to, and he will not repeat them in his points. The statement contains 72 specifications of errors which occurred at the trial. I do not think this a compliance with the rule which requires an appellant to file and serve his points. In his points the appellant should at least specifically point out the errors he relies upon, and briefly state why he deems the rulings erroneous. The instructions are numerous and voluminous, and we cannot be expected to hunt through them to find those which the general discourse of appellant may apply to. A reading of the instructions given at the instance of the respondent shows failure to make one distinction in a matter material to appellant. For instance, the fifteenth is: "A debtor may pay one creditor in preference to another, or may give to one creditor security for the payment of his demand in preference to another." Now the property in question here was taken by a receiver appointed to aid proceedings against J. T. Wight & Co. as insolvent debtors under the insolvent act. The transfer was made only seven days before the petition by the creditors. It was contended that the plaintiff, when he purchased, knew of the insolvency, and that the sale was made to enable J. T. Wight to pay a debt due his wife, in preference to the other creditors, and to prevent the property from going to an assignee in insolvency and being ratably divided among the creditors of J. T. Wight & Co. The insolvency was admitted. Granted the intent to prefer one creditor over another, and knowledge on the part of the vendee, the law is exactly the converse of that stated. If it can be said that the defendant also contended that the sale was void because made to hinder, delay, and defraud creditors, the instruction would still be erroneous, for it is not so qualified as not to have application to both questions. In several instructions this failure to discriminate between a claim that the sale was void because made to hinder, delay, and defraud creditors, and a fraudulent preference under the fifty-fifth section of the insolvent act, is manifest. The instruction is sound law as applied to one case, but is almost the opposite of sound law as applied to the other. Defendant's claim was founded almost if not entirely upon the proposition that the sale was a fraudulent preference under the insolvent act. In such case the insolvent cannot within one month before filing the petition prefer one creditor to another; and if he makes a sale for the purpose of doing so, and the vendee is aware of the intent, the sale is void as against the operation of the insolvent act, even though the purchaser paid full value for the property and the proceeds were applied to the payment of an honest debt. Furthermore, the sale to plaintiff was not in the usual and ordinary course of business, and this fact appeared from the testimony of plaintiff himself. When a retail merchant, while he is engaged in business as such, and has a large stock of goods exposed for sale in that mode, transfers the entire stock in one trade, such transfer is not, and cannot be, in the usual and ordinary course of his business. The above fact, taken in connection with the other circumstances in proof, was sufficient to bring the case within the rule laid down in the insolvent act. The evidence on the subject was not conflicting. But one rational conclusion could be drawn from it upon this point, and there was no question as to the credibility of witnesses. Thereby, on the question of fraud, the burden was shifted from defendant to plaintiff, and it was misleading, without explanation or qualification, to tell the jury that the burden was upon the defendant. Under the circumstances, the court would have been justified in charging the jury that the defendant had prima facie made out his defense.

Other instructions I do not deem it necessary to discuss, because of the failure of sufficient specifications. I think the judgment and order should be reversed, and a new trial had.

We concur: HAYNES, C.; BELCHER, C.

WYMAN v. MOORE et al. (No. 15,223.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 26, 1894.)

GAMBLING CONTRACTS BY AGENT—RIGHTS OF PRINCIPAL.

Where a principal engages an agent to purchase wheat, who, instead, employs a broker to buy "futures," and the principal, with knowledge of the transaction, accepts the benefits, she thereby ratifies the agent's act, and cannot recover the money from the broker in case of subsequent losses, as she is in pari delicto.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; J. C. B. Hebbard, Judge.

Action by Cora B. Wyman against James Moore and others. There was a judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

George D. Collins, for appellant. W. S. Goodfellow and Otto Tum Suden, for respondents.

McFARLAND, J. This action is, substantially, to recover money alleged to have been given by plaintiff to defendants, who were brokers, to be used by the latter for the former in buying and selling wheat. The business seems to have been profitable for a while, but afterwards ended in a loss. The court found that all of the allegations of the complaint were untrue, and all the allegations of the answer true, and rendered judgment for the defendants; and plaintiff appeals from the judgment, and an order denying her motion for a new trial.

We think that the judgment and order should be affirmed. Waiving the question of the alleged illegality of the transactions about wheat,—upon which illegality appellant rests her claim to a recovery,—it appears that the appellant was not an innocent party to such transactions, but took part in and ratified them. Being, therefore, a party in pari delicto, the law leaves her where it finds her. The judgment and order are affirmed.

We concur: DE HAVEN, J.; FITZGERALD, J.

Ex parte CLARKE. (No. 21,085.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 30, 1894.)

EXAMINATION OF INSOLVENT—PRIVILEGE OF WITNESS—FRAUD.

Const. art. 1, § 13, provides that no one shall be compelled, in any criminal case, to be a witness against himself. Section 154, Pen. Code, provides that every debtor who fraudulently sells or conceals his property with intent to defraud or delay his creditors is punishable by fine or imprisonment, or both. Petitioner was adjudicated an insolvent, and was cited to appear before the court and be examined regarding his disposition of his property. Held, that he was not obliged to answer questions relating to his fraudulent disposition of his property.

In bank. Petition by Alfred Clarke for habeas corpus. Prisoner discharged.

Frank M. Stone, for petitioner. Warren Olney, for respondent.
